Life and Adventure in Japan.

BY E. WARREN CLARK.

Kioto is the "sacred city" of Japan. Until a few years ago it was considered the spiritual capital, where his Mysteriousness the Mikado resided, whose august person was solemnly veiled from even the gaze of his own subjects. The idea of a foreigner from the outside world ever gaining admittance to the sacred city would have horrified the good Japanese of the olden time; nevertheless, wonderful things are happening in our day, and changes have come to pass which would have paralyzed the ancient court; so that I really went to Kioto, and sojourned among its most sacred temples as comfortably as though I were rusticated on the beautiful banks of the Hudson.

The trip was a long one, requiring several weeks. I went to the port of Kobe by sea—a distance of 430 miles, and returned to Tokio by the whole length of the Tokaido, on the overland route. The most interesting and historical portions of Japan were visited on the way, though I cannot do more than mention them here.

Kobe is very picturesquely situated between the mountains and the sea, and some of the foreign houses are very handsome. The town is merely the port and commercial outlet of Osaka, and is connected with the latter city by a new railroad.

We took the 11.30 train for Osaka, reaching the spacious depot on the suburbs of the city in just one hour. The cars are more elegant and comfortable than those on the Yokohama Railroad, and the locomotives are larger; both roads were built by English engineers, and the cars are small, in the English style. The Japanese conductors evince pardonable pride in the novel dignity placed upon them in collecting tickets and conveying passengers. They are very polite and competent however.

Osaka is the second city in size in the Japanese Empire. It contains a population of over 500,000, and is more compactly built than Tokio. The streets are narrow and very crowded, but comparatively clean. So many large canals intersect the city that it might be called the Venice of Japan. Our hotel was conveniently located on one of these canals, and we made excursions from this point in every direction, exploring the sights of the great city. The shops were the finest I had seen, and were stocked with a great variety of goods; for Osaka is the commercial centre of the country.

The three points of interest which we first visited were the imperial mint, the great castle, and the pagoda; from the latter a fine general view of the city may be obtained. The imperial mint was more extensive than the United States mint at Philadelphia, and quite as well constructed in every respect. We were politely shown throughout the whole establishment, and witnessed the whole process on a scale we had never seen before. The mint is a granite building, and stands on the margin of the river; close beside it is a sulphuric acid manufactory, with a solitary brick chimney 150 feet in height.

We first passed through the rooms for melting gold and silver; here were small furnaces containing red-hot crucibles. The melted metal is poured into moulds, and cools in the form of long bars several inches thick. These bars are rolled in another room between heavy cylinders moved by machinery. It appeared strange to see the workmen forcing these bars between the rollers, as if they were only sticks of wood. They come out flat and bow-shaped, and are dark and discolored; the friction of the heavy rolling also makes them quite hot. Without thinking of this, and not noticing that the workmen had their hands protected by thick gloves, I attempted to pick up one of the bars from a freshly rolled cartful as we passed by. I dropped it quicker than I picked it up, somewhat to the amusement of those standing near, and concluded that money was sometimes a hot thing to handle!

The machines in the various rooms were very complicated and delicate: some were for punching the gold, silver, and copper coins, from the flat strips of these metals. Others were for rounding them off nicely, and turning up the edges; and finally the coins were placed in piles, and ran through grooves to the stamping machines, which closed upon each one of them with a "bite," impressing the "dragon" and the value upon one side, and the "rising sun" and imperial crest upon the other.

We watched for some time the continuous streams of gold and silver pieces which rattled from the mouths of the various machines: at one point it would be a silver shower of dollars or fifty sen pieces; at another it would be a golden rain of five, ten, or twenty yen coins, bright and shining as the sun stamped upon them.

The new pennies, which had recently been put in circulation to replace the old tempo cash, were being produced at a rate that would have made the little boys' eyes dance; they flew out of the hopper like chaff from a winnowing machine, and looked so bright that one would think them something more than copper.

The most beautiful instruments were those in the weighing-room, and the finest machine here was constructed by the Japanese. Each gold coin must be weighed to see that it is of the exact weight required by the standard. In the weighing-room there are six tables of apparatus, brass levers, armatures, and scales, all enclosed in glass cases, and all moved by delicate band adjustments, connecting them with the same power that moves the ponderous machines in the other rooms. The gold coins are pushed forward one by one, by feeders, to the delicate scale-pan, which acts automatically and almost with intelligence. If the coin is too heavy, it drops to one side; if it is a little too light, it turns off to another box; but if it is just right, it goes straight ahead to a kind of contribution-box, which is usually better supplied than those for missionary purposes.

After visiting the mint, I was very much interested in inspecting the acid works. My companions could see nothing very poetical in leaden chambers and sulfurous sulphur furnaces, even though they admired the big chimney, which is said to be the highest in Asia; and, in this chimneyless country it is at least a consolation to know that the Japs have one chimney that even beats the average! I told them the consumption of sulphuric acid was the true standard of a nation's commercial prosperity, for it is used in all the processes of manufacture; and the acid works, with all their sulphurous fumes and furnaces, were a more reliable index of Japan's commercial condition than the glittering showers of gold through which we had just passed in the mint.

There is a river flowing from the vicinity of Kioto and Lake Biwa which empties into the bay at Osaka. It is customary to go up the river by night, rather than jolt all the way to Kioto in a jinrikisha. The canals of the city connect with the river, and as our hotel was located near the main canal we determined to take a moonlight trip to Kioto.

The night had fairly set in as we reached the low but picturesque craft, which I have styled a gondola; it was waiting in the stream for us, and having transferred ourselves and baggage to the cabin-like place which had been prepared for us, the boat moved up the river. There was plenty of space inside, though the cabin roof was scarcely four feet high; and stretching ourselves on the floor, to make up in length what we lacked in height, we looked out of the windows at the curious sights by the way. The evening was warm and pleasant, and thousands of people had gathered on the river in boats, to enjoy the cool breeze, in preference to promenading the narrow and sultry streets of the city. The surface of the water for a mile or more was covered with small crafts of every description. Some had old folks, smoking their pipes and taking their ease; others had family groups sipping their tea together; others again had numbers of merry young people who were evidently out for a frolic, and enlivened the air with laughter, music, and talk. Each boat carried two or three lanterns, and some were decked with whole strings of light, with various colors. So numerous were the gay crafts that it looked like a moving constellation as they passed backwards and forwards. Now and then the small skiff of a fruit-seller would be seen darting in and out between the large boats, and the tempting array of melons and peaches illuminated by a paper lantern, would be offered to the various occupants, who were already enjoying their tea and other refreshments. A few fireworks were let off on the river bank by the juveniles, and these combined with the reflection of the hundreds of lights on the water gave a brilliant effect to the scene.

But the sight on our own craft was by no means the least interesting part of the entertainment, for scarcely were we comfortably settled, than the boat began moving up stream at a wonderfully rapid rate; and the mole of its propulsion was among the most novel and characteristic things we had seen in Japan. Eight men armed with stout poles, twelve or sixteen feet long, would start together at the bow of the boat, each with his pole braced against his shoulder; and then, with a yell, they would plunge their poles against the shallow river bed, and rush together towards the stern, making the boat fairly jump on its course. On both sides of the boat the raised gunwale of stout timber was cut with broad notches to fit the feet of the men, and, as they kept step with each other, their nimble motions from one end of the boat to the other had all the effect of a machine.

Letter of Isaac Pennington.

Consider, I pray thee, if what thou sayest be not contrary to the Scriptures? Was the work laid by the Father upon the manhood, or upon the Son who, in the life and by the life, was "mighty to save"? If He took up the manhood? Was it not the Son? "Lo! I come," said He, "a body hast thou prepared me." And was it not He, that laid down his glory, and made himself of no reputation, but came in the form of a servant (took upon Him man's nature)—did not He do the work in man's nature? Did not the eternal Spirit sanctify the body in the womb? Did not the eternal Power act in Him all along? Yea, did not the eternal Spirit offer the body to God as a sacrifice? For the manhood would fain have avoided the cup ("Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me!"), but the Spirit taught Him to be subject to the will of the Father herein. So that his giving up to death was rather to be attributed to his eternal Spirit than to his manhood; for that was the chief in the work, and not merely assistant to Him. And doth not Christ confess as much to his Father, when He saith, "I have glorified thee on the earth, I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do; and now, O Father! glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." Though we are willing to honor the manhood of Christ, with the honor which the Father hath honored it with; yet we cannot honor it in the first place, and attribute redemption to it in the first place, making the Spirit and life of God but supporting, assisting, and carrying on therein. For "God was in Christ;" and it was his power, life, and virtue did all in Him, as it is a measure of the same life which doth all in us; in which measure we partake of his death, and not only so, but also of his life and resurrection. For He is "the resurrection and the life," (which we cannot deny) and if by his death we be reconciled to God, "much more shall we be saved by his life." And if righteousness be revealed in us, imputed to us, and we partake of it, as we come into his death; much more shall we partake of it, as we come into his life.

It is precious indeed to hear of Christ without; but it is more precious to feel Him within; where the wisdom of our Saviour, his love, his riches, his treasures of life, and the glory of his kingdom, and order of his family, and food of his children and of his servants, are witnessed and revealed on his holy mountain; where He makes the feast of fat things to his, where the bread and wine of the kingdom is eaten and drunk abundantly, and the streams of the river of his own pleasures water his garden and refresh his heritage.

I have looked over all the scriptures quoted by thee, and find not one of them proving the thing thou assertest; that is, attributing redemption properly to the manhood, and consequently improperly, in the second place, only as an assistant, to the Spirit and life of the Godhead. But if thou wouldst rightly distinguish, it were more proper to make the Word (or Life, which was in the beginning) the agent, which did all; and that body which the Father prepared and sanctified, the form of a servant or garment, in and through which the life, being clothed with it, did act. Now, the Jews did disdain Christ, as a man, in that his low appearance; therefore is the glory still given to "the man Christ Jesus;" but not to take the honor from the Son, who was God, and who saved by his Godhead, by the life, virtue, and power thereof. "I, and beside I, am the Lord," saith Jehovah, "and beside me there is no Saviour." The Word eternal, which made all, redeemeth all that are redeemed: that body of flesh that wherein He appeared. And so what He did in it was attributed to his manhood (and the man Christ Jesus did all that is attributed to Him in the Scriptures), but not in the first place:—thus speak for thy sake, and sometimes, upon necessity, to help to scatter the darkness which is seated in men's minds in this particular, which is very gross; many men having heaped upon themselves dark mountains, from their own imaginings and conceivings, upon which they stumble; and so reading the Scriptures out of the pure life wherein they were written, they gather not the true food, but food of their own imagining and inventing therefrom; and so their table becomes their snare.

And whereas thou chargest as with making Christ only a pattern, not a Saviour;—indeed, it is not so in God's sight; for we own Christ to be a Saviour; but we lay the main stress upon the life, which took upon it the manhood. And that life, wherever it appears, is of a saving nature, and doth save: the least measure of it is of the nature of the rock, and He proves a rock to them that feel Him, and whose minds are staid upon Him. Yet none, in the measure of this life, can deny the appearance of the fulness of life in that body of flesh, and what He did therein towards the redemption and salvation of mankind.

O pure, spotless Lamb of God! how precious! who thy sacrifice in the eye of the Father! how acceptable a ransom for all mankind! For in the free, full, and universal love of the Father, "He tasted death for every man." I. P.

Additional Advice.

Plainness.—We are called with a high and holy calling, to show forth in conduct and conversation, the purity which the gospel dispensation demands, and no desire for change, or any pressed increase of light and knowledge, can warrant our forsaking that path of self-denial and simplicity, into which the Lord gathered our forefathers, and still leads those among us who are faithful to his call. Those testimonies are a hedge about us, and a disengagement of them, will lay our members more open to the inroads of temptation, and tend to destroy the useful influence which the Society has had in the world. We would affectionately beseech parents and children, to come more entirely under "the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom," said the Apostle, "I am crucified unto the world, and the world unto me." Then they would be enabled to "glorify God in their body, and in their spirit which are his."

For our dear young Friends we feel much sympathy, and a strong desire that nothing may lead them away from the footsteps of Christ's companions; but that they may submit cheerfully to the gentle intimations and restraints of his Divine Spirit in their own hearts, who, as they resign all into his hand, will make his yoke easy and his burthen light, and give them that peace which passeth all understanding, and which no earthly thing can give or take away.—1859.

We are sensible of the proneness of the human heart to rest in an outside profession of religion, and we would not give an undue prominence to those of our testimonies which render as peculiar in language, dress and manners, but we believe that they have their origin in the same scriptural and spiritual views of vital Christianity from which our doctrines spring; that their consistent maintenance has had an important influence in keeping us together as a people, and in promoting the spread of our principles in the world at large. The three are closely connected with each other, and the abandonment of one, weakens our hands for the maintenance of the others. We would therefore affectionately impress upon our beloved fellow-members, the faithful support of them all, as parts of that consistent system of faith and practice which the great Head of the church has laid upon us, seeking to Him for grace and strength to bear them in singleness of heart for his name and Truth's sake. Parents and others, who have the care of children, having come under the yoke of Christ themselves, will find it their religious duty to keep them to plainness of dress and simplicity of manners; accustoming them to the regular attendance of all our religious meetings, instructing them in the truths recorded in the Holy Scriptures, and watching for suitable opportunities to turn their attention to the still small voice of their Saviour, and the necessity of obeying its monitions, in order to experience a change of heart, and inculcating the duty of their endeavoring to draw near with loving hearts to their Father in Heaven.—1872.

Married Without Shoes.—About twenty years ago a smart young fellow named Johnson, in the wilds of the Cheat Mountains, in West Virginia, made up his mind to be married.

"But you have not a penny," remonstrated his friends.

"I have two hands. A man was given two hands, one to scratch for himself, the other for his wife," he said.

On the day of the wedding Johnson appeared in a whole coat and trousers, but bare-footed.

"This is hardly decent," said the clergyman. "I will lend you a pair of shoes."

"No," said Johnson. "When I can buy shoes I will wear them—not before."

And he stood up to be married without any thought of his feet.

The same sturdy directness showed itself in his future course. What he had not money to pay for he did without. He hired himself to a farmer for a year's work. With the money he saved he bought a couple of acres of timberland and a pair of sheep, built himself a hut, and went to work on his ground.

His sheep increased; as time flew by he bought more; then he sold off the cheaper kinds and invested in Southdown and French Merino. His neighbors tried by turns raising cattle, horses, or gave their attention to experimental farming.

Johnson, having once found out that sheep-raising in his district brought a handsome profit, stuck to it. He had that shrewdness in seeing the best way, and that dogged persistence in following it, which are the elements of success.

Stock buyers from the Eastern market found that Johnson's fleeces were the finest and his mutton the sweetest on the Cheat. He never allowed their reputation to fail—the end of which course is that the man who married barefooted is now worth a large property.

The story is an absolutely true one.—Selected.

A Strange Funeral Sermon.—The deceased had long been renowned throughout that part of the country for his wickedness. His intellectual abilities were of no mean order; his property was considerable, and he had belonged to a highly respectable family—advantages which he used most assiduously in the service of his master. By the practice of every kind of dissipation he had achieved an evil notoriety, and gloried in being considered the most fascinating and dangerous rascal in the country. This being so, his associates resolved upon giving him a funeral worthy of his reputation.

As one means of insuring this, they invited one of the most eminent Presbyterian ministers in the region to deliver the funeral discourse. To the surprise of many, after some little hesitation, he consented. On the day and at the hour appointed the [meeting-house] was crowded to overflowing by an assembly composed of the relatives, friends, and companions of the deceased, together with a mixed multitude drawn from far and near by curiosity to hear what such a minister could find to say of such a man.

Punctual to the moment the service began. The announcement of the text fell like a clap of thunder upon the assembly. It was from Luke xvi. 23: "And in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." The sermon was a most pungent and powerful exhibition of the character, course, and end of a wicked man. It held the assembly spell-bound to the very last word; but there was in it not a single direct allusion to the person whose obsequies they had come there to celebrate.

In silence and in deep solemnity the congregation dispersed after the sermon was finished. Some were indignant, but the attempt to excite odium against the preacher was a failure. It was generally thought that in what he had done he was governed by a sense of duty. He was said to have stated afterward that when he was invited to preach on that occasion he had determined to decline, but, in answer to prayer, received a message, which he believed to be from God, "Go and preach the preaching that I bid thee."—Presbyterian.

For "The Friend."

Whither are we going?

The question which forms the caption to this article was forcibly brought to mind on receiving 7th month's number of the British Friend containing a lengthy account of Ackworth School Centenary. I was deeply pained to find in the conduct of the proceedings on that occasion, such a grievous departure from the ancient practices of our Society; it appears as one of the noticeable features, that staging of a so-called sacred and profane character was indulged in, not only by the scholars but by the elder Friends present. It is sad to think that an Institution which no doubt had its origin in the ordering of Divine Truth, should now furnish an example of setting at naught one of our testimonies—that against vocal music. The tendency of this and other departures is to lead to an entire abandonment of our well known and long cherished testimony against the adoption of the spirit and customs of the people of the world.

But what can we expect in this day of degeneracy, when many of our would be Friends on both sides of the Atlantic, holding the highest positions in Society, have introduced into their houses and families musical instruments and singing, thus educating their children and those under their care, in the vain manners and frivolities so prevalent in the present day. And now we find in the very country whence emanated the valiant worthies of olden time, those deeply tried ones, who had to suffer and sacrifice so much in defence of precious principles and testimonies, many of our members endeavoring to trample them under foot. Is the cross of Christ too heavy for these to bear? Has the good, old, safe way become too strait and narrow? Will they permit themselves and those around them to be allured into the broad way that leadeth down to the chambers of death, whither so many go to seek worldly ease and enjoyment?

I fear many in this day are stifling the still small voice, which ever has and ever will speak clearly and intelligibly to the inward ear of the soul, the blessed words of warning and instruction, "this is the way, walk ye in it." Oh that we may return to the good "old paths," and there find true rest and safety. Let those who are still endeavoring to be faithful in the maintenance of our distinguishing views, lift up their voices boldly against these weakening hurtful tendencies: these will often have to weep as it were between the porch and the altar, uttering the language of the prophet, "Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach."

Surely our Society in many parts of the world presents a humiliating and deplorable spectacle, and well may we exclaim, "how have the mighty fallen!" J. BELL.

"2d mo. 1857. The importance of watchfulness as thou observest of thyself, has also felt to me as particularly needful and impressive—the place of watching is the place of waiting and hoping, and is therefore an evidence to those thus engaged, that they are in Him who is 'the way'; and what can we ask more than to feel that 'we through the spirit wait,' a condition as needful as to receive what we wait for, and as much blessed to those who maintain it with patience; but I find much to learn and much to combat with in preserving the mind in this condition; so much listlessness, wandering thoughts, vain curiosity, and temptations of various kinds, though not perhaps gross, yet such as an artificial enemy knows are adapted to our weakness, and available to his designs, comparable to the 'little foxes' that spoil the precious vine."

"9th mo. 1865. We hear that our dear friend Henry Cope is deceased, and to be buried to-day. He expressed in the Yearly Meeting some apprehension that he should not attend another, and I dare say thou remembers in the Select Meeting how earnest he was in recommending unaffected simplicity in all our conduct and intercourse one with another; so consistent it seemed with his own character. I hope the loss of such dear friends will be in some degree compensated by an increase of devotion on the part of those who are left; do we not find such events bring an increase of concern upon the church, that we who are left may be enabled to fill up the breach?"

"* * * The circumstance alluded to must have been very confirming to thy mind. But how often do we find that the manna of to-day does not serve to live upon to-morrow. We think in times of fervor that we will not yield to discouragement again, and yet we may very soon find all dependence upon the past seems to be removed, and we left to feel that of ourselves we can indeed do nothing; at such times it may be good to remember that the seed sown in weakness will be raised in power, as we abide with it all the appointed time, endeavoring to keep low with the lowly seed, and exercised to have a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man."

"That we cannot be happy without some evidence that the dear Master is with us, must be because we do love Him and his appearance, though it may be sometimes as with the reproofs of instruction. We love the light, and I have no doubt many of us greatly desire to walk in it, and to have our deeds judged and our hearts searched by it. Such we trust will not be permitted to be carried very wide apart in their pilgrimage journey."

The luxury of luxuries is that of doing good.

A Sinking Tender Appeal.

"And now, whilst my heart is bearing towards the isles afar off, the same constraining love which wrought the willingness to leave all for my gracious Lord's sake and his gospel's, extends its binding influence to all my dear brethren and sisters, of every age and of every class, wherever situated, and however circumstanced; desiring in tender and affectionate solicitude, that they may be found steadfastly following the footsteps of those honored and worthy predecessors in the same religious profession with ourselves, who have long since rested from their labors, and whose memorial is on high; who bore the burden and heat of a day of deep suffering, in the faithful discharge of their duty, for the support of those principles in their original purity and brightness, which have been transmitted to us. If any should feel sensible of having fallen short in this important work, let me in the tenderest love encourage such to be willing to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, even to the state of little children; and to turn inward to the pure, unflattering witness, which cannot deceive nor be deceived; to be willing to enter into a diligent and heart-felt search, and patiently and impartially examine how far those indispensable conditions are submitted to on their part, without which none can be followers of the meek and lowly Jesus. Where is that self-denial and the daily cross He first enjoined? Are we denying ourselves those gratifications of time and ease, which cherish and keep alive in us the evil propensities of fallen nature, that separate man from his Maker, and like the little foxes which spoil the tender vines, designed in richest mercy to bud, blossom, and bring forth fruit, lastingly to remain to the praise and glory of the great Husbandman? Without faithfulness, there will be no fruitfulness. It is not giving up or forsaking this or that little thing, to part with which is little or no sacrifice or privation, that will suffice; a full surrender of the whole will in all things, must be made to Him, whose sovereign right it is to rule and reign in our hearts. Let none plead for disobedience in these little things, on the ground of their being such; for if such they really are, they are the more easily dispensed with, and not worth retaining; and a tenacity in wishing to preserve them, assuredly indicates, that they have more place in our affections than perhaps we are aware of. He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that taketh not his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me."—Daniel Wheeler, just before leaving England for the Islands of the South Sea.

It is a precious thing, for every particular "to know the right arm of the Lord, which brings salvation," and to witness "a sitting down at his right hand," where the sheep stand, where the rivers of pleasures run softly, and to drink of the same, which refresheth the whole city of God. To feel this arm of the Lord, and to know it revealed, and to come to a sitting down at his right hand, is the end, sum and substance of the Christian religion; such know salvation for walls and bulwarks, and are as Mount Zion, which cannot be moved.—W. Sheven.

THE YOUNG PILGRIM'S HYMN.
"My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth."—
Jer. iii. 4.

Gracious Lord, do Thou uphold us
By Thy mighty Spirit's power;
Let thy loving arm unfold us,
Keep us safe from hour to hour.
In Thy presence humbly bending,
We would seek Thy grace divine;
Hear Thy children's cry ascending,
Keep us Lord forever thine.

Onward through life's journey lead us,
Waters from the Rock command us;
With the Bread of heaven feed us
Till we reach the promised land.
With a price Thy love has won us,
Make our foes their grasp resign,
Set Thy seal anew upon us,
We are safe if we are Thine.

From the tempter's snare appalling
Be thyself our constant guard,
Oh! preserve our feet from falling,
Guided by thy holy word.
Ah, Lord Jesus! be thy passion,
By thy blood poured forth like wine,
By the night of thy salvation,
Hold us fast for we are Thine.

What tho' clouds should early gather,
Darkly o'er our summer skies;
Thou wilt aid us, oh, our Father!
Thou wilt for our help arise.
Blessed be these conditions,
We may hear Thy voice divine
Whisper, e'er we reach the river,
"Fear thou not, for thou art mine!"

"DO WE WELL TO MOURN?"

Yes, grieve! it can be no offence to Him
Who made us sensible of sin to know;
The hand that takes the cup filled to the brim,
May well with trembling make it overflow.
Who sends us sorrow means it should be felt;
Who gave us tears would surely have them shed;
And metal that the "furnace" doth not melt,
May yet be hardened all the more instead.

Where love abounded, will the grief abound.
To check our grief is but to chide our love;
With withered leaves the more bestrewed the ground,
The fuller that the rose hath bloomed above!
Yes, grieve! 'tis nature's—that is, God's—behest,
If what is nature called is will divine;
Who fain would grieve not cannot know how best
It is to sorrow and yet not repine.

BIRDS.

BY C. W. THOMPSON.

Ye birds that fly through the fields of air,
What lessons of wisdom and truth ye bear;
Ye would teach us our souls from earth to rise,
Ye would bid us its grovelling scenes despise,
Ye would tell us that all its pursuits are vain,
That pleasure is the luxury which men disdain,
That its bliss is touched with a poisoning leaven,
Ye would teach us to fix our aim on Heaven.

Beautiful birds of the azure wing,
Bright creatures that come with the voice of Spring;
We see you arrayed in the hues of the morn,
Yet ye dream not of pride, and ye wist not of scorn!
Thou raven show thy splendor around you glow,
That please not the beauty which men bestow;
Oh! what a lesson for glory are ye,
How ye preach of the grace of humility.

Swift birds that skim o'er the stormy deep,
Who steadily onward your journey keep,
Who neither for rest nor slumber stay,
But press still forward, by night or day,—
And in your unvarying course are seen to fly
Beneath the clear and the clouded sky;
Oh! may we without delay, like you,
The path of duty and right pursue.

"The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us,"
That came to the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

Selected.

Sweet birds that breathe the spirit of song,
And surround Heaven's gate in melodious throng,
Who rise with the earliest beams of day,
Your morning tribute of thanks to pay,
You remind us that we alike should raise
The voice of devotion and song of praise;
There's something about you that points on high,
Ye beautiful tenants of earth and sky.

THE INWARD JUDGE.

The following is translated from the "Institutes of Mann," by JOHN G. WHITTIER.

"The soul itself its awful witness is;
Say not in evil doing, 'No one sees,
And so offend no conscience so within,
Whose ear can hear the silences of sin,
Ere they find voice, whose eyes unseeing see
The secret motions of iniquity;
Nor in thy folly say, 'I am alone.'
For, seated in thy heart as on a throne,
The ancient Judge and Witness liveth still,
To note thy act and thoughts; and as thy ill
Or good goes from thee, far beyond thy reach,
The solemn Doomsman's seal is set on each."

"For The Friend"

I went the next morning to the Council House. They were late in gathering; my mind continued to be much favored. I staid most of the forenoon in Johnson Jamison's. The interpreter went down to Little Valley the evening before, and did not get back in time for me to speak to them that day. I felt somewhat disappointed and little discouraged. I queried with some of them if I could have a chance to speak to them the next day. I spent a part of the time in the council house, where my mind seemed clothed with a concern to do what was required of me, and a concern for the improvement of the Indians in the Christian religion, and I hope my spirit was profitably exercised in secret prayer for them. Oh! may a kind and merciful Master hear my prayers and accept the feeble efforts to do what I have thought required of me; may it glorify his great and excellent name who is forever worthy. I went back to Walter Thorp's and staid that night, feeling pretty comfortable; and returned to the Council House next morning. I felt weakness and fears, when the time came (that) they were prepared to hear me, I was informed. I commenced to speak; in a short time there came in some young white men; it seemed as if all was taken from me; I felt tried, and desisted. I went to them and requested them to withdraw until I was done speaking; without hesitation, and in a becoming manner (they) did so. I felt much relieved. After appearing in supplication, I spoke some more to them on the subject of religion, and requested them not to suffer themselves to be prejudiced against the Christian religion, and repeated the passage where our Saviour says: "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." Mark viii. 38. After starting home I felt distressed that I was not able to do more; perhaps it was an improper spirit, in part, that caused those distressed feelings, as I think I did not feel any condemnation. It is enough that the servant does the will of his allwise and merciful Master. Oh! that proud aspiring self may be laid low, and that all that is within may glorify the Lord, and that the strength of mind and body be spent in that good work.

The next week, perhaps the 6th of 2d month, I went up to Cold Spring where the Indians (were) holding their new year's meeting. I requested an opportunity to speak to them when assembled, which the managers consented to. When they got together and the opportunity offered for me, a number of white people came to the council house. I became discouraged, and concluded to wait until the next day. As I returned home that evening, oh! the distress I was in—it seemed as if there was almost an insupportable weight upon me. I then thought I would not flinch from performing my duty through fear of man, if I could have another opportunity. I went the next day, three white men came, and I feared I was going to have another trial. I felt a strong wish these men might withdraw, they all did except one, whose presence did not daunt me much; there was quite a large collection of Indian women and a good many men; I was favored with an open satisfactory time; my interpreter seemed as though he was favored to feel some interest in what he interpreted, and I thought got along well; Gov. Blacksnake expressed his satisfaction with what I said. I left them truly thankful that I had been favored to feel such a strong interest in their spiritual welfare, and language to express my feelings.

2d mo. 12th. I had a very satisfactory opportunity with John Spencer and his wife; also with Benjamin Williams' wife and her brother. Margaret once appeared to be a fine Christian woman, but is now quite intemperate. I hope this day (she) was favored to feel in a degree sensible of her situation. Benjamin was from home.

13th. Visited Samuel Patterson and wife—a family for whom I have felt much interested.

[The foregoing appears to be the last entry made by our friend in his diary whilst residing at Tunesassa. He returned to his pleasant home, near the Brandywine, in Chester Co., shortly afterwards, and resumed his former occupation of farming. There has not been found among his papers any memorandums of his exercises and engagements until 1857, when they appear to have been resumed.]

Religious Items, &c.

The New Jersey Methodist Conference passed resolutions against the efforts now used to set aside the laws of the State in regard to the observance of the First day of the week, in which they say, they regard such efforts whether made by "our native citizens or those of foreign birth, as a direct attack upon the very principles from which have sprung the present greatness and prosperity of the nation." They protest also against the tendency of Corporations to do their ordinary business, such as the running of freight and passenger trains on that day. On behalf of the temperance cause they say, "Liquor-selling is an immoral business." "Legislators who vote at the bidding of the liquor-traffic, and refuse to hear the voice of the moral and religious public, are virtually in league with the liquor-dealers, and equally with them deserve the scorn of good men and women;" and "the voters who send such men to the legislature are responsible. It is time for men to vote as they pray, and vote for good men only, and men pledged on the side of temperance." They remind their readers, that the renting of property for the purpose of liquor selling, and the signing of applications for license are violations of the Methodist Discipline. In reference to the camp-meeting grounds gotten up for the purpose of private speculation but with the name of Methodist attached, yet not under the control of the New Jersey or any other Conference, they disclaim any responsibility, financially or otherwise, and state that "fishing, hunting, boating, equipot, financing and money-making is no part of the object of a Methodist Camp-meeting."

The Children.—A writer in the Christian Standard treats of the causes which lead in these days a larger proportion of the children of Methodists to leave the denomination of their parents, than was formerly the case. He says that in early times most Methodists were poor, and were necessarily closely allied in all associate efforts to promote the extension of their system. Hence the children were brought into close contact with their various meetings, and lived as it were in the atmosphere of Methodism. It naturally resulted from this, that as they grew up they united with the Society to which they had become attached.

Roman Catholicism.—The Christian Advocate while admitting that many Roman Catholics are devout Christians, who look through all ceremonies and material representations, to Divine realities, and worship God in spirit and truth, yet argues that the genius and tendencies of the system are idolatrous.

It draws this conclusion from the introduction into their places of worship of images of Christ, the Virgin Mary and various saints, to which acts of worship are performed; and from the invocations addressed to Mary and the saints.

In illustration of the homage rendered to the Virgin Mary, it quotes an inscription on a church building at Rome—"Let us come to the throne of the Virgin Mary, that we may find grace to help in time of need." Pope Pius IX. erected a pillar in commemoration of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, on which the prophets are represented as casting their crowns before the Virgin and saying, "Thou art worthy: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood." In a child's paper, approved by eight Catholic prelates, are the following sentences—"The musical voices of the happy children singing hymns to the blessed Mother floated on the breeze, and up to the mother's throne in heaven." "Our most gracious Queen heard the prayers of her sweet little subjects, and restored her [a child's] beloved mother. Little children, ever pray to the blessed Virgin, and always serve and honor her. Solemnly consecrate yourselves to the service of the blessed Virgin—the refuge of sinners."

The Scripture records represent Mary as a good woman, and highly favored of the Lord, who was enabled to use the impressive language, "My Spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour;" but to offer worship to her, or to any other creature, is offensive in the Divine sight, for God alone is the true object of worship, and besides Him there is no Saviour.

Christ's Rule in British India.—The Indian Daily News gives in full a lecture delivered by a native Hindu, to an audience largely made up of natives, in which, though he is not himself a Christian, he says, "that Christian ideas and Christian institutions are taking root on all sides in India." And then he adds the remarkable declaration, "Christ rules in British India—and not the British Government."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Shell Beds of Clatsop Beach, Oregon.—The coast of the Pacific ocean, some distance below the mouth of the Columbia and above, even to the colder latitudes, show, in its shell mounds or beds, evidences of a dense population that must have long ago lived and thrived on the bounteous sea-food that the ocean provides. Up the little streams and inlets may these beds also be found, but not of the immense proportions found on this ocean beach.

Recently, while swimming at the sea-side house at Clatsop, my attention was drawn to the material with which the roads were being macadamized; shells of oyster and clam predominated, but the rather frequent sight of human bones and skulls excited my curiosity. Following the wagons, I found my way to the pits from which this dump was taken. The excavation showed a depth from five to six feet of this debris, and the original dirt strata had not yet been reached.

I stood by the wall of this seemingly unlimited bed, and with a stick dug into the bank, finding shells of various kind, some of which are not now found on this coast, all bearing evidences of having been used for food, sometimes calcined; also the bones and vertebrae of fish, bones of birds, deer, and other animals, and among them the bones of the human body, sometimes the tiny rib of a little child, and sometimes the arm bones or the shoulder blade of an adult; skulls, too, were not infrequent. The horrible suspicion of cannibalism suggested itself to my mind. These remains were scattered indiscriminately, just as one might imagine the garbage of a house might be thrown day by day and so accumulate in a heap, while earth and stones were mixed with the bones. Of the length of this bed I have no knowledge, and can only imagine the age. It was in shore half a mile and must have, in ancient times, been the beach proper.

Ages have passed since these wild people encamped by the booming waves, for immense old firs, five and six feet in diameter, are growing over the prostrate giant trees that preceded them. I saw no implements of any sort nor did I hear of any being found in these beds, though they might be easily overlooked, as no one had ever before exhibited any interest or curiosity in the matter.—H. B. Clarke in The American Antiquarian.

Fly-catching Rat.—In the show window of a trunk store in Hartford, Conn., an interesting sight may be witnessed every evening in an old gray rat catching flies upon the inner surface of the glass. He trots around among the satchels and travelling bags, and wherever he sees a fly upon the glass or the goods he goes after it with a nimbleness and dexterity which secure uniform success. His operations, says the Hartford Post, are often continued while several persons are watching him from the sidewalk, of whose presence and attention he seems quite oblivious. In the opposite window are spread several sheets of sticky fly paper, where few or many of the insects are struggling, who would apparently be easy prey for the voracious and venerable rat, yet he appears to understand that the sticky paper is suspicious, and avoids it, attending strictly to business in his own department.

The Borax Mines of Nevada.—In Esmeraldo Co., Nevada, some four years ago, a young man was prospecting for gold and silver mines. While thus engaged, traversing mountains, canons, and valleys on horseback, he saw, in a valley known as Teel's Marsh, what appeared to be a vast bed of white sand, resembling dry sea foam. The appearance was so novel and singular that he dismounted and descended to prospect the object. Upon arriving at the place, he found it to be the bed of a dry lagoon, with the appearance of having been dry for centuries. Walking cautiously over the place, he found the surface to be soft and clayey, and often sunk ankle deep. After an examination of the curious clayey deposit, he put several handfuls into his pockets, mounted his horse, and returned across the mountains to his home in Columbus. There, he handed the contents of his pockets to an assayer, who, after analysis, pronounced it the richest sample of borax he had ever seen. This fact at once created great excitement, and no little expense attended the necessary claiming, &c., on the part of the discoverer. It soon proved to be an enormous lagoon or deposit of crude borax, two and-a-half miles wide, and five or six in length. The result is, that in the course of three or four years, the discoverer has perfected an immense establishment, and is producing an enormous quantity of a chemically pure article of borax.

An Elephant in Court.—It is not often that an elephant is brought into court to give evidence in his own favor, even in these days of justice to dumb animals. But this was done in an action yesterday against the proprietor of the Alexandria Palace. The action was brought on the ground that an elephant belonging to the defendants had frightened the plaintiff's pony and occasioned a dangerous accident. It seemed that the elephant came out suddenly from an enclosure, and the pony, not being accustomed to elephants, ran away. About this there was no dispute. The only question at issue was carelessness; and the elephant, who stood but 4 feet 6 inches high, showed himself to be such a peaceful, tractable animal when he came into court that it was clear no blame attached to him. After this nothing remained but to compromise the case; and at the suggestion of Baron Pollock the elephant's apology was accepted, and the plaintiff was compensated for the damage he had sustained by his owner.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Smart Children.—A parent speaking of the health of his children, says, in the Journal of Health, "Two things were in their favor, they were born of healthy parents, and hadn't much sense; of which latter I have always felt particularly glad, in view of the fact, that the "smarter" a child is, the brighter its intellect, the more certain it is to die early of brain disease; if not, the chances are that the intellect will wane early."

"My own personal observation bears me out in the saying, that persons of moderate mental calibre, of medium capacities, are most likely to live long, live healthfully, live happily and live successfully, whether as to making a comfortable living, or having a solid influence in society."

Loss of Appetite.—The true plan, especially with children, when the appetite is observed not to be so good as usual, is to restrict them to less than they are really inclined to. By thus diminishing the labor of the stomach, it has a chance to rest and recover its energy. A grand rule would this be for persons of all ages, but it takes a man of force of character to do this; the pampered, the self-indulgent, the undecided, feeble-minded folk are altogether inadequate to such a feat of moral courage.—Id.

Sewers vs. Health.—The London Medical Times advises those looking for a residence:—"Take no rooms in the neighborhood of a principal sewer, because it is an established fact that greater mortality and more sickness exist on the line of great sewers than in any other place, and this is caused by the dangerous air escaping from the air-holes and other crevices."—"These gases in a concentrated form produce instantaneous death. In a statistical table compiled by Chief Engineer Conrad, in Holland, it is shown that the mortality in one thousand inhabitants is thirty-five, and that twenty out of this number die of diseases which have their origin solely by inhaling impure air and the use of impure water."

Insect Destroyers.—"I never supposed that bats were of much importance in the economy of nature," said I, carelessly.

"Indeed they are of great importance," replied Percival; "not only beetles are eaten by them, but great numbers of moths. As I said before the bats are actively at work at night; in the day-time multitudes of birds and quadrupeds and predatory insects are destroying the insect pests. The birds are especially active in this work, and apparently in order that it may be more thoroughly done, different races of the feathered tribes have been created, each with its own particular sphere. The black birds, thrushes and larks devour the insects which infest the grass crops and other vegetations near the ground; the creepers, titmice and others eat the insects which are found on the limbs and bark of trees both in the larval and perfect forms; the wood-peckers destroy the borers in the wood of trees; while the warblers, cuckoos and orioles capture the insects and caterpillars in the foliage. The fly-catchers are busy through the day; and the night hawks and whip-poor-wills in the night capture the flying insects near the earth; while the swallows are on the wing from daylight until dark, securing those insects that have escaped their other enemies.—Scribner.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 16, 1879.

Several weeks have elapsed since we learned that a separation had taken place in Spring River Quarterly Meeting, Kansas. Before noticing the occurrence in our columns we desired fuller information as to the causes that led to it, and the circumstances attending it, than we were then in our possession. We have now received a printed "Testimony," issued by the Friends who took part in the movement, and have been permitted to examine several letters written by different Friends in Kansas which refer to the event, and throw some light on the motives which led to the taking of such a serious and responsible step.

From these it is evident, that the fundamental cause of this disruption is the departure from the principles and practices of the Society, which has been gradually spreading in our limits. The effect of such departure is necessarily to destroy the bond which unites together the members of the body. For those who are convinced of the truth of our doctrines, and believe it part of the mission of our branch of the Church to spread them in our world so as thereby to promote the growth of the Redeemer's Kingdom amongst men, cannot receive as fellow-laborers those whose teaching tends to overthrow what they regard as among the fundamental truths of the Gospel. In this respect how can "two walk together unless they are agreed?" though they may maintain feelings of friendship towards those who differ from them, and may earnestly desire that their eyes may be opened to see the truth.

We have no hope that the progress of these distressing divisions within our borders will be stayed, unless there be a return to first principles; and the Lord by his omnipotent power again move on the hearts of the people, enabling them to see the spiritual nature of true religion, causing them to feel their need of being freed from the dominion of sin, taking up the cross of Christ, and leading them to that patient indwelling with his Spirit, in which strength is given to bear the refining judgments of the Lord, and to faithfully follow their holy Leader in the forsaking of all unrighteousness.

We have seen much of the evils that flow from separations in our own and other religious societies,—the loss of strength in the church, the cultivation of a spirit of fault-finding, the turning of the people's attention from the work of grace in their own hearts to the doings of others, the destruction of the harmony of neighborhoods, and the stumbling effect on the young and inexperienced. Believing that the responsibility for these evils lies in the first place on the heads of those who depart from those doctrines a foundation of which Robert Barclay says is the bond of our being joined together as one people, we view with sorrow and anxious concern the many obvious departures from our ancient standard, now so conspicuously observable. And we sincerely desire the encouragement of all our members in holding fast to the principles and practices of Friends, and, where there is need for it, in contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. On the maintenance of those principles and practices, depends, we believe, our existence as a Society of Friends. If we depart from them, the crown will be taken from our heads, and given to others whom the Lord will raise up to proclaim the truths of his everlasting Gospel.

We also believe there is need for great caution, that those who are brought into difficulties through their honest efforts to maintain the truth, should guard well their own spirits, and not rashly take important steps, impelled thereto in any measure by personal feeling, overheated zeal, or any secondary or improper motive. "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," and it is "His works alone that praise Him." If we "acknowledge God in all our ways," and move only under his direction, we may hope for a blessing to rest upon our efforts in his cause, which we cannot expect to be bestowed upon laborers that spring from a lower source.

As to the motives which operated in the present case, we will permit those concerned to speak for themselves. A letter dated 7th

no. 9th, from one of these, who has been esteemed as a solid, settled Friend, says:—"We have given up all hopes of the majority of the Ministers, and many appointed Elders, and many others, ever returning to primitive principles, or in other words, our distinguishing views as a Society, and which is becoming more and more apparent in many particulars; and under a solemn and saddening sense of the presence of these things in many meetings hereaway, the members of our Monthly Meeting held a conference to deliberate on the tried condition of Society, and whilst waiting for Divine guidance, it appeared plain to us that we would have to either drift into the current into which Society was running, or we must come out of the confusion, and accordingly last Seventh-day was a week there were two Quarterly Meetings held, both claiming to be Friends."

A letter from another Friend after referring to some things of an unsatisfactory character in the Quarterly Meeting for business, says:—"Friends were advised to bear all patiently, which was done, and when they read the closing minute, a Friend stood up and enumerated some of the difficulties that had arisen in the Society, inviting all who wished to endeavor to faithfully maintain all our doctrines and practices to remain in the house." Those who remained in accordance with this invitation, appointed a clerk, and proceeded to transact business as a Quarterly Meeting.

A letter from a third Friend, who was present, though not a member of that Quarterly Meeting, and who did not meet with those who thus remained after the close of the first meeting, corroborates this information, and states that one of those active in this movement gave as a reason for the method pursued, that "they desired to avoid any real or apparent strife or confusion in the meeting," and he adds, "the whole affair was managed very quietly, without words of bitterness or disturbance."

The printed "Testimony" before referred to, gives no information as to the proceedings above related, but speaks of the departures and innovations which led to those proceedings. We propose in our next number to print such portions of this as seem necessary to give our readers a full understanding of the case.

The Christian Worker of 7th inst. contains the following letter from Helen Balkwill, of England, who has been paying a religious visit in America, with the permission of her friends at home.

"I wish to inform Friends in America, through your columns, that I have recently freshly investigated the Holy Scriptures on the meaning of the outward rites of baptism and the Lord's supper, and that the conclusion I have arrived at is, that if regarded simply as memorial, and not in any sense sacramental, they are intended to hold a useful place in the outward Church until this dispensation is closed by the personal coming of the Lord Jesus according to prophecy. I do not wish to slight the convictions of those earnest Christians who two centuries ago led our forefathers out of the danger and error of a reliance upon these for salvation, nor the convictions of the great body of Friends who still consider its disuse the best remedy for abuse, but I wish to make public my own personal conviction that a middle course is possible and right, and my belief that Jesus intended his words, 'This do in remembrance of me,' to be applied not only to those then with him at the table, but to the Christian churches established through their instrumentality everywhere. Water baptism I regard as also intended to be the lasting and ordinary mode of introduction into the outward Church, as conversion introduces into the true and invisible church, (though having nothing of a saving character in it.)

"Having communicated these views, as in duty bound to my friends in England, it is their wish that I should close my work in America as speedily as possible and return home. To their authority I cheerfully submit, desiring to remain a member of a church to which I am bound by innumerable ties, and trusting that among Friends I may still be permitted, however feebly, to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ in free and full salvation.

"Through your columns I desire to say farewell to all my dear friends in America in the love of Jesus, and to assure them that the same love exists between myself and those Friends across the ocean who have felt that their responsible position and duty to the Society demanded a recall which it has pained them to issue.

"In Christian love, HELEN BALKWILL.
Adrian, Michigan, Seventh mo. 29, 1879."

It is a satisfaction that Friends in England have recalled one, who by her own admission, is not prepared fully to unite with the Society in the views it has always held as to the fulfillment of all rites by the coming of Christ, and the utility of their continued observance in the Christian Church. We respect the honesty and openness which mark her letter; but it is plainly improper for such to be commissioned for service as representing the Society of Friends.

We believe there is need of much greater care in many places than is now exercised as to granting certificates for religious labor to persons who are not fully settled in the doctrines of Friends. The visits of such travelers often cause much distress and exercise of mind to true Friends, who see that tares are mixed with the seed they are sowing.

The commencement of a new volume seems a suitable time to call the attention of our subscribers, and of others interested in our Journal, to the good that may be accomplished by increasing its circulation.

We believe the weekly visits to our families of a sheet, which revives in our memory the various doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, presenting them in different points of view, as the minds of the different writers are impressed with a concern for their maintenance and extension; and which furnishes illustrations of the practical workings of these principles, or rather of the blessed results of obedience to the Divine Will, which is the foundation of all religion; are of value in confirming the faith of its readers in the verity of those spiritual views which were taught to mankind by our Saviour and his apostles, and were opened to the minds of the early members of this Society by the Holy Spirit, which our Saviour told his disciples should bring all things to their remembrance. And we think the reading of such accounts and statements of doctrine is often blessed by stimulating the reader to greater earnestness and faithfulness in the pursuit of the one thing needful. While there is no substitute for the work of the Holy Spirit immediately operating on the heart of man, through which alone we come to partake of the salvation which is by Christ, yet the pure mind may, through the Divine blessing, be stirred up by secondary means, and the earnest Christian will thankfully avail himself of such helps to spiritual progress as are within his reach.

We believe some of our members may be instrumental in doing good, by encouraging or assisting some who are not now subscribers to "The Friend," in introducing our paper into their families.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Pennsylvania Railroad propose transferring their main passenger depot in this city, from West Philadelphia to Fifteenth and Market streets, by constructing a new bridge across the Schuylkill, and an elevated railroad from it to the new depot, along Filbert St. The company has purchased a large number of properties along the route, and when the purchases are completed, there will be sufficient area for a roadway of nine tracks. The grade of the road to be 17 feet higher than the street grade. The entire space between Sixteenth and Merrick, and Market and Filbert streets is to be devoted to terminal purposes, and upon it will be constructed an immense passenger and freight depot. The landing for passengers will be upon the second floor, while the freight cars will be lowered by a hydraulic apparatus to the street line, the cars also being shifted by transfer table, if desirable. The cost of the contemplated improvements is estimated to be above $2,000,000.

The Free Sanitarium at Point Air, is on the southern end of Windmill Island, in the Delaware river, opposite Philadelphia. Tickets are given to the deserving poor, who are admitted to it. Men and their sick children are allowed entire freedom to wander about the island, and are supplied with a substantial meal at noon. To those requiring medical treatment, care and attention are gratuitously given. The daily average attendance is about 450. The Sanitarium is supported entirely by voluntary subscriptions.

Dr. Charles M. Cresson has recently devised an improved megascop, an instrument for examining and comparing documents where alterations or forgery is suspected, which promises to be very efficient. This instrument, the Philadelphia Inquirer says, has been successfully used in the examination of altered documents, and altered and counterfeited bank notes. In legal contests, where the merits of a case depend upon the genuineness of a particular signature, or that of an entire written document, the megascop, though dumb, is capable of giving strong evidence, and more reliable than the most consummate expert that ever took the stand. Placing the genuine and spurious documents side by side in the instrument, after placing the screen before the eyes of the jury, both documents are thrown upon it, so that the jury may decide for themselves which is the real and which is the counterfeit. The eloquence or ingenuity of counsel cannot disturb its truth.

During the first half of 1879, the income of the direct cable across the Atlantic was $438,550, and the net profit $235,705.

A bill reducing the rate of interest in the State of New York from 7 to 6 per cent, passed the Legislature last winter, has recently received the Governor's signature, and takes effect 1st mo. 1st, 1880.

One hundred and two natives of Sheffield, comprising twenty-two families and twenty single men, recently landed in New York, and are engaged in the manufacture of fine cutlery in Sheffield, and are expecting to engage in this business in a Connecticut workshop. Sheffield ranks first in the manufacture of fine knives and razors; the assigned reason for the excellent work that town does is the skill of the workmen, their own experience, and by the habit of transmitting from father to son the small secrets of the trade.

Sergeant Finney, of the Signal Service Corps, who left Washington about the 1st of 6th month to investigate the terribly destructive tornadoes which occurred in Kansas, Nebraska, and Missouri, on the 25th and 30th of 5th mo., reports there was a general storm area in Northern Kansas, southeastern Nebraska and northwestern Missouri, and that he discovered traces of eleven distinct tornadoes, all originating in one storm area.

The deaths in New York city, from 6th mo. 14th to 8th mo. 2nd, unnumbered 5,034, of which 2,841 were children under five years.

There were 326 deaths in Philadelphia during the past week. Of these 100 were from cholera infantum; consumption 41; convulsions 16; debility 11; scarlet fever 7; inflammation of the brain 14; of the lungs 10; stomach and bowels 12; old age 12; and paralysis 9.

Reports from Memphis indicate an increase of yellow fever. The number of cases daily reported number about twenty—the disease has declined epidemic. The Secretary of War has ordered 500 army tents to be forwarded for use of fever refugees in camp.

Markets.—Government Bonds, 65, 1881, 104½; 1882, 114 per cent, registered, 105½; do. coupon, 106½; 4s, 1907, 105.

Cotton, 11½ a 11¾ cts. per pound.

Petroleum—Crude 55 cts., and refined 65 cts. per gallon, in barrels. Lined oil, 64 65 cts. for Calcutta, and 62 63 cts. for American. Lard oil, 45 cts. Sperm, crude, 75 cts.; bleached winter, 92 95 cts. per gallon.

Flour—Minnesota extra, $5.25 to $5.87½; Penna. do., $4.87½ to $5.25; western do., do., $5.50 to $5.80; patent, $5.75 to $7.25.

Grain.—The market for wheat devoid of animation, but prices rather firm—red and amber quoted at $1.07 a $1.07 ½. Corn, 45 to 50 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw.—Prime timothy, 70 to 80 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 65 to 75 cts.; straw, 65 to 75 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle, 35 cts. for common, and 55 cts. per pound for fat. Cows, $2½ to $25 per head, as to quality. Sheep, 35 to 45 cts. per pound. Lambs, 4 to 6½ cts. per pound. Hogs, 5 to 5½ cts., as to condition.

FOREIGN.—At a recent meeting in London, John Bright severely criticised the conduct of the British Government in India, particularizing a recent act which was a direct insult to the people of that country in the name of the Government; a general disarming act, whose hardship was felt in those parts of the land where wild beasts are destructive to human life; and an income or license tax which reaches to the laborer or artisan whose income may not be over a few shillings per week.

It was also reported that Messrs. Mersey and Cheshire had done much damage to the crops in Lancashire and Ireland. Some loss of life is also reported.

Three thousand miners of Silverdale in North Staffordshire, have struck against an increase of hours of labor, and a reduction of 10 per cent. in their wages. A despatch to the Times, from Calcutta, dated on the 10th, reports that the cholera is still raging among the troops and natives of Candahar, and is spreading towards Herat. The Rumpia disaffection is spreading. The insurgents are badly armed but conduct guerilla warfare.

Information is received from South Africa, that a number of Zulu chiefs have surrendered; but the reports relating to the prospects of immediate peace are conflicting.

Official reports state that the grain in the south of France has been harvested in excellent condition, and that in the north and west a good average crop may be expected.

A fire is reported to have occurred on the 7th, at Chatino's, near Strasburg, by which half the town was destroyed, and the loss estimated at $100,000. The damage will reach 1,000,000 marks.

In the town of Seravago, on the 8th inst., a fire originating from the explosion of some spirits, destroyed 288 houses, 358 shops, and 48 warehouses. The loss to private property is estimated at 1,000,000 florins.

On St. Petersburg, the 20th inst., a fire of terrible details connected with the fire at Irkutsk, which seems to have had an undoubted revolutionary origin. Three days before the outbreak, threatening notices were affixed to the Government House and several private dwellings. These notices threatened that the city must give a contribution of 500,000 silver rubles to the "Social Revolutionary Committee," otherwise it would be destroyed by fire. Both authorities and people exercised the utmost watchfulness, but in vain. The fire broke out simultaneously in six different places, and the town soon consumed a large number of its quarters, with more than 250 houses, were reduced to ashes.

The Standard's Paris correspondent states, that a St. Petersburg letter shows an enormous increase in the number of nihilists in Russia.

King Menelik, has issued a rule for the southern portion of Abyssinia, has sent a letter to the Anti-Slavery Society, announcing that he has abolished the slave-trade throughout his dominions.

A telegram from Para, Brazil, dated the 21st ult., states that 11,000 distressed inhabitants of Para had revolted in consequence of stoppage of supplies for their relief. The military had been called out, as it was feared the town might be sacked.

WEST-TOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee on Instruction of Westtown Boarding School meet in Philadelphia on the 23d of 8th month at 10 A. M.

TUGHENAMON BOARDING SCHOOL.

The 13th year opens Ninth month 9th, 1879.

H. M. CORP, Principal.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will reopen on Second day, Ninth mo. 8th, 1879.

A limited number of children will now be admitted to these schools, not members of our religious Society whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments so common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is particularly invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charge burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal aim for the next term will be to employ the care of John H. Dillingham and Margaret Lightfoot, as Principals, both successful teachers of many years' experience. With these Friends in charge assisted by a complete corps of teachers, it is thought these schools may safely be recommended as affording opportunities for obtaining a liberal education in useful branches of study, and in the Latin, Greek and French languages, &c. In which special attention will be given to those children whose studies are of an elementary character. The Primary Schools in Cherry St. and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Believing that advantage would arise from increased facilities for the instruction of the smaller grades, arrangements have been completed for the opening with the fall term, of a primary separate school, including on Seventh St., in which special attention will be given to those children whose studies are of an elementary character. The Primary Schools in Cherry St. and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Society,

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 445 Market St.

WEST-TOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Our friends Benjamin W. and Rebecca G. Passmore having resigned their positions as Superintendent and Matron of Westtown Boarding School, Friends who may feel drawn to engage in the important and responsible duties of superintending this Institution, are requested to communicate with either of the undersigned. The present Superintendents desire to be released in their month next, or earlier.

DEAD, 7th mo. 22d, 1879, BERNICE B., wife of John C. Hoag, in the 62d year of her age, a member of Fishing Monthly and Particular Meeting, Belmont county, Ohio. For several years previous to her death she was afflicted with paralysis. The disease, though slow in its progress, gradually deprived her of physical strength, until she became entirely helpless and speechless; but she appeared to retain her mental faculties until the last. Whilst able to converse, she often expressed a feeling of thankfulness for blessings conferred upon her, manifesting Christian patience and resignation under this proving dispensation; and we have cause to believe that she was in the arms of our Lord Jesus, who is safely landed where "all tears are wiped away from all eyes." And we feel assured that by this affliction meted out to our departed friend, a very solemn and impressive warning has been extended to her family and friends, and to the many of us who, for behold the night cometh wherein no man can work? And again, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." May the call thus given, fasten upon our hearts as a nail in a sure place.

Life and Adventure in Japan.

BY E. WARREN CLARK.

We spent a week in Kioto, at a beautiful summer resort on the hillside overlooking the city; we visited all the points of interest, and enjoyed our stay exceedingly.

Kioto, above all other places in Japan, is the city of temples, and to mention half of them would be out of the question. Most of them are large, and their grounds are laid out on a magnificent scale; many have noted historical associations.

The ancient palace of the Mikado, which has always given the chief sacredness to the city, is located within a large enclosure near the upper end of Kioto; the grounds are in the form of a parallelogram, and contain a number of buildings with peculiarly-shaped roofs. No other buildings in the empire are allowed to have this style of roof, except the shrines and temples of the Shinto sect. The Mikado was worshipped as the Tenko, or Son of Heaven; his head must therefore be protected by a Shinto roof, and his very residence became sacred. No point was ever used about the royal dwellings, but the wood-work was of fine grain, and kept clean and polished. Sometimes the ends of the rafters were tipped with white, but this was the only color permitted, and gave a pretty checkered effect when used on the dark beams of the gateway and roofs.

Behind the palace proper is a large square garden or park also enclosed by walls, containing spacious dwellings; here his mysteriousness might retire if he chose, and live a peaceful prisoner, after giving up his duties of state to his successor.

All the interest connected with Kioto, as being the royal residence of the Tenko, has of course departed since the removal of the Mikado's person and his capital to Tokio.

Kioto contains nearly 300,000 inhabitants; its streets are laid out at right angles, and are as regular as those of Philadelphia.

Of the hundreds of temples visited, I will only mention that of "Kiyo-Midzu," or clear-water. This temple is splendidly situated; it was built about A. D. 798, and is considered among the most sacred spots in this neighborhood. It is approached by long slopes of stone steps. At the entrance of the temple is a pagoda, and along the edge of the buildings are high balconies or stages which overlook the slope. The priests and people were at worship while we were there, and the beating of drums made a continuous din. The high stages are partially protected by projecting rafts, as they overlook a depth varying from 100 to 200 feet.

Within recent times it was customary for eccentric individuals, who did not want to go to war, to come and throw themselves off this precipice, preferring to die before the temple of their deity, rather than be killed in battle.

Descending by a winding path from the stages, we came to the waterfall of the "Clear-water," which is divided into three streams by stone troughs projecting from the edge. Underneath is a small shrine in the rock, and hither pilgrims come to worship, and bathe in the sacred waters.

We took a bath there ourselves, but it was with difficulty that either of us could stand more than a few seconds under one of those solid streams of very cold water, which fell upon one like a liquid hammer. And yet, soon after coming out, we saw three men stand for eight or ten minutes, each with his head bowed forward towards the shrine, and the stream of water falling upon his neck and back, while he devoutly counted his beads, a string of which he held between his hands, and repeated prayers either for his own purification or for the healing of some sick friend. Sometimes persons will stand underneath this fall for a long time, as a kind of penance for sin; and even in winter persons will kneel there, praying for sick relatives, till they are almost benumbed. The priests pretend that cures have been wrought through the efficacy of these waters.

Our last evening in Kioto was passed in watching the merry scenes along the shallow river-flats, where the people congregate in large numbers to spend the warm summer evenings. The river-bed is mostly a dry gravelly waste, with streamlets flowing here and there through narrow channels. A fresh breeze may always be found here during the sultry evenings, and numbers of small platforms or stont tables are placed in the shallow portions of the river, upon which the people sit and enjoy themselves. The tables are connected with innumerable restaurants which line the river bank, and busy waiters bring fish, soups, tea, and saki down the sloping walks to the guests.

A few years ago, in journeying along the highways of Japan, the traveller would see at the entrance of every village and near the cross-roads, a wooden edict-board hanging where every passer-by might read it, upon which was written in large characters, "The evil sect called Christian is strictly prohibited." This law No. 3 was suspended by the side of other laws against stealing, murder, and insurrection, and, like them, was formerly punishable with imprisonment and even death.

Why should the Japanese consider Christianity a criminal offence, worthy of punishment, when we believe it to be a blessing, and see in it the highest joy, love, and salvation? The answer is simply this:

In the sixteenth century, when Europeans first came to Japan, the Jesuit missionaries accompanied the traders, and succeeded in converting the southern provinces to the Roman Catholic faith. So successful were they, that a little later they entered into a conspiracy with some of the disaffected daimios, and attempted to overthrow the government of the Tycoon, and make Christianity the state religion. The conspiracy was discovered, and hundreds of Jesuits and Roman Catholic priests were banished from the country; a terrible persecution of the native converts also followed, in which tens of thousands perished by fire, sword, and crucifixion.

Christianity, so-called, was swept from the land; its very name was written in blood, and children were taught to trample upon the cross. The edict board which I have mentioned was written at that time, and placed throughout the empire. Foreigners were expelled, and "the foreign religion" prohibited. The Japanese of later days looked back upon that bloody chapter in his country's history, and learned to associate the "Yesu followers" with ideas of intrigue, rebellion, and things worthy of contempt. He held Christianity accountable for the evil actions of the man who professed it; and he regarded the edict-board which daily met his eye as a righteous barrier against the dangerous sect.

Three centuries rolled away, when at last Commodore Perry's ships appeared and again opened Japan to foreign intercourse. As in former years, the missionary accompanied the merchant and trader; but this time the light of the pure Gospel of peace began to break upon the darkened pagan empire. American missionaries settled at Nagasaki, and afterwards at Yokohama and other ports; they did not bring the altars, candles, and crucifixes of the Jesuits, but proclaimed the simple story of the Scriptures.

Great prejudices had to be overcome, however; the name of Jesus had long been misunderstood, and the ominous edict-board still prohibited the "evil sect." Little progress was made at first, for the people were afraid, or openly opposed to the new doctrines. Even as late as the year 1872, Japanese who attended my Bible-class in Shidzu-o-ka said they were astonished to find Christianity such a good thing, and so pure and exalted in its teachings, for they had been taught from childhood that it was evil and corrupt. They were so glad, they said, to learn that it was the true religion, of peace and charity, rather than evil.

Long and patient labor was required before this popular prejudice could be even partially removed. In the progress of events, however, the odious law against Christianity was taken down from the public highways, by order of the government, never again to be replaced.

So great was the feeling of thankfulness and Christian exultation at this result, among foreign missionaries and others, that I obtained possession of the original edict board which had so long hung up in my own Province of Suruga, and sent it home as a trophy and relief, to show friends in America the last vestige of religious persecution.

This weather-beaten board travelled eight thousand miles, by itself, and is perhaps the only one which ever left the country. After it had gone the local governor who had given it to me tried to get it back again; but I replied that Japan had no further use for the law, and that I had sent it to America for safe preservation!

In glancing over a letter written when about commencing my bible-classes in Tokio, and when unusual difficulties appeared in the way, I find this statement concerning my students: "I confess that when the feeling floods upon me, that these are souls for whom Christ died, and mine is the privilege to make the fact known unto them, it breaks through all bounds of mere expediency, and forces me to speak the truth at all risks. * * There is a solemnity beyond expression, in the attempt to bring before these young men the words of eternal life."

Summer Penicillies.

The Name and Power of the Eternal.—The Psalmist wrote, "In the name of our God we will set up our banners." Would that we could all more do this! Would that we could rally to this Power as the Christian's stronghold! What a bulwark of saving help and strength should we find it! In "The Song of Solomon" it is recorded, "Thy Name is as ointment poured forth," &c. The poet, on the name or power of Jesus, has beautifully written:—

"It makes the wounded spirit whole,
And calms the troubled breast;
'Tis manna to the hungry soul,
And to the weary rest."

Our Conversation.—In musing to-day on the subject of conversation, I was reminded of the words of the Most High through the Psalmist: "To him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God;" and likewise dwelt upon the language of the apostle Paul on the same subject: "Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ;" with also the query of the apostle Peter: "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness." &c. Methought that with such and many more Scripture precepts of similar import written for our learning, we ought to give more earnest heed to this important subject, lest we miss of the blessing promised to him "who ordereth his conversation aright," and that, through unfaithfulness, this talent of great influence become a less important auxiliary than it should to the praise of Him, who having bestowed the blessing, is looking for fruits thereof to his own praise and glory.

Sadly true is it that conversation is too much resorted to to palliate dulness, or to pass away the tedious hour, than either to promote our own instruction and edification, to exalt the kingdom of the Redeemer, or to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, whose we are, and whom it is our highest privilege to love and serve. As a Christian poet has conveyed, it

"Too often proves an implement of play,
A toy to sport with, and pass time away.
Collect at evening what the day brought forth,
Compress the sum into its solid worth,
And if it weigh the importance of a fly,
The scales are false, or algebra a lie,
Sarcas interpretor of human thought,
How few respect or use thee as they ought!
But all shall give account of every word,
Who dare dishonor or defile the tongue,"

But it is a cheering truth that there are, notwithstanding, "veteran warriors in the Christian field," who endeavor to honor their Master by the watchful and guarded use of the lip and tongue, and on all occasions "to show out of a good conversation their works with the meekness of wisdom." These oft command of their King and his kingdom; and

"Daily derive increasing light and force
From such communion in their pleasant course."

Can it be, that the things which so superlatively belong to our journey through life's flitting valley, with the brighter scenes beyond, can by any be ignored or deemed of little value?

"Is it incredible, or can it seem
A dream to any, except those that dream,
That man should love his Maker, and that fire,
Warming his heart, should at his lips transpire?"

On this subject is there not cause for apprehension that the ways and usages of a world that lieth in wickedness, has had too much of a countervailing influence, and that those "whose highest praise is that they live in vain," have so leavened the lone of general conversation, that it is hard "to build our altar confident and bold" on the side of Truth, and thence to withstand the popular current.

"Hard to escape from custom's idiot sway,
To serve the Sovereign we were born to obey."

The injunction, "Be not conformed to this world;" applies to the government of the tongue, no less than to other things. And it will be well for those who take undue liberty herein, and yet desire to be found walking in the straight and narrow way, to see to it, that they balk not the testimonies of Truth in this particular, nor lower the tone of conversation to suit the prevailing taste of the times or the company they are in. Because, as is written, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." And, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

Almost invariably boys who have been allowed to roam free at night have come to moral shipwreck and social destruction. Men and boys, women and girls, whatever may have been their culture, feel that there is something in the street at night different from that which is in the day—something that excites apprehension, or creates alarm or gives license. It is unnatural that a child should want to go off to play in the dark with other children. Sometimes, for quiet, parents will allow their children to go "round the corner" to play with some other children. Sometimes this is allowed through mere carelessness. We never knew it to fail to end disastrously. We have in our mind one or two striking cases in which weak mothers have pleaded for this liberty for their children, and are now reaping the bitter fruits.—C. F. Deems in The Church Union.

[The last number concluded the memoranda, kept by our dear friend, of his exercises and trials whilst a resident among the India at or near Tunnassass. It is proposed to add to these accounts a few extracts from son letters written during that period of absence from his relatives and religious associates.]

To Samuel Cope.*

Tunnassass, 7th mo. 29th, 1848.

Dear Friend,—I received thy acceptable letter. The account which thou gave of our last Yearly Meeting was to me interesting. I think I may say I have at times been able to sympathize with Friends in the trials. I believe the present state of things, must be very trying to the living baptizd members. I trust there are yet in our religious Society a number of this description, who have been baptized by the Holy Hea and are living members of His Church. The no doubt often go on their way mourning account of the inroads made by the enemy upon the precious unity which once, in a remarkable manner, distinguished our high favored Society. May the restless spirit of man be laid low, and all as a people be prostrated at the footstool of our Divine Master, and there patiently wait for his direction and strength to stand firm in support, the precious doctrines and testimonies of which our forefathers so deeply suffered, of weight and importance of which, it is to be feared, has been but little felt, or but little regarded by a number in our day. May d strippings and siftings that we may have pass through, through the blessing of our Divine Master, have a humbling and purify effect upon those that remain, and awake them to a sense of the necessity of building on that foundation that cannot be shaken and, dear friend, while I feel for Society, (also) feel the necessity, as an individual, examining how it is with me. I have been sensible of many short-comings, and times been much tried with a spirit of reluctance to submit to the will of our kind and merciful Master, who, I feel bound in gratitude to acknowledge, has in his unmerited mercy followed me to this day. How comfortable the feeling when our hearts can adopt the language, "Thy will be done on earth, it is done in Heaven;" this is often the breathing desire of the true Christian. I have been comforted at times in talking with some of the natives on the subject of religion, and hearing the expressions of some of them of their death beds. I do not know but that gave thee in a former letter some account of an Indian woman who died a year ago on reservation. I called at the house where she lived after she was pretty much confined to bed; in conversation with her she said, she had been a great sinner, and that there was a great debt resting against her, which, she thought she said, she did not feel (or was unable) to pay. Thus her mind and body were sinking together, and that she did not feel able to pray. I told her that it was not necessary at all times, that prayer should be spoken aloud, that the Great Spirit knew our thoughts and the desires of our heart, and * A valued minister, member of the same Month Meeting as E. W.; also a member of the Indian Court.

hat prayer could be offered up to Him without using the voice. I felt much for the poor woman; I thought it right to hold out the language of encouragement to her, at the same time I felt it a serious matter for me to do so without really feeling it. I spoke of the great offering our blessed Saviour made for himself, and the mercy and lovingkindness of our Heavenly Father, set forth in the parable of the Prodigal Son. I sometimes afterward inquired for her, when they told me she was more comfortable. I believed He who came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance, removed the great burden she complained of, and administered comfort and consolation to her much exercised spirit. Before she died she expressed resignation to the will of the Lord, and died quite happy. There was a young man some time ago, near to where I boarded; his disease was consumption; he lingered for some time; in the latter part of his sickness he appeared very cheerless, and I thought much exercised in mind. One morning he lay a corpse I called at the house and was told he had talked to his father and mother and two sisters, the day before, and told them he was willing to die, that he thought he was going to the Great Spirit; gave them advice to be good, and told them they did not know how soon they might die. It was really comforting to me to hear what he had expressed. At times these poor people feel very near to me, and I feel a desire for their present and future happiness as well as my own. * * * In regard to my leaving—it has felt to me to be a subject my own will and natural inclination ought to have but little to do in deciding upon. I think I may say it is my desire that it may be in his time, which is forever worthy to have the disposing of us as He sees meet. * * *

In sincere love I remain thy friend,
EZEKIEL WORTH.

A Providential Deliverance.—Canon Fleming, Vicar of St. Michael's, Chester-square, in a contribution to The Day of Days, tells the following striking anecdote, which was told to him by an old man who showed to him the lock of hair referred to: "I was a little child of four years old, with long curly locks, which in sun or rain or wind hung down my cheeks. One day my father went into the woods to cut up a log, and I went with him. I was standing a little way behind him, or rather at his side, watching the strokes of the heavy axe as it went up and came down upon the wood, sending splinters off with every stroke in all directions. A large splinter fell at my feet, and I eagerly stooped to pick it up. In doing so I stumbled forward, and in a moment my curly head lay upon the log. I had fallen forward just at the moment the axe was descending with all its force. It was too late to stay the blow. Down it came. I screamed, and my father fell to the ground in terror. In the blindness which the sudden horror caused, he thought he had killed his only son. We soon recovered—I from my fright, and he from his terror. He caught me in his arms—then looked at me from head to foot, to find out the deadly wound which he was sure he must have inflicted. Not a drop of blood—not a scar to be seen. He fell on his knees on the grass and gave thanks to God. Having done this, he took up his axe and found a few hairs on its glittering edge.

He turned to the log, and there was a single curl of his boy's hair, cut clean through, and lying upon the wood. What an escape! It was as if an angel of mercy had turned aside the edge at the moment it was descending on my head. With renewed thanks to God he took up the curl and carried me home in his arms. That lock of hair he kept all his remaining life as a memorial of God's care and love. That lock he left to me on his death-bed. It always rebukes unbelief and dispels alarm. It bids me trust Him for ever. I have had many tokens of Fatherly love in my life, but somehow this speaks most to my heart. It used to speak to my father's heart; it still speaks to mine!"

For "The Friend."

A Word of Encouragement.

A correspondent from New York State desires the insertion in "The Friend" of the following passages, says, "As an encouragement to some to whom it may seem that the Lord had almost forgotten us amid separations and the many things which have crept in little by little; but if we put our trust in the Lord, and continue in earnest prayer, I believe there will be those raised up who will uphold the Truth in its ancient purity." Joel, 17-18. "Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say, Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them: wherefore should they say among the people, Where is their God. Then will the Lord be jealous for his land, and pity his people." James, 1.6. "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

Women as Blacksmiths.—A correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, writing from Rowley Regis, a Lancashire village, thus describes one of the strange sights of that strange district:

"I came here to inquire for myself how much it would cost to deliver one hundred tons of coal a month by the Rowley Colliery Company at two or three given localities within a distance of ten miles; and, having satisfied myself on that point, much to my pleasure I continued my walk from the coal pit up through the fields to Rowley Old Church. I came to a place called Bill End, which is apparently a new part of the old village. Through a small window I observed a female head bobbing up and down; soon I heard the sound of a hammer; and, never having seen any rivet making done by human hands, I threaded my way through some brick passages until I came to the little smithy where 'Alice' was at work.

"This was the name by which her father called her, whom I met on my way, and to whom I am indebted for the following remarkable piece of knowledge. Alice, I may say, was a young wife engaged in blowing bellows, heating pieces of iron in a 'gleed' forge, and producing rivets from an anvil at the rate of 3000 a day. For this manual labor Alice—her father proceeded to tell me in his presence—gets from the warehouse 1s. 4d., out of which she has to pay for wear and tear of tools 1d., carriage 1d., and a like sum for gleeds, a kind of small coke made expressly for nail and rivet forges. On Monday she does her washing, on Saturday her cleaning up, so that she only works at rivets four days in the week, and her gross earnings therefore, amount to 4s. 3d. for forging 12,000 rivets. I have said nothing of rent which Alice would pay, and which might amount to one shilling a week. She was a sedate young woman, well spoken, with very fair hair, and a low, sweet voice. John Price (Alice's father), then, at my request, took me to see his neighbors, Edward and Phyllis Tromans, who lived and worked at making nails close by. Phyllis is a handsome woman, with beautiful white teeth and abundance of flesh, which Rubens might have painted, it is so plentiful and rosy. This woman was forging large nails, and the manner in which she made nails with a point, and a head an inch and a half in circumference, fly off a piece of hot iron was marvellous to behold. She worked from 8 o'clock in the morning until 9 at night, and in four days will forge fifty-four pounds weight of stout nails, for which she will receive the wondrous price of 3s. 8d., out of which she has to pay fivepence for gleeds and twopence for tools. Her husband works 'as hard as ever he can drive,' from 6 o'clock in the morning until 11 at night; and his week's wages amount to 12s., from which twopence for gleeds and fourpence for tools will have to be deducted—to say nothing of rent. Edward Tromans was only 43 years old, but looked much nearer 70. Two other young women were hammering away at rivets in company with Phyllis; and never as long as I live shall I forget that little black smithy. I once travelled many miles to see 'Vulcan's Forge,' by Velasquez; but there was in that famous picture no figure equal to that of Phyllis Tromans, and I shall remember Phyllis to the day of my death. That such a woman should be slaving in soot—blowing bellows, now with her left, and then wielding a hammer with her right hand—forging clout nails for twelve hours a day, in order to earn less than 40 pence in a week, is a phenomenon that I would never have believed as being possible in England if I had not seen it."

Additional Advice.

Holy Scriptures.—We believe a blessing has often attended the frequent assembling of families, and reading a portion of the Scriptures of Truth, with minds humbly turned to the Lord, to receive such instruction as He may see meet to impart. Many, who are now far advanced in years, can recur to such opportunities in their childhood, as seasons of heart-tendering visitation, in which their understandings were Divinely enlightened, and desires raised after the saving knowledge of the Truth.

The benefit we derive will depend very much on the state of mind in which we perform the duty.

A cold, cavilling, or criticising spirit; a disposition to comprehend the truths of salvation by the unassisted intellectual powers, or by recourse to commentators, who often darken counsel by words without right knowledge; will mar the benefit we might receive; while a state of humble, childlike dependence on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, which gave the Scriptures forth, and only as he opened and apply them, will receive the blessing, and know them to be made "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished into all good works."—1863.

Effect of Conversation upon Character.

So closely are thought and speech connected, that many believe that we can only think in words. Without doubt we generally do think in words. Try the experiment; select a subject, and you will find that your meditations about it will take the form of talking to yourself. That is the surest way of becoming wise or foolish—by talking to yourself. The mind grows by feeding on its own expressions. But a more powerful reaction upon the mind is from the words we utter aloud or write to others. To form clearly and fully any idea, the best expedient is to try to tell it fully and clearly to others. * *

But what is true of ideas is also true of the desires and passions they develop through expression. If anger is suddenly kindled in your soul, and you check the hasty word in which it was about to flash, the sentiment itself will be likely either to die out or subside into a judicious opinion of the person or action which occasioned it. Backbite your best friend in malicious thoughtlessness, and you will soon come to hate him. Speak much in selfcommendation, and though what you say may all be true, you will become proud and conceited. Let the habit of using exaggerated expressions be indulged, and you will find that what you thought to be no stronger than spiders' webs, will be strong enough to trouble you if any one is disposed to weave them into charges of deceit and falsehood. Repeat other people's doubts about religion, or form the habit of asking smart questions about things you yourself believe, and your mind will become twisted into an interrogation-mark, leaving not enough intellectual substance for the smallest period of definite conviction upon any great subject. Indeed, the attempt to get rid of anything bad in the heart by opening the mouth for it to fly away in speech, is like opening the stove-draught to let the fire go out. The wise man says of a person who tries such an experiment: "The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness; and the end of his talk is mischievous madness." And the apostle James says, "So is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and is set on fire of hell."

The same mighty potency for effect upon ourselves, is lodged in our good conversation. If you feel hatred and vindictiveness rising within you against a neighbor, stop and think of something good he has said or done, at some time, and then take the first opportunity to tell some body else about it. Point out the good you have found in him, though it be but a speck, and say nothing of the great piles of dirt you had to work through to get it. The fragrance of such kind words will act like a disinfectant all through your own mind. Take the first hall in the meanest room of the office or the back parlor, to tell some true story, to illustrate some noble sentiment, or to speak of something, the evident purpose of which is pure, and you will feel the moral lift of it; your own character will grow consciously a shade whiter. Get into the habit of telling other people what you believe, not what you don't believe; give others a taste of the water which you draw from the wells you find in the desert of human ignorance. Don't throw the hot and dry sands of doubt into their faces; sound with the hammer of your talk right over the beams of your solid convictions, and you will find that your own faith will become sure and refreshing.

What a dignity and what a responsibility our Lord puts upon the tongue! "But I say unto you that for every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." * * * *

[The following affectionate tribute to the memory of our late valued friend, Charles Evans, is from the pen of one who was much attached to him during life. The fulness of expression in the 4th and 5th verses, may possibly be interpreted to mean, that in the writer's opinion, from youth to old age, there was no imperfection visible in his Christian walk. We do not suppose that such was the author's meaning; but rather, that while she knew her much loved and honored friend to be possessed of like passions and infirmities with the rest of mankind, yet the main bent of his heart was to serve the Lord and promote his glorious cause in the earth.

There are few things that more sweetly impress the mind, than to see the change which takes place in men of strong convictions and great force of character, who have been called in the strength of their days into active labor, and been engaged as it were in fighting the Lord's battles, when the shades of evening descend upon them, and the time draws near for entering the unseen world. Then there often appears a sweetness and mellowness of spirit about them like that of the ripened fruit, ready to drop from the bough and be gathered into the Heavenly Garner. Some who were intimate with Dr. Evans can bear testimony to such a change in his case.—Ed.]

TO THE MEMORY OF CHARLES EVANS.

We mourn in Israel for a strong one gone,
A soldier of the cross,
Taken from conflict with his armor on,
Gathered from pain and loss.
No more that voice in thrilling tones of power,
Shall guide to purer day—
Nor in the sittings of the council hour
Show forth the surer way.

No more that pen so long and ably borne
Will trace the Master's thought,
The ancient Faith in upholding in the form
Our early fathers taught.

From youth to age in meek and reverent fear
The Christian's path he trod,
Counting no treasure of this life too dear
To offer to his God.

Proclaiming ever to a gazing world
The reason for our hope;
Keeping the banner on the wall unfurled;
Bearing its standard up.

And now, O Friend, beyond the morning star,
The crown of life is thine,
Where the best-homes of the immortals are Glowing with light Divine.

Again earth's spring hath wakened up her throng
To music, song, and cheer;
It is but discord to the glorious song
That breaks upon thine ear.

Thine eye hath opened on a fairer spring,
Where sorrows haunt no breast,
Where all of care is a forgotten thing
In God's eternal rest.

And though we mourn thy faithful spirit gone
From works on earth away,
The bright example shineth on and on,
Unto life's perfect day.

And He who guided with unerring Hand
Beyond Time's farthest shore,
Still waits to lead into the Promised Land,
His children evermore.

"Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place and rest awhile."

Gladly we catch the tender sound
Which bids us sit some and rest awhile.
Come, breathe with me the desert air!
Come, breathe to God the secret prayer!
We come! we come! the harassed soul
Longs to escape this "war of words,"
The clouds of care which round us roll,
And rest with thee in a Land of lords!
And once again the bark retires,
Ere we the quiet haven quit.

SEEDS.

Selected.

We are sowing, daily sowing,
Countless seeds of good or ill,
Scattered on the level lowland,
Cast upon the windy hill—
Seeds that sink in rich brown furrows
Soft with heaven's gracious rain;
Seeds that rest upon the surface
Of the dry unyielding plain;
Seeds that fall amid the stillness
Of the lonely mountain glebe;
Seeds cast out in crowded places,
Trodden under foot of men;
Seeds by idle hearts forgotten,
Flung at random on the air;
Seeds by faithful souls remembered,
Sown in tears and love and prayer;

Seeds that lie unchanged, unquicken'd—
Lifeless, on the teeming mould;
Seeds that live and grow and flourish
When the sower's hand is cold.
By a whisper soul we blessings,
By a breath we scatter strife;
In our words and looks and actions
Lie the seeds of death and life.

Thou who knowest all our weakness,
Leave us not to sow alone;
Bid Thine angels guard the furrows
Where the precious grain is sown,
Till the fields are ripe for glory,
Filled with million ripened ears—
Filled with fruit of life eternal
From the seeds we sow in tears.

Check the froward thoughts and passions,
Stay the hasty, heedless hands,
Lest the germs of sin and sorrow
Mar our fair and pleasant lands.
Father, help each weak endeavor,
Make each faithful effort blessed,
Till thy harvest shall be garnered
And we enter into rest.

SUNSET.

Like a gleam of the sunset slow melting in heaven,
Like a star that is lost when the daylight is riven;
Like a glad gleam of slumber that wakens to bliss;
They passed to the land of the holy from this.

The pilgrimage shall no more be trod,
A rest remains for the people of God.

Fifty Years Ago and Now.—It is harvest time in Santa Clara Valley. Looking over it from a hill-top to-day, seeing the reapers, the self-binders, the clippers, and the steam threshers at work, I thought of the improvements in agriculture within fifty years. Many now living can remember when all the grain was cut with cradles, bound by hand, carted to the barn, and there threshed with flails and winnowed either by hand or with very rude fanning mills. It was many weeks, often months, from the time the grain was cut until it was ready for the mill or market. But to-day one of my neighbors is hauling barley to the depot that was standing in the field only yesterday. He had it clipped. The clipper goes over about twenty acres a day, takes off the heads only of the grain which it spots as it goes a'long into a treader wagon driven close beside it. As soon as one wagon is full a second one takes its place, and the first one is driven to the stack or setting in the field, is unloaded and ready to the relief of the other when it is full. In this way will be three to five hundred cents of grain will be stacked in a day. And as soon as enough stacks are ready, the separator, driven by a steam engine, goes to work. It threshes from five hundred to a thousand sacks a day. And as the farmer hires both the clipper and the separator, paying the former by the acre and the latter by the cental, as soon as a wagon load is threshed he can begin to take his crop to market. Hence this fact, just referred to, of grain going to market the day after it was standing in the field is not unusual. A man, who has a hundred acres of grain may have it all cut, threshed, sold and delivered within a week.—The Nat. Farmer.

Extracts from the "Testimony of Spring River Quarterly Meeting," referred to in the editorial of last number.

"All scattering and disunity which has ever disturbed the peace of the Society of Friends, has arisen because its members have abandoned its principles. The embracing of its principles, by real conviction, brought into unity; the rejecting of which, has always brought spiritual if not outward separation; for as those who embrace its principles by conviction, were thereby united in fellowship with the body; so now and always, those who reject its principles have separated themselves, no difference how much they profess otherwise. Our divisions and troubles to-day, arise from the same cause, for there has been rejecting of almost all of those doctrines, either practically or by profession, by those who are to-day retained in outward union and in good standing with the body. Those who are thus undermining our ancient faith and practice, fellowship each other, though all do not agree in teaching these departures and innovations. In enumerating these things we do not say that all who are in outward fellowship are in unity; but we do desire to press it upon Friends that the condition of the Society is such that the holding of any or all of these unsound views and practices makes no difference in the standing of ministers or members. Some teach against the doctrine of the Light of Christ. Very many profess in word to believe it, and then persist in teaching doctrines of conversion which practically set it aside. Many more ignore it entirely, while those who do teach it as early Friends taught it, are accused of unsoundness by many.

These innovators teach an instantaneous conversion by imputative righteousness.

They teach an instantaneous sanctification. They teach carnal and material views of the resurrection.

They teach carnal and outward views of the advent of Christ.

They teach against the spirituality of the Lord's Supper by denying there being any spiritual thing of which to partake.

They place an undue stress on the letter of the Holy Scriptures.

They fail to maintain our testimony for plainness of speech.

They encourage congregational singing.

They sing from books.

They call for the singing of certain hymns.

Instead of that spiritual discernment by which in the spirit of prophecy the true sense of the condition of a meeting or of individuals is received, they violate the doctrine of the ministry; and in practical unbelief in the guidance of the Holy Spirit, they call upon meetings for all in certain conditions to arise or hold up hands.

They call convicted persons to separate seats, as if doubting God's power to accomplish his own work.

They produce confusion in meetings by many singing, praying or preaching at the same time.

They appoint meetings for prescribed purposes, as prayer, or consecration: Meetings contrary to our principles of the ministry and worship.

That Friends may consider how steady has been the advance of these departures, we now especially recall that of the ministry. Early Friends believed that it was required of them to bear testimony against all sorts of music. And the history of the Society of Friends like that of the planting of the Christian Church, is without an example where, in any regular meeting there was ever any formal or congregational singing; but some years ago a few individuals professed to believe they were called to sing in Friends' meetings. While most Friends felt that there was little if any true life in it, yet as it could be excused on the plea that it was an exercise of a spiritual gift like praying or preaching, it was tolerated; soon, more than one joined in the singing until it became fully congregational in character, in violation of the apostolic command that 'They speak one at a time.' Then the testimony was further lowered by taking their books and joining in the singing, according to the custom of those who profess no guidance of the Holy Spirit. Then the ministers engaged, gave away our principles so as to lead in the singing; and now, finally, as the complete abandonment of our doctrine of the ministry, we find ministers actually calling for the singing of such hymns as they desire to have sung. All this has been the growth of years. Many of us have earnestly labored to arrest these, with the other departures and innovations. Friends, who have so labored have been persistently followed by relentless destruction.

Spring River Quarterly Meeting has taken no steps to arrest, or to remedy these things. Those who do them are kept in full standing. Those who sustain them, have the full control of the organization of the Society everywhere. When we view this matter seriously, we have no hope of any reformation. We know that the spirit of intolerance is such, that every earnest effort to bear a testimony against the spread of these things, brings contention in our meetings, and disgrace upon the name of Christ. The precious gifts given to convinced Friends, for the work of restoring our once favored Society to its first principles and practices, cannot be recognized by the body, or be exercised, without strife. In sorrow, because of the necessity thus forced upon us, not in the spirit of separation, for those have separated who have gone from the principles of Friends; but in order to consistently, and the more effectually, bear our testimony against those disastrous departures in faith and prac-lice, we have felt that the time has fully come, for all convinced Friends to act apart from these things."

Religious Items, &c.

Plainness of Dress.—The National Baptist gives nine reasons for dressing plainly on the First day of the week, most of which are equally applicable to the other six days. Among these reasons are the saving of time and expense that would be effected, and the avoidance of some temptations to evil.

Queen Victoria's Freedom from Bigotry.—It is stated that a short time ago some bigoted officials dismissed from the royal household a domestic whose behavior the Queen had observed with approbation. The Queen missed her from her accustomed place, and on learning that the girl's attendance at a Baptist meeting house had led to her removal, she immediately commanded her restoration to her former position.

A Seasonable Rebuke.—Thos. W. Mossman writes to the Nonconformist:

"The same paper which brings the news that the Archbishop of Canterbury desires that the bishops would urge upon the clergy the duty of praying for a cessation of the present most distressing and unfavorable weather for agriculturists, contains also the following piece of information from the seat of war in South Africa:

"Last week General Newdigate took two battalions, with cavalry and artillery, and made a reconnoissance, clearing the country and burning fourteen kraals. No large force was seen, but several isolated Zulus were shot. On our side there was no loss."—Daily Telegraph.

"I should like to ask if people in general, in the least realize what the above short paragraph implies? Well, it implies this—that several hundred English soldiers have gone into the country of a poor, ignorant, heathen people who had never done them, or us, the slightest wrong or injury of any kind, and in a single day burned down fourteen of their villages, and murdered—yes, murdered—is the only proper expression—as many natives as they were able to shoot down with their rifles.

"Is it possible that anyone can be insane enough to imagine that when such stupendous and gigantic crimes as this are committed in the name of England, and with the sanction and by the authority of the present British Government, the God of peace and love, the God who made the black man as well as the white, will bear our prayers for fine weather or anything else?"

The Salvation Army is the title popularly given to a religious movement among the lower classes of English society, which has now been in operation some fourteen years. The leader in the enterprise, William Booth, states that in 1855 he became so impressed with the deplorable condition of some of the inhabitants of the east end of London, that he felt impelled to make some efforts for their religious welfare. A statement signed by the mayors and other officers of many towns in England, says of those engaged in this labor, "We feel bound to state that we know from our own personal observation that they have not labored in vain in our town, but that they have succeeded, not only in gathering together congregations of such as never previously attended religious services, but in effecting a marked and indisputable change in the lives of many of the worst characters in the town."

Religious State of Germany.—Bishop Bowman, of Germany, reported:—"I found the religious and moral state little better than in Catholic Italy. Protestant pastors in Berlin often wait a half hour and go home without preaching, nobody going to hear them."

A Training School for Criminals.—If any one wishes to be convinced that fools abound this year, let him walk up the alley from Clark Street, between Washington and Madison, and look in at the pool-rooms, where from five hundred to one thousand men and boys, in ages from sixty down to sixteen, sit on benches fanning and sweating, as they await the result of base ball games, walking matches, running races, &c., upon which they have staked their halves and quarters. Glancing at the eager, restless faces of these men under the strain of uncertainty, and breathing in and throwing off the mingled fumes of tobacco and bad whisky, it is easy to cast their horoscope. From this list of idle men and boys will be made up the paupers and criminals of future years. It robs a man of honest purposes and gives him a loathing of labor. It introduces him to a train of thought that unmans him for every responsible duty of life. It is hardly within the mind to conceive evils which will not naturally and easily and necessarily follow in the wake of this worse than idle assemblage.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

The ministers of the Free Church of Scotland have been enjoined by the General Assembly to discontinue raffles or bazaar lotteries, and other similar methods of raising money for religious purposes.

A Benevolent Magpie.—A correspondent of Chambers' Journal writing from the north of England relates the following anecdote.

"About three months ago I brought a tame magpie with me out of Staffordshire to my residence here, and shortly after its arrival, it flew on to the window-sill of my sitting-room, seemingly frightened; and on looking out of the window for the cause of its sudden appearance, I found several wild magpies on some trees opposite the window chattering away very loudly to the tame one, which I found they must have previously assailed, as it was strutting about on the sill, and chattering back to them in defiance. A short time after this occurrence, Mag flew to the window and knocked on it with its bill, which it invariably does when wanting food. The window was opened and some pieces of bread put out, one of which Mag immediately picked up and flew with it into the tree referred to, and gave it to one of the several wild magpies which were there; and this performance Mag repeated several times till it had fed the whole lot of them. And many times during the heavy storm we had at the beginning of the year, Mag fed these wild magpies, who no doubt would have often been sorely pinched for food but for the charity of my bird."

A Peril of Nevada Mining.—At the Julia mine last Wednesday, a powerful stream of hot water was struck in the cross-cut on the two thousand level. The Barleigh drill was set to drill a hole in the face of the crosscut at a point about two feet from the bottom. When the drill had advanced about two feet into the rock there occurred a tremendous burst of hot water from the hole. The stream of water was equal to twenty-four miners' inches, and it was scalding hot. It was spouted to the distance of several feet diagonally across the drift, spreading as it flew till all the open space was filled with the scalding spray and steam.

The steam also filled the end of the cross cut where stood the man who had been running the drill. He was held a close prisoner, as he could not pass out through the jets of boiling water, and even in his prison was in danger of being suffocated and cooked by the steam and heat. He would probably not have escaped alive but for the drill. He opened the exhaust valve and allowed the whole head of compressed air to rush out in a full and steady stream, and this not only furnished him pure air to breathe, but also cooled and protected his head and the whole upper part of his body.

His fellow workmen were soon aware of his perilous position—for the roar and rush of the water could be heard at a great distance—but they could no more pass in to where he was than he could pass out. Finally the men went out and procured some heavy gun boots reaching to the hips, and large and heavy gum coats. Guarded by these, one of the men dashed in through the steam and scalding spray, carrying to the prisoner a like outfit. Shielded by their heavy gum clothing the pair rushed forth and waded out along the drift. As it was, the miner had his legs pretty badly scalded.—Virginia (Nevada) Enterprise, 7th mo. 26th.

Poultry rearing around Houdan.—In the neighborhood of Houdan, whence large supplies of eggs and poultry are sent up to the markets of Paris, the branch of industry has now reached such dimensions that the sales average 8,000,000 francs a year. The main point aimed at is to keep only a particular breed of fowls which develop early, so that they are saleable when three months old. Hatching and rearing are carried on artificially, and consequently the production goes on all the year round without reference to weather or seasons. Two persons suffice to look after 10,000 eggs distributed among a number of hatching apparatus, the fuel required for heating these costing from 3 to 4 francs a day. The chicks thus hatched are found to be more lively and stronger than those from eggs incubated by hens. Food is given liberally, the maxim being adopted, that to turn the food into flesh, and the flesh into money as soon as possible is the most profitable plan in the long run. Milk, butter-milk, barley and oatmeal and a little rice refuse forms the principal diet. The difference between these birds and such as have been obliged to eat for themselves is very marked; the former have a fine white skin and abundant juicy flesh, while the latter present more bone than meat.—London Country Gentleman's Magazine.

To clear stables of flies.—Small dishes of chloride of lime placed immediately under the ceiling or roof are said to be efficacious.

Sulphur in Milk.—A certain quantity of sulphuric acid is always present in milk; the amount of which varies greatly, depending on the proportion of sulphates in the water drunk by the cows.

Butter Packing.—The system of packing butter for sea transport in hermetically sealed tins, has come into general use among the export merchants of Copenhagen, and the trade done in butters thus put up has enormously increased of late. They mostly find their way to China, Brazil, Java, Spain and Greenland; and the plan of packing them adopted by the Copenhagen firms secures them so effectually from the influence of air and heat during long sea voyages, that samples which have travelled from Denmark to China and back have repeatedly been found perfectly fresh and well-flavored. The tins are made in various sizes, to contain from 1 to 23 lbs of butter each, and the larger sizes are carefully lined with well seasoned wood that has been saturated with brine.

Disinfection of Stables.—The Prussian Government has ordered that where influenza breaks out among horses in military stables, after removing the animals, pans of sand holding bottles containing 250 grammes of bromine are to be placed about the stables in the proportion of one pan and bottle for each 18 cubic metres of capacity. All openings being closed, the bottles are to be quickly upset, so that their contents run into the pans of sand, and the operator, making his escape as quickly as possible, closes the door carefully behind him. The stable is to remain closed 24 hours. The vapor of the bromine is supposed to destroy the infection.

Indian Silk worms.—The Italian consul at Calcutta has forwarded a number of cocoons of an Indian silk-worm known as "Yussur," which breeds in the forests of India, and which will feed on 18 species of trees, the oak among them, instead of being confined to the mulberry. Experiments are about to be made in Italy and France to determine the feasibility of introducing their cultivation.

A Flea to Wheat.—St. Petersburg advices announce the re-appearance of a small beetle which has more than once spread devastation in the grain fields of Southern Russia.

The Klöven Poisoning Case.—Some months ago at Klöven, in Switzerland, many persons were made ill, and five died from eating the meat of animals that had died of malignant disease. The butchers who supplied the meat have recently been condemned to four and a half years' imprisonment with hard labor.

Animals by Post.—Among the animals sent through the German mail are birds, fish, oysters, crabs, dogs, monkeys, tortoises, crocodiles, snakes, bears, opossums and martens. The number of losses is extremely small, and mostly due to defective packing. In respect to small birds, such as canaries, it is recommended that their solid food be in the shape of a stiff, soft paste, well moistened, and squeezed into a small-mouthed vessel; while the water pan should always contain a piece of soft sponge which will retain enough water to yield a little under pressure of the bird's bill. The mail service in Germany seems to include what we consider "express" business.

Disease germs in Diphtheria.—The germ causes of diphtheria are very minute organisms, being too small to be seen except by the aid of a very good microscope.

We have just taken a small piece of diphtheritic membrane from the throat of a patient suffering with the disease, and placing it under the microscope, with a little mucus from the same source, the germs referred to are distinctly visible in great number, all actively swimming about, making the whole microscopic field alive with motion. Just so they existed in the throat of the patient a few moments ago, vigorously at work insinuating themselves into the mucous membrane, prying their way in between the cells, even getting into their interior and depriving them of the power to perform their functions, clogging the blood vessels, causing irritation of the membrane, and as a consequence the pouring out of fibrous matter which forms false membrane.—I. H. Kellogg, M. D.

[Professor Leidy in a paper published in Am. Journal Med. Sciences, 1st mo. 1879, p. 85, has shown that what had been regarded as parasitic germs causing influenza, hay fever, catarrh, &c., were really not such, but were "incomplete or deformed ciliated epithelial cells—modified by the condition of the catarrhal affection," a result rather than a cause of disease. The same may be true of the diphtheritic exudation.]

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 23, 1879.

A case was recently brought to our notice, in which a woman Friend who was visiting on a sick neighbor then drawing near to the gates of death, was requested to offer vocal prayer for her. The request was repeated the following day, when the last struggle of expiring nature had overtaken the dying woman. In neither instance was any ability felt to respond to the desires of the sick woman or her friends (who were not members of our religious Society), and to utter any words addressed as a petition to the Almighty. All that the Friend could do was to feel an exercise of spirit for the sufferer, and to address to her such expressions as presented to the mind for her comfort and help.

The disappointment felt by the bereaved family, that their wish for vocal prayer was not granted, awakened some searching of heart in the Friend, as to whether she was living in that state of watchful communion with her Heavenly Father, in which the still small voice of our Redeemer can be heard in the soul, and every intimation of duty be perceived and heeded. Such scrutiny of ourselves is often needed, as without it we sometimes slide almost imperceptibly into a careless and lukewarm condition.

The whole occurrence has awakened a train of thought as to the danger and delusion of that dependence on others in effecting the great work of salvation, which a system of human priesthood tends to produce, and to which the human mind is prone to resort. The language of the prophet Ezekiel is applicable in a spiritual sense—"Though Noah, Daniel and Job were in the land, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall deliver but their own souls by their righteousness." To every individual the exhortation of the apostle comes home with solemn force, "Work out your own salvation, with fear and trembling." This work must be wrought between the soul and its Creator, and no human being can do it for another. Hence it is, that when the solemn realities of an eternal existence are pressed home to the mind, and persons become truly aroused to the need of preparation for that kingdom into which nothing that is impure or unholy can ever enter; the humbled, penitent soul is led into secret communion with its God; it desires to be alone, undisturbed by others, and to pour forth its prayers and tears to Him who seeth the real condition of the heart, whose ears are ever open to the sincere, plaintive cry "God be merciful to me a sinner," and who only can say to the troubled soul, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee."

It requires great caution at such solemn, heart-searching seasons, not to interfere unbidden, lest we divert the attention of the suppliant from the inward exercise of spirit, and fervent and patient waiting on the Lord, which are a safe abiding-place. How awful it is to be instrumental in setting any into a rest short of the true rest; and thus putting in peril their everlasting salvation! The late Dr. Evans once spoke of a case which occurred in his medical practice. One of his patients was attacked with incurable disease, and she was evidently nearing the borders of the grave. She was a woman whose course of life had never given to her physician the impression that she was living under the restraints of the cross of Christ; and feeling concerned for her eternal welfare, he spoke to her about her situation. She replied, in substance, that her minister had visited, and [probably] prayed with her, and that she was not troubled about her own condition. Our impression is, that her anxious physician could see little if any sign of the change of heart required by the religion of Christ, and that he was made to mourn over the self-deception nourished by depending on others who were only blind leaders of the blind.

We well remember in early life the effect produced on ourselves by reading some of the juvenile religious books of that day, which constantly introduced some clergyman, minister or teacher as a prominent agent in effecting a change of feeling, and bringing peace and a sense of acceptance to those who, on a bed of death, were struggling with a conviction of their own want of preparation for eternity. We came to regard such as almost necessary helps at such a time; and it required the observations and experience of ripier years to implant the conviction that our dependence must be placed on the Lord alone, and that human aid is of no worth unless it is extended under the Divine command and guidance; and then the praise belongs to Him from whom cometh all that is good.

While we desire to be on our guard against priestcraft, even in its most refined forms, yet we wish also to bear in remembrance, that religious exercise for the good of others is one of the marks of the Christian; and that he is often called to earnest and fervent labor in stirring up the pure mind by way of remembrance, in awakening those that sleep, and turning their attention to the Spirit of Christ, which is able to redeem them from all iniquity, purify them, and make them zealous of good works.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Yellow fever continues epidemic at Memphis—the number of cases reported daily averages about twenty. The disease has also appeared at Myersville, Miss., and this is the only place in the South, outside of Memphis, where it is now known to exist.

A severe storm has prevailed on the lakes for the past few days, and on the 18th inst., 62 vessels were reported storm-bound at Port-couch, and 72 craft delayed between Buffalo and Detroit.

It is stated that 80,000 barrels of oil were destroyed by lightning at Parker's Landing, Pa., on the 14th inst. Estimated loss $400,000.

Reports from ten of the largest grain-growing counties in Nebraska, indicate that the corn crop will be the finest ever known in the State, that oats will average 60 bushels to the acre, and wheat 16 to 20 bushels.

General Miles telegraphs from Fort Peck, under date of 11th inst., that a detachment of the Fifth Infantry had captured 57 Indians, with 100 ponies, from the Roschal agency, who were on the way to join Sitting Bull.

The quarterly report of the State Board of Agriculture, just published, states that the total area in all farm crops, in the State of Kansas, aggregates 7,737,000 acres, an increase of 1,280,000 acres over the previous year. The area in corn is 2,925,000 acres, and in winter wheat 1,297,500 acres. The dairy products are estimated at 1,039,240 pounds of cheese and 14,590,494 pounds of butter. The assessed valuation of property in the State is $145,000,000. Fully 50,000 people have come into the State during the past year.

An excursion train which left Philadelphia for Atlantic City on the afternoon of the 14th, on the narrow-gauge road, collided with a freight train at Clementon, about ten miles from Camden. Five persons were killed by the collision.

The Lumberman's Gazette estimates that we have now about 90,000 miles of railroads in this country, and the annual consumption of ties and sleepers is near 40,000,000 feet, or 100,000 cords of wood, per acre. In consequence of this enormous consumption of timber, a right kind of wood for the purpose is becoming more and more scarce every year; and railway managers are turning their thoughts towards some substitute. Many of the European government railways, notably those of Belgium, have decided to lay iron ties in future. The German railway management have advised the same, and some of the English railways are trying them on a large scale. A wrought iron cross tie, patented in the United States, and for which patents are now pending in Europe, is claimed to meet all the requirements of utility. The proposed substitute is made of cast-iron, ease of construction and of lying in tracks, and to be a practical solution of the question.

The President of the board of emigration in New York informs that emigrants at the rate of 35,000 per annum are arriving in this country, and that the majority is the large proportion of Germans and Russians, who push towards the West. He states the arrivals this season are of a superior class.

The number of deaths in this city, for the week ending at noon on the 16th, was 348. Of this number 142 were adults, and 204 children—139 being under one year of age.

Markets, &c.—Government Bonds, 6s. 1881, 104½; 5s. 1881, 102½; 4½s. 1891, registered, 104½; do. do., coupon, 106; 4s. 101.

Cotton, 11s. a 11½ cts. per pound.

Petroleum—Crude 5 cts. in barrels; refined 6½ cts. in barrels, and 8½ cts. per gallon, in cases. Lined oil, 63 a 64 cts. for Calcutta, and 61 a 62 cts. for American. Lard oil, 44 a 45 cts. Sperma, crude, 75 cts.; refined, 92 a 93 cts. per gallon.

Wool—Extra quality, 85 a 85.75; patent and other high grades, 5.75 to 8.75. Rye flour, $3.12 a $3.25.

Grain.—Wheat is firm and there is a fair demand. Red and amber, $1.06½ a 1.07. Rye, 59 cts. for old, and 54 a 55 cts. for new. Corn, 46 a 49 cts. Oats, old white, 36 a 37 cts.; new, 32 a 35 cts.

Seeds.—Clovered, 6.75 cts. per pound. Timothy, $1.80 a $1.85 per bushel.

Hay and Straw.—Prime timothy, 70 a 80 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 60 a 70 cts.; straw, 60 a 75 cts. per 100 pounds.

Wool—Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4½ cts. Hogs, 5½ a 5½ cts. per lb. Sheep, 2½ a 5 cts. per lb., as to quality. Lambs, 4 a 6½ cts.

A rain storm which began in this section on the evening of the 15th inst., continued with but little intermission for three days. At places on the Atlantic coast it was attended with high winds, and considerable damage is reported. At Philadelphia 5.89 inches of rain fell.

FOREIGN.—The British Parliament was prorogued on the 15th inst. The Queen's speech on the occasion, and the reply thereto, were the subjects of much concern the country, and declares her present cordial relations with other Powers.

Severe storms are reported from various quarters, causing much damage to crops and interruption to railway traffic. At a recent meeting at Liverpool, W. has been washed away, also some of the bridges. Birkenhead is flooded. There have been thirty hours continuous rain at Chester. In Derbyshire, the Trent and derwent rivers have overflowed their banks. All the low-lying lands are flooded. Wheat is gradually rotting, and any crops left standing will not pay for cutting.

A conference of delegates, representing two hundred thousand miners, was held in Manchester on the 13th inst. The President reported on that there was some opening for miners in the United States, as during the recent depression in the mining industry in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, a number of men sought other employment. A resolution was unanimously passed in favor of emigration to the United States.

The President reported on that there was some opening for miners in the United States, as during the recent depression in the mining industry in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, a number of men sought other employment. A resolution was unanimously passed in favor of emigration to the United States.

John Jones, speaking at the opening of the Art Exhibition at Chester, on the 12th, said that when America learned to trust entirely to her own splendid natural resources, the great genius of her people and their marvellous proficiency in the adaptation of labor-saving appliances, in which she has the world to admire, she would be a formidable competitor with the English manufacturer.

The Registrar-General of London announces that two fatal cases of cholera occurred in that city last week.

A despatch to the Times, from Calcutta, says that affairs in the Bannan district of the Madras Presidency are growing out of the leaving of a tax on palm trees, are so serious that the Duke of Buckingham has decided to proceed in person to the scene of the disturbances.

A Paris despatch to the Standard states that the report of Senator Pelletou on the petitions for and against the Free Educational bill, shows that six are in favor of and thirty-six against the bill.

The Panama canal scheme, of De Lesseps, has failed for the present, as the issue of eight hundred thousand shares has not been covered. He says he might convene a meeting of the subscribers, and start the company with three millions, but he prefers, being certain of success, to wait until more light has been thrown on the value of the attacks which have been directed against the scheme at the last moment. He will shortly go to America, and on his return he will set the company on its feet.

The Far Eastern Review, published in London, for the United States, is now being issued from the mint in Paris. It is intended for circulation in Cochinchina.

Russa.—The Golos announces that on the night of the 16th, the police seized several carts conveying boxes of gunpowder, grenades and other explosives, to a small chandler's shop in St. Petersburg. A large store of explosives was also found in the shop, and its proprietor was arrested. It has not yet been ascertained where the powder was obtained, or how it was to be employed.

The wheat crop on the lower Danube has been harvested, and the situation is believed to have been sufficed by the failure of the maize crop.

Turkey.—The Porte has at last appointed plenipotentiaries to negotiate on the question relative to the Greek frontier.

In some quarters it is believed that a political crisis is imminent in Turkey, owing to the growing discontent with the mismanagement of the affairs of the empire.

Denmark.—Danish newspapers state that a terrific thunder storm occurred in that kingdom on the 4th inst., and one hundred farms were destroyed, and fifty persons were killed. The damage to the crops is incalculable.

Havana.—One hundred deaths from yellow fever are reported for last week, being an increase of seven over the previous week.

MOORESTOWN ACADEMY

Will re-open 9th month 1st, 1879, under the care of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, New Jersey, for pupils of both sexes.

Teachers: EDWARD FOYBITE, Principal.
ANNA WOOLMAN,
MARY C. STOKES.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second-day next, mo. 1st, 1879.

A limited number of children will now be admitted to these schools, not members of our religious Society, whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and neighborhood is particularly invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools are opened for the next term, under the care of John D. Harrison and Margaret Gifford, as Principals, both of whom possess upwards of many years' experience. With these Friends in charge, assisted by a complete corps of teachers, it is thought these schools may safely be recommended as affording opportunities for obtaining a liberal education in useful branches of study, and in the Latin, Greek and French languages. Facilities for instruction are afforded by valuable collections of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzon's models of parts of the human system, &c.

Believing that advantage would arise from increased facilities for the instruction of the smaller girls, arrangements have been completed for the opening with the fall term, of a primary department in the Friends' Asylum, in which the instruction to be given will be to those children whose studies are of an elementary character. The Primary Schools in Cherry St. and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee.

Gospel Ministry—Revelation.

[The following remarks on these important subjects were written more than thirty years ago, and form part of a letter addressed to a Minister of the Episcopal denomination who has since been placed by his brethren in the station of Bishop. They grew out of a conversation between him and the writer of the letter, and have recently been forwarded for insertion in "The Friend." As they exhibit the views held by our Society on matters of vital moment, we reprint the letter with some condensation.—Ed.]

Respected Friend:

The views expressed by thee at the time of our late interesting conversation in relation to the calling and exercise of the Gospel Ministry, and the doctrine of Immediate Divine Revelation, or the direct manifestation of the Will of God to man in this day concerning his individual duty, independent of the Holy Scriptures, produced some very serious consideration, and not a little concern on my mind, viewing as I do the immense importance of the faith, that true Christianity is the same in this day that it was in the days of the apostles and primitive believers; and that there should be no more encouragement given for holding to the form but denying the power now, than there was in the apostles' times. And thy exposition of this momentous subject, resting with so much weight on my mind, I trust will be a sufficient apology for a little intrusion upon thy attention in this way, however altogether unexpected by me, was a resort to pen and paper, when I conversed with thee on the subject.

First, then I would say, that the calling and exercise of the gospel ministry, as plainly set forth by our blessed Lord and by the evangelists and apostles, stands in and rests so entirely on the promises of immediate revelation, that I conceive no man can separate it from them; because Christ the Lord has joined them together; for a confirmation of which, see the following passages from that sacred volume, which thou holds as the only rule of faith and practice; and which we acknowledge was written by inspiration of God, and is therefore without exception the best outward rule of faith in the world.

On the first occasion of Christ's sending out the twelve apostles to "preach the kingdom of heaven," He gave them instructions and made gracious promises unto them. See Matt. x. 18, 19, 20; Mark xiii. 11; Luke xxi. 14, 15; a summary of which is as followeth:—"Ye shall be brought before kings and rulers for my sake, for a testimony against them and the Gentiles; [but] take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate, for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak, for it is not ye that speak, but the spirit of my Father that speaketh in you; for I will give you a mouth and wisdom which your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay or resist."

They were to be brought before the rulers, by the Lord's permission or direction, to bear testimony against the sins of the rulers in Israel as well as against the sins of the Gentiles; which if done by the Spirit of God as here recommended is the Gospel Ministry; "Ye shall bear witness to me in Jerusalem and in all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." And this promise that was previously made to them with some other of the like purport were referred to, brought forward and recognized in his last commission to his ministers at a time immediately preceding his ascension, with the command that they should wait for this qualification, to wit, the Gift of the Holy Ghost; and with a further confirmation, "for ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence," being commanded not to go forth but to tarry at Jerusalem, until they were endued with it—with power from on high, before they attempted to exercise this high and holy calling.

Then how consistent his previous saying to his ministers, that when they should be prepared to go forth, "He that receiveth whomsoever I send receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth Him that sent me." Without such endowment He doth never send forth ministers: so neither can it be said that they who receive his messengers, receive Him unless their hearts are also endued with his Spirit; or to use his own words in his promise of sending the Comforter that should abide with them forever, even the Spirit of Truth, that should dwell with them and be in them. At that day, He says, (that is when these gifts are received) ye shall know, that I am in my Father and ye in me and I in you—John xvi. 16, 17, 20. His disciples are his church, therefore these words unto his disciples are his words unto his church and people to the end of the world; and good and gracious words and promises they are, and believing, we thankfully receive them as such. They are "the Comforter shall abide with you forever, for He dwelleth with you and shall be in you, and I will be in you." And as saith the apostle, Rom. viii. 9, "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." And again He says, 2d Cor. xiii. 5, "Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you except ye be reprobates." This He saith to one, and this He saith to all without limitation of time or place. Then truly he that receiveth such messengers, thus indeed, receiveth Christ as himself declared.

Christ, in speaking of him-self as the Shepherd of the sheep, saith, John x. 4—"And when He putteth forth his own sheep, He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him, for they know his voice," &c. This portion of the doctrine of Christ contains a full and clear testimony to the truth of the immediate communication of the Good Shepherd's will to his flock, whereby it is evident that all who are truly the sheep of Christ, (in whatever country or age of the world) may hear his voice and distinguish it from the voice of the stranger, agreeably to another testimony, "Howbeit, when He the Spirit of Truth is come He will guide you into all truth;" John xvi. 13. He will show you things to come.

The living ministers even in this unbelieving day, can and do most thankfully, set their seals to this truth, "He will guide you into all truth;" having, under a sense of their necessity been made to know that "without Christ, (their only helper) they can do nothing," that will enlarge his kingdom, or bring true peace to their own souls.

Agreeably to the foregoing, we find that the apostles and early ministers were led and guided by the Holy Ghost; not only as to what doctrine they should preach wherever they went, but also where to go and preach, and where not to go; for the Scriptures, had they all been [then] written, could not be their guide or private director in such cases: and as Christ had a fitness of purpose where and when to send his messengers, and power to perform it, He guided and instructed them by the immediate intimation of his Spirit. See Acts xvi. 9, as well as many other passages. And his ministers in this day, have as much need of Divine counsel, when called to the same work, as they had in those early times; and if they had endured that sanctifying power which gives clearness of vision, and believe in his power, and are careful to wait for this promise of the Father, and to trust in his wisdom and guidance, so they will be instructed when to go and what message to deliver: for God is the same that He was in the beginning; and Christ Jesus the Lord hath not changed, either in purpose, disposition or authority; neither has He taken from men the perceptions or capacities with which He blessed them in any former time: but the regenerated man endued with the same Christian faith, hath the same qualification to receive the Divine counsel now as in former times, as it regards any will or purpose, on the part of God or his Son Jesus Christ. So that if any who are called to the ministry are wanting in the counsel of God, so far as to desert their cause, the fault is not on his part, but on their own part. And to evince that the guidance of the Spirit is a practical principle, I would mention here that Paul was called of the Spirit to go over into Macedonia to preach, which call he obeyed; but he with Timothy at another time was forbidden of the Spirit to preach the word in Asia; and afterwards they essayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not, &c., Acts. xvi. 6, 7, 9. And so we might refer to Philip's being guided by the Spirit to preach to the eunuch, together with many other instances which are recorded in the New Testament, of such guidance. And who will presume to say that the apostles and ministers of Christ in those times were not always so guided in their travels and ministry?

Thus we see that not only the promises and doctrine of Christ were believed by his faithful messengers, but practised in the obedience of faith, to the honor of Him that promised and to the good of his cause. And very far was it from a rare thing in those days, for the ministers when preaching or prophesying, to appeal to the authority of the Holy Ghost, as in Acts xv. 23—"Save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me," (Paul). And many passages might be brought, evincing the gift of the Holy Ghost unto those who ministered the word of God, or preached Christ; as said the same apostle, as a general thing, "My speech and my preaching was not in the enticing words which man's wisdom teacheth, but in words which the Holy Ghost teacheth," 1st Cor. ii. 13. And the Apostle Peter gives evidence to them that had preached the gospel unto the churches with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven, 1st Peter, i. 12. And as the same apostle witnessed at the house of Cornelius.

"12th month, 1857. * * * I believe we both know very well that any good is done it is not of ourselves, for can we not in truth catch the language of the apostle, that, 'in me, (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing;' happy then for those who have such an abiding faith in Jesus, as to look above themselves, and even over all discouraging things that present themselves to our view, unto Him who is 'mightier than the noise of many waters.' * * * As faith and faithfulness is maintained, a quiet example will be as a little leaven, which will have its influence at the right time and in the right place. 'He maketh use of things that are not to bring to naught things that are.' Oh! I think I have seen the mischief that a want of proper attention to the government of the tongue has done and is doing even amongst us. It is very important for Friends to set an example to the world around us of opposing wrong things, and supporting right things with a right spirit—with the renewed spirit—for it needs waiting for and being renewed even from day to day—a truth which the world and too many among ourselves are slow to learn and too impatient to practise (myself amongst the number) as it ought to be. The same power that raised up and built the church must sustain it; the example of Uzzah was for a warning to the church, we must suppose for all ages. We have no reason to doubt his sincerity in wishing to save the ark from danger, but the commandment for such occasion was broken, and the penalty must be paid as a warning to all. A very few words spoken in right authority, that is, in the right spirit and at the right time, will often avail much, when many words without this do but darken counsel. All the endless countless contention in the political world arises from this very mistake—defending and opposing in a hasty unsubdued spirit which renders strife and thwarts the good that is aimed at. * * * Do we not find the power of true religion on the mind, as it is submitted to, works in us a very humble opinion of ourselves, and of our gifts, while at the same time we very properly entertain a high regard for the gifts of others, especially such as we know to be in advance of ourselves in age and experience, and in faithfulness. * * * How happy are they who know where to flee in the day of trouble. 'Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee'—how true it is.'

Life and Adventure in Japan.

BY E. WARREN CLARK.

Light and shadow blend together in the missionary's experience, but still his duty is to "preach the word." I once saw this illustrated on a long trip with Mr. Ballagh, in our first attempt to ascend Fuji-yama. We were passing through a village near Oyama mountain, where a dread deity is said to reside. Here we encountered a procession of people dragging a huge cart with long ropes. Upon the cart was a pagoda-shaped tower, decorated with flags and streamers, in which were dancing men wearing hideous masks of foxes, demons, and ghosts. Drums were loudly beaten, and the people shouted to drive away the evil spirits.

As the people caught sight of the two foreigners the procession halted and the drums ceased, for we were great curiosities in this out of the way region, and even the dancing foxes looked slyly at us.

Mr. Ballagh was always ready to seize an opportunity for sounding the gospel trumpet, so, jumping upon a low balcony, he asked the people in a pleasant way what this all meant. They said it was the day set apart to propitiate the evil deity of the mountain, who sent all the woes and suffering upon the people, and little foxes to destroy their rice crops. This deity sometimes assumed the form of a great serpent, and naught could be expected from it but evil.

The missionary listened to their explanations, and then raising his voice said: "There is a serpent that brought evil into the world, and suffering upon the human race; but he does not live in yonder mountain, nor can his cruel power be broken by noisy processions or the beating of drums." Then with great skill Mr. Ballagh told the story of the serpent in the Garden of Eden, and the temptation and fall of man, closing with the solemn question, "Is there no deliverance or salvation from the power of this evil one?"

The people could not answer. Then he explained to them with great tenderness the wonderful plan of redemption; saying, that God had given a promise in Eden, which was fulfilled in Jesus Christ, and that now, all who believed on Him might be saved.

Immediately there was a division in the multitude; some were deeply moved, and wished to hear more, but the others beat their drums and called upon the people to take hold of their ropes and drag the cart and dancing foxes. The priests pulled the people away from the preacher, and the noisy but diminished procession went on its way, dragging with difficulty the heavy cart. A few remained and listened to the word with increasing interest, until I reminded Mr. Ballagh of the lateness of the hour, and we continued the journey.

The Chinese literature has been studied as a classic for many centuries in Japan; but only the Samourai, or two sworded men, were permitted to become scholars, also the priests. The common people could only read the simpler forms of pure Japanese, which language remained quite undeveloped. In publishing the Scriptures, therefore, to the people, a difficulty arises from the lack of a suitable language, which may be equally well understood by all. If the missionaries translate the Bible with the frequent use of Chinese characters it places it entirely beyond the use of the masses; though its literary merit is elevated in the eye of the Samourai, so that it claims scholarly respect. If it is translated in the purely Japanese dialect, it becomes simple and apparently childish, and has little merit with the higher class; in fact, it is impossible to properly express spiritual truth in a language so immature, and so filled with crude mythological terms as the pure Japanese.

The translators are forced, therefore, to strike a balance between the literary or classic language, and this simple but insufficient Japanese vernacular. This is accomplished by using as few Chinese terms as possible, and then explaining them in the margin so that common people may understand.

Shortly after returning from the trip to Kioto, I was called upon to bury my faithful servant Sam Patch.

It was somewhat remarkable that he died exactly three years from the day I first engaged him, and that my contract with the Japanese Government expired about the same date.

Though an associate of humble capacity, Sam was faithful in his own little sphere, and he was the only individual who remained uninteruptedly with me during my sojourn in the country. He had been unwell before I started on the Kioto trip, and I sent him to the Tokio hospital, where he had good care. But he was imprudent in leaving the hospital too soon, so as to have my house in good order on my return.

I sent him back to the hospital, and visited him one evening, and took to him the sad news that he must shortly die; for his disease—the "kaki," a kind of dropsy peculiar to the Japanese, was approaching his heart. The poor fellow was never very brave, and he cried a little; for he thought he was getting better. I tried to comfort him with his Christian hope, and then bade him good night. The next day he was dead, and when I came to the house where he had been removed, he was already placed in the Japanese coffin!

To give some idea of the Japanese mode of treating the dead, I will briefly state how Sam's remains were disposed of:

Immediately after death, and before the body became rigid, he was placed in the ordinary square coffin, with head bowed and knees doubled up and crossed in front, causing him to occupy a space so small as would appear incredible. When I first went into the room it was nearly midnight, and I had flickering candle in my hand. Seeing a box scarcely three feet square in the corner of the room, I was told that it contained all that remained of poor Sam. Raising the lid, I glanced in and saw what appeared a shapeless bundle, with hand or foot projecting here and there; and this was the comfortless manner in which the Japanese usually bury their dead.

Sam's face, when raised, was calm and natural, and in his hand was a Testament which I had given him the year before, and which his wife had placed there to be buried with him, though whether at his request or not I do not know.

The little funeral occurred the following day. At the conclusion of the service, the hearse, which is a temple-shaped cart, five feet high, backed up to the door, and the sides and roof being taken off, the square box was pushed inside. The hearse was then put together again by piecemeal, and two old men drove it off amid the sobs of some and the smiles of others.

Arriving at the temple, I stopped the hearse at the main gate, and hurried forward to see if the grave had been dug as I directed. Pumbling my way through the compact rows of ancient monuments and head stones, in the gathering darkness, I stumbled on the freshly turned earth, and found the deep square hole prepared as had been promised.

Coming back I met Mr. Arthur who found that the grave-yard was so cold and damp that it would be imprudent in his state of health to remain longer. So I thanked him and his good and amiable wife, and advised them to return, saying that it was too chilly for them, and I would bury poor Sam alone. (My good friend Mr. Arthur died of consumption only a year or two after this.)

Bidding them good night, I turned towards the temple, and was surprised to find it illuminated, and to hear a Buddhist service going on within. Stepping up to the porch and entering, I found a tastefully decorated apartment with mats and polished floors, and solemn-looking labyrinths beyond the dark line of pillars. Two finely robed priests sat upon a raised dais before the altar, intoning their prayers in a rapid and measured way, which struck me as being a funeral dirge; they took no notice of me as I stood in the shadow of the hall, looking on. The altar was a beautiful object, ablaze with tapers and shining with the gilt idols and golden leaves of the lotus lilies. Incense was burning before it in a bronze brazier, and the pleasant fragrance slowly filled the temple. But what attracted my attention was the white covered square box, placed directly in front of the altar, with a tall stick or tablet standing against it, having a name written upon it in Chinese, which I could not understand. Of course I knew that this box contained a dead person, but who it was I did not at the moment imagine.

I was simply awaiting the removal of my own box from the hearse, and certainly intended no heathen rites to supplement the Christian service already held. But getting suspicious, finally I stole by the priests and went silently up to the altar.

There, sure enough, was my box, with Sam's body in it, for it had the same bunch of flowers and bamboo reed upon it, which had been placed on the lid. My first impulse was to stop the service; for, without my knowing it, they had brought the body in, while I was in the grave-yard, and had commenced their heathen rites as usual. As I afterwards learned, the sin, or present of money, which I had previously given the priests, made them polite and particularly anxious to do the thing up well.

I knew that Sam would not have highly indorsed this service himself, neither was it exactly compatible with the doctrines of the Testament within the coffin which stood before the heathen altar. Nevertheless, there was a novel interest in the scene, and as the service was soon completed, the chief priest bowed, and led the way to the cemetery, still repeating strange sounds, and wearing his silken robes. The bearers followed with the square box, which was safely lowered into the grave. The cemetery was lit up by the glare of the torches and lanterns; and as the priest retired I leaned upon a gravestone, and waited to see the grate properly filed.

My engagement with the Japanese Government was twice renewed at shorter intervals of several months, but as I did not feel that my life work was to be in Japan, I made preparations toward the spring of the year to start homeward.

On March 7th I met many of the students of the Kusei Gakko, at a farewell gathering held in Dr. Veeder's house, as my own house was now in disorder with packing boxes and trunks, and we all spent a pleasant evening together.

At the close I made the students a little speech, expressing my sorrow at parting, and giving them encouragement and hope for the future.

They all seemed to feel deeply in reference to my departure, and also manifested no little awe at the formidable journey before me. One student, who was a most regular attendant upon my Bible-classes, but who formerly opposed Christianity, said to me, "Sir, we shall never meet again in this world, but I trust we shall meet in heaven." He then asked me to write my name and his own in a Bible and hymn-book which I had given him. Another student said, "Sir, you have taught us great and beautiful things, both in science and in religion; and we are very thankful, and will never forget your kindness." Others said, "We wish you a happy time in your long voyage, and we know not where we may ever see you, but we hope somewhere."

Such expressions as these were heart-warming, and showed that the Japanese students were still as kindly affectionate and grateful as I had ever found them during nearly four years' intercourse and instruction.

The light, to which our minds have been turned, was the watch-tower of the righteous in all ages, and is the same to the righteous in this age; and all people upon the face of the earth, and all pretended watchmen in Christendom, who watch not in this tower, watch in vain, and see nothing that profits. This is the word of truth to all people.

This light is the one everlasting way that leads into Him that fits and prepares to enter the kingdom of heaven, gives free access to God, and the throne of his grace, and presents unto Him without spot or wrinkle. Many are witnesses of the beginning of this blessed work, and have received that faith, whereby they believe the accomplishment of it; in which, as they live and abide, the blessed experience of the finishing of it shall be added to their faith.—J. Sweden.

Summer Penitillings.

War.—How true it is that war is the extremity of evil! and that a resort to the arbitrament of the sword to settle national disputes, is both extremely impolitic and highly unchristian. Traisms like these must more and more permeate and leave the public mind, in proportion as the gospel of the kingdom of Christ is allowed full place in the hearts and consciences of men. How long nation will be permitted to lift up sword against nation, or to go on learning to war and fight, is only known to the Great Arbitrer, whose beloved Incarnate Son is declared to be the Prince of Peace; and of The increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end.

That man should fight and destroy his fellow man, though permitted under a less perfect dispensation, yet then but at the express command and going forth of the Eternal, is one of those outrageous horrors which belong not to these new covenant days; when instead of retaliation for injuries, love is to be the Christian's badge and armor; because as Christ our Lawgiver has said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

Oh! how fiend-like is the strife and madness upon the field of battle! How wickedness reigns! How cursing and bitterness, malice and death cry aloud and prevail!

To rush into a fixed eternal state,
Out of the very flames of rage and hate,
Or send another shivering to the bar,
With all the guilt of such unchristian war,
Whatever use may urge, or honor plead,
On reason's verdict is a madman's deed."

When will the benign principles of the gospel of Jesus be suffered to leaven all hearts, so that instead of this blasting scourge of war being resorted to, nations no less than individuals, the whole like its parts, shall have recourse to the more civilized, as well as more expeditious and righteous course of submitting to pacific arbitration the grievance, whatever it be, and thus now and forever banish a scene so calculated to glut not only the carrion-loving birds of the air, with mangled human flesh, but Satan and his angels, with fields of horrid wickedness and death's eternal reign.

Dishonest Flour-dealers.—Colonel Meadows

Taylor, in relating his East Indian experiences, tells of being beset by pilgrims and travellers crying out against the flour-sellers, who not only gave their customers short weight, but adulterated the flour with sand. He determined to punish the cheats, and told, he says, "some reliable men of my escort to go quietly into the bazaars, and each buy flour at a separate shop, being careful to note whose shop it was. The flour was brought to me. I tested every sample, and found it full of sand as I passed it under my teeth. I then desired all the persons named in my list to be sent to me, with their baskets of flour; their weights and their scales. Shortly afterwards they arrived, evidently suspecting nothing, and were placed in a row on the grass before my tent. 'Now, said I gravely, 'each one of you is to weigh out a leer [two pounds] of flour; which was done.

'Is it for the pilgrims?' asked one.

'No,' said I, quietly, though I had much difficultly keep my countenance, 'You must eat it yourselves.'

"They saw that I was in earnest, and offered to pay any fine I imposed.

"Not so," I returned; 'you have made many eat your flour; why should you object to eat it yourselves.'

"They were horribly frightened; and amid the screams of laughter and jeers of the bystanders, some of them actually began to eat, spattering out the half-moistened flour, which could be heard crunching between their teeth. At last some of them flung themselves on their faces, abjectly beseeching pardon; and so, with a severe admonition they were let off. No more was heard of the bad flour."—Chambers' Journal.

Tannessassa, 11th mo. 14th, ———.

To Samuel Cope.

For some time past thou hast often been brought to my recollection, which has afforded me pleasant feelings, accompanied by desires for thy encouragement to bear patiently thy trials, and persevere in a faithful discharge of the duties which thy Divine Master may please to require of thee. Dear friend, if our spiritual eye is kept single, and we are truly given up to serve the Lord, I firmly believe there will not be any trials, afflictions or privations permitted to come upon us, but what we shall be enabled to bear, and through the blessing of an all-wise Providence, may in the end work together for our good; neither services required, but that we shall, in his time and strength, be enabled to perform. There is therefore no cause for discouragement, but on the contrary cause for great encouragement to those who are willing to take the Master's blessed yoke upon them, and to be taught of Him; yea, to wait in silence and in patience to hear the voice of the Great Shepherd. How consolingly He condescends at times to speak to such, and stretches his Divine Arm about them, causing them to feel the warming influence of his love. There is another great blessing that is at times bestowed upon us, poor unworthy creatures, that I feel willing to mention, and have reason to be very thankful that I have at times been favored to feel, and desire (although very unworthy), that I may continue to feel it, that is, a sense of our own poverty, weakness and entire insufficiency to do any good thing of ourselves. Oh! how humbling, how profitable, yea, and may I not say, at times, how comforting it is to feel this, especially when we do not feel condemnation, and know the Lord to be our strength. Oh! were we but enough concerned to dig deep and lay our foundation upon that Blessed Rock which cannot be shaken, (this was the foundation, I believe, our early Friends built on), then, fruitless would be the efforts of the enemy to divide and scatter in our much tried, yet highly favored Society. Although at the present I cannot attend meetings with my friends, yet I am glad that there is a society of people with whom I can say I feel entire unity, and with whom I hope again ere very long to mingle<sup>3</sup> and enjoy the privilege of Society.

In regard to the time when it would be right for me to leave I can only say, that in the spring (last), when I thought my mind was favored, I (felt) it would not be required of me to remain here a great while. When I thought of staying beyond a certain time which I have not been able to measure, there seemed to be darkness. I have sometimes thought it might be next spring. I desire to be resigned, submitting all to a kind and merciful Master. If thou art able to feel anything in regard to it, please mention it in thy letter, as I wish thee to write as soon as thou feels liberty so to do.

In sincere love I remain thy friend,
EBENEZER WORTH.

The Children's Week.

[In former years we have called attention to this excellent charity, by which some of the poor children of our large cities have been treated to a week or two of residence in the pure air of the country. The following article in reference to the same subject, was contributed to the Public Ledger by an active worker in this benevolent enterprise. It is a fitting introduction to "A Fresh-Air Song," describing a somewhat similar movement in England.]

To every friend of children who has helped us this summer and, indeed, to all who wish our work success, we should like to report progress to the present time. So far we number 391 children and 29 adults, the latter mostly with infants. The nominal week has averaged, for boarders, 8; for invited guests, 14 days. Some of the latter still remain, which will make the final average for visitors longer. We have received $982.75, of which we have expended, for board, travelling expenses and incidentals, $639. Hospitality, true family hospitality, has been tendered heartily. Money has been given without personal begging. But we are obliged to add that applications pour in more profusely than all. We wish the friend who has just sent us a remembrance all the way from Bar Harbor, Maine, could see with his own eyes, and add to his own sea breezes, the invigoration he has given to at least six of his little fellow citizens in Philadelphia. And, on the other hand, we wish that those friends whose attention has not yet been called to this need, could read a page or two from our book of applications. Some of these, of course, are from mothers, whose sufficiently sturdy offspring would simply like a little fun, but there are still many, far too many for us to satisfy until our society is more widely known, whom we yet feel that we must attend to, if we are to sleep 'nights in our own airy beds. There is, for instance, the woman who goes out washing, whose little Rhody has to be alone all day, and "seems to be going down some how—just piping like in the closeness, and nothing will bring her out of it." And the woman who makes "gents' pants" at $3 per dozen pairs, who can't afford to leave now, but thinks work is going to be slack soon, and then a week's chance might "stiffen her up for the winter." And the endearing cigar maker, who would gladly take care of the horse and the other children, if only his wife could get away for a week with the wizened baby, who sits on his knee and looks at you solemnly, while its very small pink claws close over your finger, and who "don't somehow seem to be able to learn to walk." And there is the woman of 15, whose "pap" is a minus quantity, by reason of the corner tavern and who has never found time to go to school on account of helping to support the family by "gumming the shields into gents' neckties," and taking care of the four children.

"And how old are the children, Polly?"

"Mostly three, ma'am."

And now they have discovered that, if she is to be mainstay for this winter, they had better do without her for this week, and get her "toned up a little." And there is the young girl who works in a "millinery;" she has a hemorrhage now and then, but thinks "if she had a chance to give up and be sick for a week, she could get up her strength for the fall business."

And, added to these, we have some cases which do not go off very easily, and which we now offer for special consideration. Item, several uncouth little girls, whose hair is not soft and curly, and who sometimes forget and say "Hey?" when spoken to suddenly, but who would go back with brighter eyes, and even prettier manners, for a week in a better home. Item, a few very human boys, who need no eye to hand them forbidden fruit, especially if unripe, and yet who do so much need a little change of air. Item, a woman with an epileptic son, not repulsive or troublesome, whose doctor says she must take him to the country. But how, doctor? Item, a woman with three children, all too young to leave with "him." Item, a colored woman, good worker, but run down. For all such cases we prefer private hospitality. Failing in this, we can secure a week's board at $2 for children, and $2.50 to $3 for a mother and babe, or others requiring a little more attention. There will still be some weeks of August and September weather when the atmosphere of a city homestead which consists of one room will be somewhat musty and "nuggly," and when, if the family be large, there will not be oxygen enough to go round. And after the schools re-open there will be women, with and without small children, who would gladly sew or work a little for the sake of the rest and change. One we have, just out of the doctor's hands, whose recovery, probably whose life, depends on her getting, at this time, fresh air and wholesome food.

Thus far we have spoken chiefly of the need of relief from discomfort; but it is the positive side of our work, the actual exhilaration and happiness it produces, which brings the immediate reward. Children do not carry their cares with them. Set a dish of pleasure before them, they beam over it without a thought of past privation. A gentleman, reporting his guest for this year, remarked: "Life seemed almost too full for her; the fields, the flowering weeds, the great sky, excited her to constant wonder; all the old playthings that on her own boy, about her age, had thrown aside as done with, seemed to grow alive again; she was eager about something all the time."

And although in young minds the sense of past trouble fades, the sense of past pleasure lasts, to reflect a little sunshine over the after days. We have just heard of a pretty, gentle little girl who spent a week by invitation last summer in our neighborhood. Both her father and mother were drunkards, and her home was purgatory. She died this spring, and to her Sunday-school teacher, who was with her near the last, she talked of "that me when she lived in the country." She said, "It is the only happy week I remember all my life." She is dead; but I think that hospitality was not wasted. Who can say how often some little incident of that memorable time comes back to remind her that life is not all violence and meanness? And how often the thought that she was reinvited in this summer has tidied her over some moment of childish despair? Such an event as such a life was not a trifle; it was the unnsen, but far larger part of the blessing which any good man or woman may confer on almost any child whom they merely invite to a week of fresh air in the country.

A FRESH AIR SONG.

Six hours of sunshine! six bright hours of gladness!
 Six hours of joy! amongst grass, and flowers, and trees;
 Six hours' escape from want, and woe, and sadness;
 Six hours of butterflies, and birds, and bees!
 What's all they pray for; all these tiny creatures,
 Stunted and squallid, ask of you, 's one day,
 To let God's breezes fan their wee, wan features,
 One day from their dark homes to get away.

One day to leave the foetid court and alley,
 To breathe pure air, to hear the wild bird's song;
 One day to track the brook around the valley;
 One day!—Oh! say, my brothers, is't not long?

One day I ere you answer, go and seek the places
 Where huddled closely these poor children live;
 All them to you, and gaze into their faces,
 Before you make your mind up not to give.

Speak to the saddest; talk of lambs and clover,
 Of poppies, cowslips—what their eyes the while,
 And as the country's treasures you run over,
 The weariest look shall quicken with a smile.

Be shyest lips shall whisper the petition—
 "Oh! let us see again the grass and trees?"
 And hist! tiny arches, guessing at your mission,
 Shall gather 'round and chorus: "Oh, do, please!"

Or is it this one day alone brings pleasure,
 Think of the weeks of hope that came before;
 And then the after-hours of joys past measure,
 Which follow when that outing brief is o'er.

Or, come, shall they ask in vain? Can you deny them
 This day's oasis in their desert year?
 All not your willing nite and day to buy them
 This mitigation of a life so drear?

Or, but your answer we've no doubt whatever;
 Of course the little ones must have their day!
 And Heaven will bless you for your kind endeavor,
 To do them good in such a welcome way!

VANITAS VANITATUM.

What is it to be wise?
 'Tis but to know how little can be known.—Pope.

A poor, poor fellow, a very good fellow,
 Went merrily by the sea,
 Looking at times to the starry heaven,
 At times to the wild waves free.

And said to himself, wise-looking,
 "I'd know the eternal plan;
 I'd solve the riddle of fortune,
 The meaning of God and man."

And a voice came out of the darkness,
 Out, perchance, from his soul—

"Thou fool! wouldst fadle the ocean
 Into the rind of a bowl!
 Wouldst make thee thine eye the circle
 Of all that the worlds contain,
 Or gather the stars in a chalice
 No bigger than thy brain?"

Out of the dark came brightness,
 And a second voice replied—

"Forgive me, oh, forgive me,
 My arrogance and pride!
 Wisdom is born of folly,
 And folly from wisdom grows;
 And he is the wisest of men
 Who knows how little he knows."

—Belgravia.

A PARABLE.

Selected.

Quoth a little brown seed, "I do not know
 Why it is I must struggle and grow;
 When the earth is so warm, and dark, and still,
 I would never leave it, had I my will.

But something urges me still away;
 I must strive and struggle; I cannot stay;
 Though what awaits me above up there,
 I do not know, and I do not care."

But ah! when the seed to blossom grew,
 Rocked by the zephyrs and fed by the dew,
 And gently unfolded to light and sun
 Its delicate flowers, one by one—

It softly sang to each laughing breeze,
 "Surely no glories were ever like these!
 This history of sunshine is life indeed
 I could never have dreamed of, when but a seed."

And what are we, in this life of ours,
 But seeds of God's future-blooming flowers?
 Shall we murmur and grieve that we do not know
 For what He would have us struggle and grow?

Nay! I will patiently work His will 'Mid earth's mysterious gloom, until Beneath His sunshine, and in His hand
 Our souls shall blossom and understand.
 From "Faith and Works."

HARMONY.

Selected.

I had the day-break bring to me
 Its own sweet song of ecstasy:
 An answer came from leafy trees,
 And waking birds and wandering bees,
 And wavellets on the water's brim—
 The matin hymn—the matin hymn!

I asked the moon for music then,
 It echoed forth the hum of men;
 The sounds of labor on the lips,
 The loud voice—eloquence of mind;
 The heart—the soul's sublime pulsations,
 The song—the shout—the shock of nations.

I hastened from the restless throng,
 To soothe me with the evening song,
 The darkening heaven was vocal still,
 I heard the music of the rill—
 The homeward bee—the vesper bell—
 The cicadee—and philomet.

Thou Omnipresent Harmony!
 Shades, streams and stars are full of thee;
 On every wing—in every sound
 Thine all-pervading power is found;
 Some chord to touch—some tale to tell—
 Deep,—deep, within the spirit's cell.

Narcotics and Intoxicants.

In a thoughtful article on this subject, published in last month's number of The Contemporary Review, Dr. B. W. Richardson refers to a former paper in 1868 on the properties of Chloral Hydrate. He says:—

"In this Chloral Hydrate we were found to possess an agent very soluble and manageable, which, introduced into the body of a man or other animal, quickly caused the deepest possible sleep, a sleep prolonged for many hours, and which could be brought so near to the sleep of death that an animal in it might pass for dead and still recover. In this substance we found that we had an agent which was actually decomposed within the blood and which in its decomposition yielded the product chloroform, which caused the sleep; a product which distilled over, as it were, from the blood into the nervous structure and gave rise to the deep narcotism."

"Yet, now that ten years have passed away, and I have lived to see the influence on mankind, I almost regret that I took any part whatever in the introduction of the agent into the practice of healing and the art of medicine."

That which occasioned this uneasiness in the mind of Dr. Richardson was a case which occurred within a year of the introduction of Chloral into medical use, in which a man who had been before accustomed to the use of alcohol, formed the habit of taking Chloral three or four times in the twenty-four hours, and thus induced the same craving desire for it, that possessed the devotee of spirituous liquors. The effect on the system was very deleterious, producing not only disturbance of the functions of the brain and nerves, but symptoms analogous to jaundice and scurvy. To this new form of disease the name of Chloralism has been given, and it has continued to spread to a moderate extent among the middle classes of the community, along with the undue use of the medicine which has produced it.

The history of Chloralism is of interest as showing how easily a simple scientific discovery may be misapplied, when its misapplication ministers to some luxurious desire or morbid inclination of mankind.

There are many substances and all of a poisonous character, which come into use for the purpose of making the mind oblivious, or in other words for securing repose and rest. In extent of use the different forms of alcohol and tobacco stand first in the list. Among civilized people, next to these come opium, absinthe, chloral hydrate, chlorodyne, ether and chloroform. The other substances are local in their range of employment. Hashish is an Eastern luxury; amantine a Kambschatka luxury; arsenic a Styrian luxury; red-thorn apple a luxury of the Indians of the Andes, under the influence of which they enter into communion, as they believe, with the spirits of their departed dead.

These substances are very various in their action on the system in their early stages, yet there are some points of common resemblance. One is they all destroy life when we let them have full play. Another property common to them all, and in which lies one of their most potent powers for evil is this: That the repetition of their use produces a craving or desire for them. This is so marked a property, that the most painful of lessons connected with the first use is soon forgotten in the after sense of desire. It matters little what the substance is, the craving for it will continue when it has made an abiding impression on the system. This is the case with alcohol, tobacco, opium, chloral, hashish, absinthe and arsenic. These substances are very unlike to the senses, sensibilities and methods of taking them; yet a craving may be established for any of them. The devotee to one will laugh at the devotee to another; each one will consider the other almost insane, and yet each will follow his own course.

Such cravings may be established for almost any substance, even those quite outside the natural wants of a healthy life. Dr. Huxham had in his practice a patient whose life was endangered through a habit of swallowing Bicarbonate of Ammonia; Sir Humphrey Davy found himself in danger of becoming a slave to the inhalation of nitrous oxide gas; a scientific friend of Dr. Richardson, in experimenting on chloroform gradually became so devoted to its use, that his health broke down, and it was only by most earnest effort that he freed himself from it after a struggle with the old desire that lasted four years; and similar cravings have been acquired for valerian, turpentine and even assafoetida.

The nature of this craving is not more singular than its intensity when once it has been acquired. It is an indefinable desire. It is neither thirst, nor hunger, nor pleasure, nor reasonable want. It is rather like a wish to be relieved for the moment of some indescribable sense of pain or discomfort. The action of the intoxicating substances involves in its evils structural parts of the animal body; the craving increases as the animal powers decline, and the tendency to death is quickened in its course. Their tendency is not only towards premature physical death, but also toward premature mental death.

After a careful review of the whole subject, and with a knowledge of the argument sometimes urged, that these deadly agents are necessities, instinctively selected and chosen to meet human wants, Dr. Richardson thus enunciates the conclusion at which he had arrived:—

"To my mind, and I wish to be as open to conviction on this point as any one can be, I fail to discover a single opening for the use of these lethal agents in the service of mankind, save in the most exceptional conditions of disease, and then only under skilled and thoughtful supervision, from hands that know the danger of infusing a false movement and life into so exquisite an organism as a living, breathing, pulsating, impressionable human form." A word to mothers respecting the manner of dressing the dear children committed to their care. "In the morning sow thy seed." Those mothers who are concerned rightly so to do, will stand acquitted. "Let her alone, she has done what she could."

Thomas Shillitoe, in a visit paid to the Women's Yearly Meeting (Philadelphia), in 1829, "mentioned his exercise on account of the manner in which mothers dress their children in younger life; though to appearance tolerably consistent themselves, yet, by their conduct in these matters, prove they were not abiding under the power of the cross in themselves."

Sarah Cresson "believed the time was coming that the Babylonish garment would be searched out: that though some might say these were little things, yet they were an outward and visible sign of inward want."

Hannah Williams says: "A great deal rests on parents while their children are young and growing up, to watch, guard, help and explain, restrain and tenderly entreat, and not give out. Few children could be so stubborn as not to yield, and in after years thank heartily their parents for this wholesome care; though it was hard to them awhile, yet the yoke would become easy." This she testified from living experience. Speaking of her mother's firmness, she says: "Her care of me when young is sealed in my heart, where I have a testimony to bear to the good effect of early religious care: my desire was strong to be like those of my age, in dress, &c., to which she yielded not, but endeavored to strengthen my mind against the remarks of those who lightly esteemed these things." She also expressed her fear, that "some parents like too well to see something a little smart and tasty, and so give away their strength, that when the children grow older and exceed bounds, they can do nothing."

Bishop Campbell of Philadelphia, of the African Methodist Episcopal Society, has gone to England as a fraternal delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference. He is the first representative ever sent to that conference by the colored Methodists.

Methodism in Sweden.—The statistics furnished to a recent Conference show the number of members to be 5,536.

At an Episcopal place of worship in Montrose, Scotland, a few weeks ago, the incumbent gave out a hymn and announced, that as he had forgotten his manuscript, there would be no sermon that forenoon.

Since Rome became the capital of united Italy, twelve Protestant places of worship have been built in that city, of which three are Episcopal and two Methodist. The Baptists and Presbyterians have one each. Bibles are now openly sold in the streets of the principal cities of Italy.

It is stated that there are now in Japan 43 Protestant church organizations, with 1500 members; 2000 scholars attend the First-day schools.

Some of the missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel are meeting with great success in British Guiana. The Hindu coolies last fall, of their own accord, held a public meeting to discuss the question as to which was the true religion. With but one dissenting voice, the assembly voted to accept the Christian religion. They then sent for a teacher, and one was given. The coolies say that they will build a place of worship and support it themselves. There is also a similar movement among the 20,000 Hindus in Trinidad.

In the synopsis of the Wesleyan Annual Report concerning persecution in Portugal, the following passage occurs: "Mr. Moreton and two members of his congregation were, a short while ago, followed from their place of worship by a rude and ragged mob, who pelted them with mud, and hooted and threatened them with personal injury. The mob was composed of ruffians, bare-footed women, and some decently dressed men, who were their leaders. The cries were, 'Long live the Holy Father, Leo XIII! Long live the Immaculate Conception! Long live the religion of the State! Death to the Propaganda!' by which they meant the Mission."

There has been so much rain in Great Britain that the bishops have ordered the clergy to offer prayers for fair weather. At a meeting in Wales the rector opened his book accidentally or inadvertently at the "Prayer for Rain," and before he discovered his mistake, had gone with great earnestness through the long petition for "rain on the inheritance," and through the accompanying manifesto of the great evils attendant upon "dryness" in the land. He did not see his error until he had finished his sonorous utterance. In the evening he tried to mend matters by a very emphatic reading of the right prayer.

The president and faculty of Princeton College have notified the parents or guardians of every member of the Sophomore class, that any student found guilty of hazing will be at once and irrevocably expelled. This measure, it is thought by the authorities, will have the effect of substantially quelling what has become one of the greatest sources of foolish annoyance to the Freshman class upon entering college. No modification of this order will be made under any circumstances, nor favor of any single scholar.

A Righteous Decision.—President Hays after careful consideration of the subject, has decided that he would not interfere in the case of D. M. Bennett, who had been sentenced to imprisonment in the New York Penitentiary for sending obscene matter through the mail. The effort made by his friends to obtain his release is said to be one of the most extraordinary in the annals of petitions for pardon. The Attorney General received petitions from all parts of the country, signed by nearly one hundred and fifty thousand people. It is difficult to account for this zeal in a bad cause unless it be due to the influence of the infidel party, who last summer manifested so much sympathy with the advocates of free distribution of corrupt literature.

At a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in Yeddo, Japan, a memorial was drawn up to the Japanese Imperial Government, asking for more liberal provisions in the subject of passports authorizing foreigners to travel in Japan. The subject of hotel accommodation was also discussed. It was stated that in some cases the antipathy to foreigners was marked that the natives refused to provide accommodation on the most trivial and flimsy reasons. Several missionaries had been refused a shelter on the plea that the proprietors were not at home, and their underlings would not take the responsibility of admitting foreign guests. The experience of another evangelist worker was, that in some cases he had been refused lodgings because, as he was told the native guests at that place refused to remain if ijinsun (foreigners) were allowed to stay. A third stated that some of the native hotel-keepers, by their exorbitant bills, evidently intended to keep Europeans away while others were bold enough to inform the travellers that, being foreigners, they were nuisances, and could not be tolerated inside their houses. It is but fair to state, however that although the previous testimonies were, in every case, the result of experience, there were other workers present who acknowledged that, although they had traveled off and far, they had, as a rule, experienced kind and civil treatment at the hands of the Japanese.

In the time of John Wesley, one of his preachers, named John Nelson, was pressed into the army; but he adhered firmly to the gospel of peace, and refused to fight. He was taken before a court-martial, by a file of musketeers with their bayonets fixed. When questioned by the court, Nelson answered: "I shall not fight; for I cannot bow my knee before the Lord to pray for man, and get up and kill him when I have done; I know God both hears me pray and sees me act; and I should expect the lot of a hypocrite if my actions were to contradict my prayers."—London Herald of Peace.

A Hawk that Could Reason.—A physician, living at Cambridge, Md., sends to the Youth's Companion this graphic description of the usual robbery of a fish-hawk by a bald-headed eagle: "I had just left the dinner-table, to walk across the lawn with my children, when my attention was attracted by furious screams in the upper air. A dark shadow flitted across the grounds. Looking up, I saw a fish-hawk flying low in a straight line, and pursued at a hundred yards distance by a bald-headed eagle. The hawk was moving leisurely, so much so that I was struck by the little dread of capture which his flight exhibited, and the fear that his startling cries betokened. The intentions of the eagle were soon seen. A few strokes of his powerful wings brought him close to the hawk. The screaming fisherman relinquished his prey, which quivered and gleamed in the sunlight like a disc of silver as it clove the air in its descent toward the earth. It was a small fish, apparently a perch. We were a little surprised that the rapacious bandit should have devoted his powers to the capture of such small game. The fish had not fallen fifty feet before the eagle, by a peculiar dip rather than by the use of his wings sank below it, and turning almost upon his back, slouched and bore it away. He flew in an opposite direction to that the hawk was going. The hawk seemed satisfied to have escaped with the loss of his property, and kept the even tenor of his way. But our attention was again arrested by renewed screams. Looking at the hawk, we noticed that he was a changed bird as to conduct. Visibly agitated, he was urging his flight with surprising energy. A glance at the robber revealed the cause of the change. The eagle had turned, and again was in pursuit. The hawk seemed almost frantic in his struggles to escape. A torrent of cries, screams, maledictions and imprecations poured from his throat. He vainly beat the air, flying now higher, now lower, now straight forward. The eagle came down upon him in swifter flight, causing us to wonder as to the cause of the pursuit. In a few moments he came almost in contact with his fleeing victim, with outstretched talons, and poisoning himself above the hawk as if to tear him in pieces, he uttered a loud, shrill scream. Instantly we saw, leaving the claws of the hawk, a second fish, much larger than the first. The eagle did not see it until it had fallen a hundred feet. Desisting at once from his threatened attack, and half closing his wings, he plunged swiftly downward below the fish, turned on his back, and clutching it, bore it off in triumph. The hawk, with a wail of vexation and resentment, suddenly continued his flight. The fact suggests a curious speculation. Did the hawk part designedly with the smaller fish? If so, it exhibited an intelligence which we have been accustomed to observe only in beings of a much higher order."

Benicia's Bottomless Pit.—As the construction train that runs between Fairfield and Benicia was engaged in hauling gravel for ballast on the road, it met with a narrow escape from being engulfed in the bowels of the earth, with all the train bands on board. A short distance out of Benicia, and beyond Government Point, is a piece of level land that, when the road was being built, seemed almost impossible to make solid. Thousands and thousands of yards of dirt were thrown upon it, and yet in a short time, even through the night, it appeared as if some unseen power was underneath the ground, who would open a vast trap door, and out of sight the whole amount of earth would go. At last it appeared as if human energies and skill had successfully combated with and overcome the unseen power. The road was ballasted and track finally laid, and the railroad authorities were secretly smiling at the thought of having their road in good working order by the course of September. A few final touches were required on the road in the shape of gravel and earth, so the construction train, under the supervision of Engineer Sankey, of South Vallejo, was brought into requisition, and had been running back and forth between the two stations meantime with apparent safety. Saturday, upon approaching the place which is known as the "bottomless pit," the engineer noticed the earth having a depressed appearance, but he was so far advanced that it was impossible for him to stop, and having on a powerful head of steam, he opened the valve and went rushing over the dangerous place, and at the same time felt the ground settling under the train. In a moment, almost, they were over the morass, and upon checking the engine, the men on the train looked back, and for a distance of over 300 feet they saw the ground, the ties and the track in one vast body sink down into the bottomless pit to a distance of 50 feet. It was indeed a miraculous escape, and no doubt the men offered up a silent prayer that the ground had not descended beneath them when the train was over the sink hole. By this catastrophe operations will have to be suspended on the road for the time being, if not entirely. It is almost a foregone conclusion that that portion of the road can never be made safe to travel over. Without doubt the company will start in and endeavor to obtain the right of way around the hills out of the town of Bridgeport, as that will be the only safe route that can be found. That was the way desired in the first place by the railroad company, but at that time it appeared almost impossible to secure the right to build the road that way. The bottomless pit has been of more expense to the company in endeavoring to fill it in with earth than the remainder of the road between that part and Fairfield.—Vallejo Chronicle.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 30, 1879.

In the account of the proceedings of London Yearly Meeting published in "The Friend" of 6th mo. 25th last, there was printed a notice of the report of the deputation appointed by that body the previous year to visit both branches of the Western Yearly Meeting. This notice was extracted from The British Friend. In it, the following paragraph occurs:—"Whatever individual difference of opinion there might have been, the deputation could not ascertain that there was any difference of view in doctrine between those Friends who retired and the recognized principles of the body. It seemed more to be due to misgiving and mistrust of certain practices which had been used by individuals in revival and mission meetings, and which they believed the Yearly Meeting practically recognized."

We learn through different channels, that the members of the Smaller Body in Western Yearly Meeting feel that injustice is done them by this Report, in not properly setting forth the governing motive which influenced them to withdraw from communion with their fellow members. While it is true that there is no "difference of view in doctrine between those Friends who retired and the recognized principles of the body"—that is, of the Society of Friends,—as those principles have been held from its beginning by all its faithful members; yet a belief that those principles were largely departed from by the meetings with which they were associated was the very ground which these Friends put forth as justifying a step which would have been without excuse on any other plea.

In their official declaration, "A testimony for the Truth," published for the information of Friends everywhere, they clearly set this forth, and enumerate several doctrines inconsistent with those believed by true Friends, which were preached in their meetings.

A letter written by one of the members of the Smaller Body, says, "This deputation was carefully informed that the separation took place on account of meetings in authority admitting unsound doctrines to be preached, and many of our former practices to be laid down; that those Friends who believed it right to uphold the true doctrines and practices of Friends could not do it and remain with what they (the deputation) called the body of Friends. This deputation was pleased with by some of our Friends, to give the matter a careful examination, but the reply was (in substance) 'We can do nothing but tenderly ask you to come back to the body of Friends you have left.'"

Another communication, written by one who was at the Yearly Meeting, says,—"When one of a few Friends who obtained an interview with the deputation, undertook to unfold to them the unsound doctrines and practices held by the leaders in the larger body, he was at once stopped; they did not want to hear a word from him about it."

The deputation probably felt that to enter on such an investigation as they were asked to undertake would be going beyond the commission with which they were entrusted, and they therefore avoided doing it. Yet without a thorough knowledge of the causes which led to the separation in the Western Yearly Meeting, we do not see how an effectual remedy could be applied. Nor are we surprised that the Friends visited should feel but little inclination to accept the counsel of those who declined to enter into an examination of the reasons which seemed to them to justify the course they had taken.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—An earthquake shock was felt on the morning of the 22d inst., at Lockport and Niagara, N. Y., and several adjacent points in Canada.

Dr. C. F. McDonald, Superintendent of the Money Order System of F. O. Department, has been appointed a special commissioner, on behalf of the United States, for the purpose of visiting Europe to confer with the postal administrations of England and Germany in regard to modifications in existing conventions for the exchange of money orders between those countries and the United States, with a view to greater efficiency and economy in this service.

The annual circular of the Director of the Mint, shows that the dollar is the monetary unit of eight countries. The gold dollar of the British possessions of North America, of Liberia and of the Spanish islands, is of the same value as our dollar. The billion value of the silver dollar of the United States is nearly ten cents less than that of the silver dollar of the South American countries.

There are about 40,000 postmasters in the United States and about 10,000 mail carriers. The railway postal service covers nearly 70,000 miles, 20,000 by steamboats, and about 180,000 miles by stage or post riders.

According to the report of Commissioner Morrel to the War Department, the total amount of steel and iron produced annually, is of iron 13,807,725 tons, and of steel 2,770,524 tons. Of the iron, 45.63 per cent. is produced by Great Britain; 16.67 by the United States; 13.16 by Germany; 10.24 by France; 4 per cent. by Belgium; Austria and Hungary each about 3 per cent., and other countries 10 per cent. About 40 per cent of the whole amount of steel is produced by England; United States 26.1 per cent.; Germany 13.1 per cent.; France 10 per cent.; all other countries about 7 1/2 per cent.

The annual production of silver is estimated at $80,000,000 in value; more than half of which comes from our mines.

The debt of the United States, less cash in the Treasury, amounts to $2,027,100,965.

The oil wells in Pennsylvania pour out about 50,000 barrels daily.

The flouring-mill industry in the United States employs 90,000 hands in 25,000 mills, producing yearly about 50,000,000 barrels of flour, of which 4,000,000 are exported.

The annual product of Bessemer steel, in 1878, was 1,874,275 tons, worth at the place of manufacture about $100,000,000. The greatest number of these establishments are in Great Britain—next to this the U. States. After which Belgium, Germany, France and Sweden.

Regular voyages across the Atlantic were commenced in 1825, when the Sirius and Great Western made their first trips.

The proprietor of the Pullman car reports, that paper wheels have run 400,000 miles without repairing; the average running power of a wheel is from 55,000 to 60,000 miles.

The number of cases of yellow fever reported in Memphis the past week was 148. Total deaths to the 23d inst., 177. One death has occurred in New Orleans, one patient has recovered; and it is said there is now no case of the disease in that city.

The number of cases of cholera which took place in — being 22 less than the previous week. Of the whole number 140 were adults and 154 children—105 being under one year of age.

Markets.—U. S. sales, 1881, 1043; 1051; 417; 1902, 1041; 1043; 1048; 1052; 45; 1907, 1011; 1012.

Wool.—Woolens, 12 a 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, in barrels, 5 cts.; refined 61 cts. for export, and 8 cts. for home use.

Flour.—Medium, 5 1/2 cts.; choice, $5.50; and fancy, $5.75; extra, $6. $7. Rye flour, $3.25. Bran, $13.12 a $13.25 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat in good demand and prices firm. Penna. and southern red, 1.07 a $1.09; amber, $1.082 a $1.09; white, $1.09 a $1.09 1/2. Corn, 47 a 49 cts. Oats, 34 a 35 cts. for new white, and 37 a 38 cts. for old.

Produce.—Prime timothy, 65 a 75 cts. for 100 pounds; mixed, 55 a 65 cts.; straw, 60 a 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

The supply of fruit and produce is said to be greater than for several years past. On the 21st, over thirty vessels arrived, with the merchandise which sold at from $2.50 to $10 per hundred. Over 10,000 bushels of cantaloupes came in the same day—they sell from 10 to 30 cts. per bushel. The supply of peaches is unlimited, and sell for what they will bring—the best not selling for more than 75 cts. per bushel. Tomatoes can be had for 10 cts. per annum.

Foreigns.—The debt of Great Britain is given at £777,741,596; France, £967,581,280; Germany, generally deb. £2,541,083; railroad deb. £13,862,656. The consolidated annuities of England, known as "consols," pay 3 per cent. per annum.

The cornerstone of the new Eddy-stone Lighthouse was put in place, with due ceremony, by the Duke of Edinburgh, on the 19th inst. The lighthouse is one of the first importance, and is to take the place of one which was truly the eye of the eye out-to-see the foundation on which it was constructed, but which is being gradually undermined.

Albert Pell, and C. W. Sewell, Read, members of the committee appointed to enquire into the agricultural condition in England, are to sail for America on the 26th inst. The object of their visit is said to be, to enquire as to the amount of live stock and meat which the United States and Canada can export during the next four years, and the cost at which animal food can be produced on the American continent.

The annual rainfall in the United States is said to be the highest ever known in summer.

The Manchester Guardian, in an article reviewing the general position of the cotton manufacturing industry, says: "The winter will be one of the most severe expected, and some time ago the position of the operatives will be considerably aggravated if they have to suffer another reduction. Some of the manufacturers state that the only alternative of closing the factories is another reduction of ten per cent in the wages of the operatives."

The Rev. Mr. Faraday, engaged in laying the new cable, when last spoken on the 19th, was grappling for the cable, which it had been necessary to cut in a storm. The President of the Alpine Club, writing in reference to the recent accident resulting in the death of Dr. William Cecil, says: "The doctor was attempting to vault over a projecting rock, stumbled and fell into the snow beneath, down which he slipped on his back, the surface being frozen. His body was found 2000 feet below where the accident happened."

A despatch from Brussels announces cholera has appeared in some districts in Flanders.

The Austro-Hungarian wheat crop of the present year is said to be 9,000,000 metric centals less than last year, but owing to accumulated stock, only 2,000,000 centals will have to be imported.

The drought in Persia, and some districts in Asiatic Turkey, have been severely affected by the drought. In Mesopotamia the price of wheat has risen to three times its usual rate.

Gospel Ministry—Retraction.

Now, as Christ promised that he would be with his ministers who he sends forth, even unto the end of the world, and that the Holy Ghost should abide with them forever; and that his ministers should bear witness unto him, even unto the uttermost parts of the earth, which has yet scarcely been fully accomplished; it is no more than confiding in the truth and faithfulness of his own declaration to believe that this promise, or these promises of the Father, through his Son Jesus Christ, were meant to be received by his holy and faithful messengers from that day down to the end of the world; and that nothing in the part of the Almighty has ever been one or ordained to shorten its extent as to time or place; or to prevent the perpetuation of such promises; and of Christ, the Saviour from sin, being present with his believing messengers, and with his people and in them, and going before them, and following them as he did the Israelites. And so now, after all the outward favors that have been received, neither son nor daughter can be saved without Christ the Emmanuel, by his light and life, spirit and power, whereby only the heart of man can be regenerated, and sanctified, and delivered from the power of the oppressor, first by bringing them through judgment to repentance; and then by blotting out his former sins, through the sacrifice of his own body; and subsequently by his light in the heart, making him know to refuse the evil and to choose the good, and to show him the good path wherein he ought to go in order to find eternal life, giving unto him the life and quickening power of the Spirit, causing him to be created anew in Christ Jesus, and to be born of the incorruptible seed and Word of God that lives and abides forever; so that the image of God (in which he was first created and from which he fell) may again be restored, and he raised to the glory of his first condition, to the honor of God and praise of Jesus Christ, who came into the world for this purpose.

This great work is alluded to by the apostle when he says, "If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by his life." Rom. v. 10. It is not man nor any mere created thing that can reconcile a sinner unto God; nor is there any power short of the Lord from Heaven a quickening Spirit, that can save man, (although reconciled) from falling into as forlorn a condition as that from which he had been redeemed and delivered. In the accomplishment of man's salvation, it is evident that the apostle as fully accredited the life of Christ as he did the death of Christ—that is, the sanctifying of man's heart and affections by the life of Christ, which is the light of Christ and Spirit of Christ; and thereby keeping him from thus falling through his whole life; as great and necessary a work as the conciliatory offering. It is true that fallen man would naturally have a great desire to be saved by something that has been done, or might be done for him without him, so that he might be spared the pain and trouble—the conflicts and sore trials and fiery baptisms, so necessary for the purification of his heart from his sinful nature. But these are terms on which he cannot be availed of the blessed Paschal sacrifice. Such a disposition, it is to be feared often strongly inclines men when made sensible of their infirmities, to believe and to trust exclusively in that most memorable sacrifice which a merciful God has provided for them, rather than to be at the pains and cost as well as disturbance of the work of the Saviour within them, whereby the deadly disease can only be healed through the removal of the cause of it.

If a man is so sick in body as to feel the necessity of a physician, yet how much choice would he have in being healed without taking internally such powerful medicine as would be absolutely requisite for removing the deep-rooted cause, on account of the long process and pain and trouble it would give him, how much rather be healed by something without him, which would give him no uneasiness. Of this disposition the enemy is ever ready to take the advantage, and to avail himself of it, in order to prevent the work of the other part of the covenant from being consummated in man. This two fold definition of the covenant is instructively prefigured by the process in Moses' time. One half of the blood of the slain beast was commanded to be sprinkled on the altar, and one half upon the people, clearly corroborating and reconciling the doctrine of the whole Bible, in relation to that which has been done for man without him; and that which is done for him, or to be done for him within him; and both accredited to the account of man's salvation; but not the one to the exclusion of the other.

And it is believed that there is sufficient evidence in the Scriptures of Truth to induce a full acknowledgment that Christ's sufferings upon the cross were not only for the remission of men's sins, but to procure for them the inward and spiritual means of being drawn unto God, and of sanctification and spiritual guidance unto life everlasting. If I be lifted up, said Christ, I will draw all men, &c.

Well now, my friend, if Christ in spirit, the Comforter, shall be with his ministers, and in them, to the end of time, how is it then they can have no immediate intercourse with Him or instructions from Him, touching their services, place of destination, and the doctrines of the Gospel; these being things of the utmost consequence to them, seeing, as Peter said, "That no prophecy of the Scriptures is of any private interpretation"—that is, when a minister of Christ, in the course of his religious travels, in visiting the churches, according to the ancient practice, comes into an assembly of entire strangers, it is not the Scriptures then that will give him an understanding of the state and condition of that people; nor will any human premeditation, rightly instruct him of what he shall say, for this is forbidden him of his Lord; and to enquire of man would be distrusting the promise of his Saviour, viz: "The Holy Ghost shall teach you in that same hour what ye shall say;" and therefore it would be reproachful and displeasing to Him. And however much the ministers in our Society travel into parts where they are entire strangers, I never knew a credible minister among us, to seek for information in relation to the state of a meeting previous to attending it; yet as they trust wholly to the promise, "I will be to you youth and wisdom," they are often greatly favored to speak to the condition of those present to the great consolation and refreshment of the living members.

But thou takes the ground, my friend, that a profession of immediate revelation is not to be accredited, unless it be confirmed by miracles, notwithstanding the assurance in holy writ of its Christian characteristic, and the many testimonials recorded of its perpetuation through the coming ages, but none of its termination. But be that believeth hath the witness in himself, whilst he that believeth not hath not the witness. And just so it is with men touching any of the essentials of Christianity: he that stifles the witness, or has already stifled it believeth not. And it may be remembered that with the manifestation of all that mighty display of miracles, wrought by our Saviour, that the high Jewish professors would not believe on him, without a sign from Heaven, nor would the same people give credence to Peter and John, although notable miracles were wrought by them; and the reason is obvious, that themselves had not the witness for the Truth in their hearts, having stifled it; and therefore [they] would not believe because they were yet infidels to Christianity, like some in our day, who will neither believe in primitive or modern Christianity in any form. And there are others, although professors of Christianity, who will not believe it now to be essentially the same as it was in the days of the early Christians, but must needs exclude the greater essentials, the very life and power of it.

TUESNESDAY, 11th mo. 9th, 1848.

To Samuel Cope.

Dear Friend,—I received thy acceptable letter of the 23d of last month. The information of the offer made by _____ to the Committee was very agreeable news,* I hope these Friends may prove to be suitable ones. If they are called to the work by thy Divine Master, and keep their eye single unto Him, having their whole dependence upon Him, there can be no doubt but that He will qualify them for the service which He may see meet to require of them. There is a great responsibility resting upon persons who are sent here by our Society; they are closely watched by the Indians and surrounding whites. The variety of trials that are to be met with in this place has caused me to think of the words of our blessed Saviour, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves." I could not tell thee how poor, weak and unworthy I have felt myself, which I trust has had some good effect to humble me. Notwithstanding my unworthiness I am sometimes much comforted with a sweet sense of the loving-kindness of my Divine Master: Oh! how worthy He is to be loved and obeyed. I have felt my mind of late drawn to converse with the Indians (may I not call them my brothers and sisters, for they at times feel very near to me) on the subject of religion. I desire to be preserved from saying too much. When I have thought that the time may be drawing near when I might leave them, oh! how I have felt for their spiritual welfare, and the necessity of myself living near to Him who is the life and the Light of the world. May we all draw near to Him in the day of his mercy, that we may be preserved as it were under his blessed wing, from the snares and temptations of the evil one. I have been teaching school in our new school-house the last three or four weeks; it is a little over a quarter of a mile from where I board. I favored the location of the house, thinking the school might at some time be taught by a female member of our Society. If there should a man and his wife come out and take the farm, and a single female with them, I have thought much good might be effected by taking a few of the Indian girls into the family and teaching them the different kinds of business belonging to house-keeping. The females labor under much greater inconvenience in getting such knowledge than the men do in getting a knowledge of agriculture. Some of them have requested me to assist them in getting suitable places in white families to put their daughters to get such knowledge; also a knowledge of the English language. Such a place as I would be willing to recommend would be hard to find in a country like this. I mention this to thee, thinking if any of thy friends should feel themselves called to aid in instructing these poor people, it might serve as a little encouragement; but before engaging in the labor, it is of great importance that we should feel satisfied that our Divine Master has called us. I think if I should be spared to live, I should be likely to feel for those who may come to take my place. The Indians, I think, are much better supplied with provisions than they were a year ago—their crops have been pretty good. They have effected but little as yet in getting the whites removed from the reservation. * * * When it shall please our great and good Master to release me from this place, how glad I shall be to be with you, (in thus meeting) which I hope is not far distant; and oh! that I may be kept humble, patient and faithful to the end. I believe the Indians are generally well, excepting lung diseases. My own health is pretty good.

In sincere love I remain thy friend,

EBENEZER WORTH.

Sunset from Mount Hamilton, California.

Some, if not all of those who have had the opportunity of witnessing sunset from the highest points of Mount Hamilton, will not soon forget the gorgeous spectacle. In that wild romantic region, upon which the Almighty has placed the signet of his majesty and power, withdrawn from the busy world below, we can contemplate the strange and varied scenery around us with feelings of admiration and delight, and bow in reverent adoration before the Supreme Ruler of the Universe for these stupendous evidences of Divine handiwork, whilst our souls may be attuned to the harmony of surrounding nature. Here at an elevation of 4,500 feet above the level of the sea, we watch with quickened senses the great globe of fire slowly descending towards the broad Pacific, and see the wondrous blaze of glory reflecting its rays on the vast waste of waters. The restless waves of the mighty ocean flash and sparkle in the brilliant colors of the dazzling sunlight!—Gradually it recedes behind the western horizon, leaving in its wake a heavenly glow that imparts the most exquisite tints to sky, and sea, and mountain, until the deepening shades of even obscure the glory of its departure! Then the world becomes cold and cheerless, wrapt in the sombre drapery of twilight, leaving a void partly relieved by a lingering, ineffaceable recollection of a scene that has filled the mind with a marvellous display of the greatness of the Creator, thus revealed to us in earthly grandeur. "For The Friend."

While fully concurring in the general tenor of the remarks on "Conversation," which appeared in "The Friend" of 8th mo. 23d, I feel disposed to remind the author, as well as others, that the term conversation is never used in the Bible in the sense of talk, dialogue, or oral communication of any kind. We do not read there of one person conversing with another, or of a conversation being held upon any topic. This usage is comparatively modern. In its original signification conversation referred to conduct, course of life, intercourse with our fellow men. This is shown by its etymology, and by the usage of the earlier writers. Accordingly, if we examine the Hebrew and Greek texts of the Scriptures, we shall find that the words representing conversation, both in the Old and New Testaments, (with one exception) have a similar meaning—way of life, conduct, behavior, intercourse. For example, in the text "To him that ordereth his conversation aright," &c.; the words "ordereth his conversation" are rendered in the margin "disposeth his way," which is a more literal translation, and at this period a much more intelligible one.

Ample authority might be adduced in support of the above statements, but it is no thought desirable to encumber the pages of "The Friend" with the references which would be necessary. P.

A Shameful Story.—Mr. Tibbles, the herolator of Omaha, who forced justice, in the shape of Judge Dundy, a few months ago, to take off her bandage and deal fairly with Standing Bear, is now in the Eastern States, and has inaugurated an effort to raise money to enable the Ponca to carry up an appeal to the United States Supreme Court to obtain possession of their homes.

Here are one or two facts which we submit to any of our readers who are inclined to help in this matter. The Ponca owned the land since the settlement of the country by the whites. They had been confirmed in their ownership by three separate treaties. They had never been at war with the Government, never had one violated a treaty. They were civilized; had farms, trades, good schools, churches, which they built and supported. A few sharp dealers in Washington wanted this property. They first tried to persuade the Ponca to remove to the Indian Territory. Failing in that, they induced ten chiefs to go and inspect the land to which they wished them to emigrate. The men went and found that the Indians already there were dying like sheep. They refused to lead the tribe there. The Commissioners then refused to give them money or interpreters to go home and start off peacefully to walk home, a distance of 1,200 miles. When they reached home the Commissioners were before them and had the tribe ready to start. When they heard the account brought by their chiefs they refused to go. The troops were called in to compel them, and the whole tribe were literally driven from their homes, which were theirs by every law of God or man, to a malarious district. There were 715 of them—200 died in a year. The Ring took possession of all their stock and cattle, sold it by auction, sold the houses, and, it is asserted, kept the money. Besides this they applied for and got an appropriation of $2,500 for the job of removing the Indians.

Standing Bear, with about thirty others came back to their farms, saying that they could not die in any case and they wished to die in their old homes. They were arrested, and would have been returned to the Indian Territory but that the whites of Omaha interfered, carried the case into court, where Judge Dundy discharged the Indians, declaring that no case had ever been brought before him of such gross injustice, or calling so much for sympathy. It is now proposed to carry the whole affair into the Supreme Court and to decide whether an Indian has any human rights which a white man is bound to respect. This is a move in the right direction. Bring the red man under the protection of the courts and give him the ballot, and the problem is solved, and there will be an end of such wholesale rascally outrages as this of the Ponca has been.—N. Y. Tribune.

For "The Friend"

The snare that lies in the way of those of our members who, from apprehended necessity or from choice, engage in the business of keeping public houses at sea-side and mountain resorts, may not be seen by them at first. The business itself is allowable and proper, and when entered upon by Friends loving the principles of the Society they belong to, and having a regard for its reputation, they doubtless have no other thought than to conduct it consistently with those principles of self-denial which mark their more private homes.

The temptations peculiar to such a life, do not, I apprehend, assail all at once, nor at first very strongly; but by constant intercourse with those whose views of life's duties and privileges may be perhaps very different from their own, and with but little time for retirement and waiting upon the Lord for a renewal of strength from day to day, an assimilation unconsciously goes on which prepares the mind to yield after a time to arguments for indulgence, which would at an earlier and more healthy period have been easily repelled. Loss, very serious indeed, and it may be irreparable, is thus experienced by both parents and children—a weakness ensues which makes steady headway against the better and more serious feelings of the heart, and finally, authority gives way altogether before the daily increasing demands of a household unused to restraint; the result is (if "the light" be not utterly put out) troubled consciences to individuals, approach to Society, and sadness of heart to fathers and mothers, whose joy is to see their children walking in wisdom's ways.

Every kind of business, or rather the business man of every calling, is beset with temptations more or less potent, the yielding to which brings trouble; but I have viewed the publicity of the business under consideration as peculiarly involving the good name of the whole Society, and have been deeply pained to witness and to hear of the amusements allowed at some houses where Friends are the proprietors. The damage done to parents, to children, and to Society by such indulgences, cannot be estimated by dollars and cents; they make a wound in the best-life and to the well-being of all these, which it will be difficult to heal, and if healed will be likely ever after to leave its mark.

Viewed from a business stand-point, I think it is a mistake for a Friend to conclude that if his house is governed consistently with his profession, it will grow unpopular. Of all classes visiting such places, the respectable is the only one a Friend desires to cater for, and these I am sure are always (with some exceptions) more attracted by the order, quiet, cleanliness, and the good company to be found at the Friends' house, than by the fashionable amusements of other places. Another class, who will be decided in their choice of a sea-side or mountain home, by the presence of a ball-room and kindred appliances, a Friend cannot look to for patronage. He will forego his profits rather than his principles.

Where Friends allow their houses to be made the scenes of "hops," "dances and entertainments," &c.; or for money dealt out on dangerous beverages to their guests, they certainly disregard the Christian Advice of our Society, and place themselves in the position of offenders. I hope nothing more will be needful to admonish in love those who have thus yielded to the urgent demands made upon them without due consideration, and have let in the fear that if they resist, the success of their enterprise will be blasted; and whose yielding evidences rather a lack of strength than a willing infraction of our rules.

What I have said on this matter, I have said in love and with feelings of tender regard for the interests of all concerned; but the business alluded to seems to have become an established one among us, involving responsibilities differing somewhat from those we have been accustomed to, and about which trouble is growing for both individuals and meetings, and will continue to grow, unless the Lord in his watchful goodness so turn the hearts of the children to the parents, and the hearts of the parents to the children, that there shall be a united rallying to that standard of holiness which our blessed Saviour enjoins upon all his followers to press after without compromise. "Put me in remembrance," saith the Lord.

"For The Friend."

Summer Penitents.

The Society of Friends.—The doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, brought forth amid a large share of intolerance, hatred and persecution, have nevertheless been of incalculable advantage to Christendom. Such a subjugating religion; one that preached death to a great part of what the sectarians of that day had been educated in and so highly esteemed, is represented as giving mortal offence to every Christian Society then existing. But the early Friends, endued with power from on high, were enabled unflinchingly to stand their ground, to contend earnestly for the faith, and with Christian boldness to preach the gospel of the grace of God with memorable success. To call people off from external ordinances, and from dependence upon the mere letter of Scripture into the profession of something deeper, more inward, spiritual, and living, even to Christ through the reception of, and obedience to his Light and Spirit manifested in the heart, seems to have been the design of the Great Head of the church in raising up such a people.

How sad is the reflection, that any should think this Society has accomplished its mission, or that the light which has so emanated from it in earlier and more palmy days can now, without labor be hid under the bushel or bed, instead of being set, or continued on the candlestick, so that all may see the light! As such sentiments continue to have prevalence, as the Society loses its distinguishing testimonies and principles, which will be likely to go hand in hand and stand or fall together, Wounded in the house of its Friends, or in other words, set aside by our members, the salutary influence hitherto exerted will likely be much impaired. But we do not believe the Heavenly Shepherd designs nor will permit this Society to be wholly laid waste. All power is his. He can raise us from the stones of the street, raise up children unto Abraham. He can bring in from the highways and hedges, until his table be furnished with guests. He can refresh anoint Nehemias, and Davids, and Deborahs—prophets and prophetesses—for the work; can restore judges as at the first and consellers as at the beginning. Ye are his bidding, "Saviours shall come up on Mount Zion to judge the mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the Lord's." Thus He who "is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel, and for a sign which shall be spoken against," whose "kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion from generation to generation," may again cause his name and glorious power to be exalted even through us, his unfaithful and backsliding people. For this—for the return of such beauty—we would exclaim—however in distant prospect—

"Fly swiftly round, ye wheels of time,

And bring the promised day."

Numerous testimonies have been borne to the efficacy and vitality of these principles by spiritually-minded writers of other religious professions. Two of these, in conclusion, we cite. An elderly man, "a minister of the Establishment" in England, said: "I believe if it had not been for the Society of Friends the Church would have been in popery long since. I believe that the fact of a society maintaining the principles of the uselessness and undesirability of all form in the worship of the Almighty, has prevented us from going to lengths to which we might otherwise have gone; and I further believe that the day is coming when our altars and our crosses, and our robes and our surplices, and much more of our paraphernalia, will go to Babylon whence they came." He added, turning to one of our members:—"I can easily see the way from us to you, but I cannot see the way that some of you are finding from you to us." From the pen of the gifted Thomas C. Upham, we have the following:—"I have carefully studied the Bible in the original languages. I have visited the Holy Land—the places memorable in Scripture history, and the earthly life of Christ; and what is more important, I have had many years' experience. The conclusion of the whole matter with me is an abiding conviction that Christianity is true, and that the Society of Friends have produced the highest and best statement of Spiritual Christianity yet made. Their spiritual view of Christ, their doctrine of universal saving grace and love, are yet in advance of the age; and of the views entertained by any other denomination on this important subject. I am an old man, and could not at this time in life change my denomination, either with profit to myself or the cause; but I entertain the same views that were taught by the early Friends."

An army officer, on returning home from camp life, went to visit a relative, and like some who imitate their associates, he indulged in profane language. A little girl walked out with him to his horse, and as he was talking like to hear my cousin swear," he replied, "I know, my dear, it is wrong." In the same mild tone she rejoined, "Well, then, if you know that it is wrong, why do you do it?" The captain confessed to a friend, on relating the story, that he never felt a reproof so much as the one given by that little girl.

A Stirring Question.—In infidel lecturer once gave opportunity for any one in the audience to ask questions. A plain woman rose and said, "Sir, allow me to ask, what has your belief done for you? My belief has saved my husband from a drunkard's grave, and made me a happy woman. What has your belief done for you?"

Date omitted.—"I think our Friends in the West need the caution held forth by Sarah Grub in relation to her own people. 'She saw the change in some from that deep indwelling with the seed, Christ, by which only any can be living branches of the true vine,' &c., &c. I am very sure we all, as a people, need the caution, but in new countries it is so natural for the social feelings to predominate, that there is danger of talking away one's strength. May we all exhibit the right leaven in this respect, and never be ashamed to be as Mary, sitting quietly at the feet of the dear Master. It becomes the reverence that is due to his name and power, that when it is felt, especially, we should be willing to keep silence before Him, and thus let the people renew their strength; and thus, too, many are silent preachers of the Gospel, by their example kindling the spark of devotion in the minds of beholders."

Extract from a letter dated 10th mo. 1866:—"On Sixth-day last was interred at West Chester, Friends' burying-ground, our dear Friend, James Enlen, after which a large and solemn meeting was held in their meeting-house at West Chester, in accordance with a desire expressed by him during his illness, that 'if the cause of Truth could be promoted thereby, he would be willing a meeting should be held.' Divers living testimonies were borne. * * * He was one that was enabled to live a consistent life, a life of uprightness and self-denial, the life of a truly pious and devoted Christian, and he went down to the grave in peace; having 'no desire to be raised up, unless he could serve his Master better.'"

"On the day previous to his funeral was buried Jeremiah Hacker, another member of the Westtown Committee—a useful and upright and humble member of Society—a member of Orange St. Meeting, Philadelphia. He died with a short sickness; being a man who appeared well, his sudden removal was a great shock to many, especially to those of his own particular meeting. At their Fourth-day meeting previous to his funeral, William Evans and Joseph Elkinton, Jr., made a very feeling allusion to his sudden departure, which brought a solemn feeling over the meeting."

Died, at West Chester, Pa., on the 23rd of 10th month, 1866, James Enlen, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, a member and elder of Birmingham Monthly Meeting. To this dear Friend we believe might be applied the words addressed by our adorable Redeemer to Nathanael, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." His circumspect walk and consistent example were well calculated to commend the religion he professed to those around him; while the scrupulous care and assiduity with which he performed his duties in civil society, gave evidence of his desire to serve his generation according to the will of God.

In his last illness, he said, "Never in my whole life have I felt more unworthy of the goodness and compassion of my Heavenly Father, but never have they been more abundantly bestowed."—Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace.—The Friend.

But whose heartbreaketh unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil.—Prov. i. 33.

GRASSES.

Selected.

"If God so clothe the grass of the field,"

Just a bank of flowering grasses,
Lightly swaying to and fro,
As the summer south wind passes
In the noon-tide glow.

In their diverse beauty fashioned,
Turning often to the sky,
Whence a glare of light impassioned
Answers to their sigh.

Gaily greeting each wayfarer,
Shyly bending to the breeze,
Surely earth's great Burden-bearer
Careth much for these!

Ah! the quaintly flowering grasses,
As again we pass them by,
Lie in brown and drooping masses,
Gathered but to die!

Is there murmur of complaining,
For their day, so quickly past?
Do they mourn its fleetness,—claiming
It should ever last?

Such a wealth of sweetness granted
As had never graced their bloom,
Fills the air, till we are haunted
By the rich perfume.

In their fragrant stillness lying,
Where so late they counselled "faith,"
They, in very act of dying,
Whisper, "love in death!"

PAPA IS COMING HOME.

Selected.

Five little noses against the pane,
Five pairs of eyes peering down the lane,
Trying to see through the mist and rain,
If papa is coming home.

The clock on the mantel has just struck four,
Which tells they've to wait one half hour more,
Before the train, with its rattle and roar,
Will bring their papa home.

Five little faces, clean and sweet,
Dimpled fingers and dancing feet,
Well-brushed jackets, and aprons neat,
For papa is coming home.

Over the track with its light so bright,
The long train glides in its rapid flight,
And five little children are happy to-night,
For papa is coming home.

The whistle sounds, the gate's awning,
Footsteps clatter and voices ring,
Red lips kiss and white arms cling,
For papa has come home.

"THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN."

Selected.

He knelt—the Saviour knelt and prayed,
When but His father's eye
Looked through the lonely garden's shade,
On that dread agony!

The Lord of all above, beneath,
Was bow'd with sorrow unto death,

The sun set in a fearful hour,
The skies might well be said to
So to behold His agonizing

When He who gave man's breath must know
The very depth of human woe.

He knew them all—the doubt, the strife,
The faint perplexing dread,
The mist that hang o'er parting life,
All dark'd round his head!
And the Deliverer knelt to pray—
Yet pass'd it not, that cry away.

It pass'd not—though the stormy waves
Had sunk beneath his tread:
It pass'd not—though to Him the grave
Had yielded up its dead.
But there was sent Him from on high
A gift of strength, for man to die?

"And thus, appeared an angel unto Him Heaven, strengthening him."—Luke xxii. 9.

And was His mortal hour beset
With anguish and dismay?
How may we meet our conflict yet
In the dark and narrow way?
How, but thro' Him, that path who trod?
Save, or we perish, Son of God.

The Negro Exodus.

The Christian Advocate, of New York, publishes a letter received from John P. St. John, the Governor of Kansas, dated the 30th of the 7th mo., which was written in reply to one from the editor of that paper requesting information on this subject. Some extracts from these are subjoined, as coming from a responsible source.

"Without any previous notice or intimation the flow of the tide of colored refugees from the South first struck Kansas at Wyandotte City about the month of April last, since which time from six to seven thousand, who were entirely destitute of food or the means to buy it, have found shelter in our State. These poor people, breadless, penniless, and almost naked as they landed in this, to them, the promised land, presented an appearance pitiable in the extreme. Humanity, as well as the honor and good name of Kansas, demanded that this unfortunate class should not be turned away or permitted to suffer for want of shelter or food. Something had to be done, and done promptly. We had no precedent to aid or guide us in the work. Our State officers, together with a number of prominent private citizens, at once organized, and in the course of few weeks incorporated under our State laws, the Freedman's Relief Association of Kansas, with head-quarters at this place, the object of which was to systematize the work of receiving as well as disbursing funds donated for the relief of destitute refugees.

"The Association up to the present time has received about $7,500, all of which has been expended, except about $70 balance now in the treasury. Of this sum received, Kansas has contributed more than her full quota. The Association has extended temporary aid in the way of food, clothing, shelter, transportation, and securing employment and homes to about 5,000 refugees, who, excepting about 150 still in the barracks at this place, (erected by the Association to furnish temporary shelter,) are now self-supporting, and no longer require or receive aid. In this good work the Association has been greatly aided by auxiliary societies and philanthropic men and women in various parts of the State.

"Of the 150 now at the barracks about fifty are sick and disabled, all depending solely upon the Association until able to work, and the remainder are well-dressed, well-fed, and faithful laborers, but are of peaceable, well-disposed, sober, and moral habits, and are not paupers; but will not only make their own living by honest labor, but will add to the material wealth of any country, if they are only given a reasonably fair opportunity to do so.

"The question is frequently asked, 'Is the exodus likely to continue for any length of time?' To which I reply, that I am forced to the conclusion, after having engaged in an extensive correspondence during the past two or three months with both black and white people of the South, and talked with hundreds of the refugees, touching this question, that an exodus has just fairly begun. While the quarantine regulations will stop those desiring to come from the Gulf States, just as soon as the restrictions are removed the movement will be renewed with greatly increased numbers.

"All the refugees unite in substantially the same story of cruelty, outrage, and wrong inflicted upon them for years past by the whites; they say they have waited from year to year or the past ten years, hoping that there would be a better condition of things; but their waiting has all been in vain, and instead of matters getting better, they have grown worse all the time.

"To illustrate the manner in which these poor people have been treated, I give below the prices which they have been compelled to pay for the common necessities of life as I find them in an account, now in my possession, rendered by S. D. Currie & Co., of Edwards Landing, Miss., in January, 1877, against a colored man named Wm. Lewis, which he has paid: Coarse brown sugar, 12½ cents per pound; a large grade of molasses, $1.50 per gallon; bacon, 20 cents per pound; soda, 25 cents per pound; nails, (common), 10 cents per pound; flour, 7 cents per pound; rice, 12½ cents per pound; calico, 12½ cents per yard; cottonade, 40 cents per yard. While in the same bill he is charged $30 rent for a work mule for one season, and other things at equally exorbitant rates, in a bill amounting in the aggregate to $404.28.

"And it cannot be said in justification of such outrageous prices that the merchants in the South run any unusual risk in selling on credit, for, under the laws of the cotton States, the merchant has a lien upon all the interest or share that the negro has in all the crop he produces to secure the payment of his claim."

For "The Friend."

Line upon Line.

"How about it? Will not the distinctive dress of Friends have passed away in fifty years to come? And how is it that there are so few that adopt it?" Such were questions put to me by a bright talented young man, a member of our Society, as I passed a little group after the close of one of our First-day meetings. I inferred that they had the subject of a plain dress before them. As it did not seem a suitable time to go much into it, I only replied that I supposed it was for want of faithfulness, that more bearing the name of Friends did not make the appearance.

That the primitive Christians were led into great simplicity of dress, and manner of living, is a truth which cannot be gainsaid. Equally true is it, that our early Friends were, in obedience to Him who raised them up to be a people, required to leave off and forsake the vain fashions and customs of the world, so that their garb soon became distinctive, and known as the dress of a Friend. And it is remarkable that faithful Friends from that day to this, have felt it required of them to assume this dress, and that they could make no progress in their Christian journey without obedience to the cross in this particular. There are many now living who have had the same experience; some of whom were for a time under the mistaken apprehension that they could be as good Christians and dress as the people at large; but found no progress could be made, and that "obedience is better than sacrifice." It is true there are many now passing themselves off, even for misters and leaders of the people, who set at naught this testimony; but it is remarkable that many of these have forsaken some of the leading doctrines of Friends, and so have lost their right to the name. By their teachings and example, many of our beloved young people have been misled, as well as older ones, of limited religious experience. But I am not prepared to believe that the precious principles and testimonies that we as a people were raised up by the Head of the Church to uphold before the world, are to be fractured away by the libertine spirit that has been let loose; but that, being in accordance with the teachings and example of our blessed Redeemer, they will, like the "stone cut out of the mountain without hands," prevail over all opposition.

I could compile a good sized volume of testimony from the writings of Friends, both of ancient and recent date, going to show that they felt it as much a divine requiring to conform to the simple plain dress of the Friend, as any other duty required; but will only make a few short extracts.

John Barelay says: "The subject of dress has very frequently come under my serious consideration, and as I have kept quiet and calm, singly desirous to know and do whatever might be required, the matter has opened more and more clearly before my view. That dress from which my forefathers have without good reason and from improper motives departed, to that dress I must return."

Daniel Wheeler "once recanted to a Friend in lively terms, the trial it was to him to put on a different hat from that which he had been accustomed to wear. It was hard to appear as a fool before men; he thought if his natural life had been accepted as a substitute, he would gladly have laid it down; but this was not the thing required. He diligently examined his heart, and believed he clearly saw his Master's will in the requisition; and that it was a discipline designed to bring him into a state of childlike obedience and dependence. In great distress he cried unto the Lord for help, and a passage of Scripture was powerfully applied to his mind; 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven.' His resolution was immediately taken; he put on the hat, and with his mind staid upon the Lord he set out to join his friends at meeting. His difficulties vanished. Sweet peace was his covering." &c.

Sophia Hume says: "For though religion stands not simply in clothes, yet true religion stands in that which sets bounds and limits to the mind with respect to clothes as well as other things. When it pleased me in his glory, the view discovered to me my own unworthiness, and caused me not only to despise and abhor myself, but my splendid apparel also. True Christianity which I began to be acquainted with, set a bound to my desires, and directed me to plainness before I had any intention of joining the Society of the people called Quakers."

Should any who read this wish to be more fully informed as to the grounds of our testimony on this subject, I would refer them to the writings of Joseph Pike, in second volume of Friends' Library. He enters pretty fully into it, giving sound Scriptural arguments to prove his assertions.

"And let not any suppose that because so many have slidden aside from our principles, that hence these principles are wrong. These stood the test of half a century of bitter and grievous persecution, and are they to be set aside in this day of outward ease, though even a multitude are not willing to submit to the cross; for it has been declared by one eminently favored in the visions of light to see, and endowed with gospel authority to declare it, that 'All this that causes so much stumbling and perplexity, and produces such a sensation, will fade away, and the authors of it will go back to the world and the beggarly elements, * * * their building on the sand will crumble to pieces, and they themselves will wither, wither, wither. And ye faithful ones, to whom the principles of truth are yet precious; who love the pure cause, and are often bowed down in spirit on its behalf, you have no cause to fear; for though you be left as the gleanings of the vintage, yet shall you be planted on a very fruitful hill; not one of self-exaltation, but a hill above the level of the spirit of this world; and you shall spread abroad, and increase, and flourish; for this Society was planted "a noble vine; wholly a right seed;" and it is not the will of the Almighty that this people should ever cease to be a people.'"

A Word in Season.—Kilstein, a pious German minister, once heard a laboring man use the most awful curses and imprecations in a fit of passion, without reproving him for it. This so troubled him that he could scarcely sleep the following night. In the morning he arose early, and soon saw the man coming along, and addressed him as follows:

"My friend, it is you I am waiting to see."

"You are mistaken," replied the man; "you have never seen me before."

"Yes, I saw you yesterday," said Kilstein, while returning from your work, and heard you praying."

"What! heard me pray?" said the man. "I am sure that you are mistaken, for I never prayed in my life."

"And yet," calmly but earnestly replied the minister, "if God had heard your prayer, you would not be here, but in hell; for I heard you beseeching God that he might strike you with blindness and condemn you to hell-fire."

The man turned pale, and tremblingly said: "Dear sir, do you call this prayer? Yes, it is true; I did this very thing."

"Now, my friend," continued Kilstein, "as you acknowledged it, it is my duty to beseech you to seek with the same earnestness the salvation of your soul as you have hitherto its damnation, and I will pray to God that he will have mercy upon you."

From this time the man regularly attended upon the ministry of Kilstein, and ere long was brought in humble repentance to Christ as a believer.

"A word in season, how good it is!" "Be instant in season and out of season; rebuke, reprove, exhort with all long-suffering and patience."—The Leaver.

A Test for Idiocy.—In an article in the Nineteenth Century, Sir Wilfred Lawson, the eminent temperance advocate, after narrating the vain attempts to "regulate" the traffic in alcoholic brain-poison, which cannot be regulated, because it is in itself an irregularity, concludes with this incident, which occurred at a temperance meeting in one of the northern counties of England.

"Three excellent clergymen spoke. They harped on the elastic and indefinite word 'moderation,' condemning intemperance, but setting up Timothy as their model man, morally and constitutionally, lauding and magnifying sobriety by commending the temperate consumption of alcohol. When they had concluded an elderly farmer arose and said: 'I've heard that kind of talk for the last forty years, and I can't see that people are a bit more sober now than when it commenced. It reminds me of what I once saw take place at a retreat for imbeciles. It is the custom there, after the patients have been in residence for a certain time, to put them to a kind of test to see whether they are fit to leave the asylum or not. They are taken to a trough full of water with a small pipe continually running into it and supplying it. They are given a lulle and told to empty it. Those who have not regained their senses keep lading away, while the water flows in as fast as they ladle it out, but then as isn't idiots stop the tap?'"

Religious Items, &c.

The Civil Damage Bill.—The Legislature of Massachusetts has passed a bill which provides that in cases of injury to person or property by an intoxicated person, and caused by his intoxication, a right of action for redress shall be lawful against those who sold the liquor which caused the intoxication, and also against the owner of the building in which the liquor was purchased, if such owner leased his building for the sale of intoxicating drinks, or knowingly permitted it to be used for such purpose. The passage of the bill was severely contested.

The Silent Hour.—Among the excellent features planned by Mary Lyon, in the routine of daily life at the celebrated Mt. Holyoke Seminary, was the setting apart of half an hour, morning and evening for the "silent hour." This each young lady was to spend alone with God. In a family of three hundred, she must be absolutely alone.

The Moravian General Synod meets once in ten years, and always at Herrnhut, Germany. The session opened 5th mo, 26th, and closed 7th mo, 3rd. The number of delegates entitled to sit and vote was fifty four. Since the last Synod thirteen of the seventeen bishops have died, and five have been consecrated. The Synod chose by lot three new bishops.

The Evangelical movement of last century in the English Church, in which Wesley, Whitfield, Toplady, Romaine and others participated, is thus described by Wm. E. Gladstone: "It was a strong, systematic, outspoken, and determined reaction against the prevailing standards both of life and preaching. It aimed at bringing back, on a large scale, and by an aggressive movement, the Cross, and all that the Cross essentially implies, both into the teaching of the clergy, and into the lives as well of the clergy as of the laity. The preaching of the Gospel became afterwards a cant phrase; but that the preaching of the Gospel a hundred years ago had disappeared, not by denial, but by lapse, from the majority of Anglican pulpits, is, I fear, in large measure, an historic truth. To bring it back again was the aim and work of the Evangelical reformers. Whether they preached Christ in the best manner may be another question; but of this there is now, and can be, little question that they preached Christ; they preached Christ largely and fervently where, as a rule, He was but little and but coldly preached before. And who is there that will not say from his heart, 'I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.'"

The final decision of the German Government on the religious questions at issue with the Vatican has been communicated to the latter. It is that all of the exiled clergy who ask permission will be allowed to return to Germany; the May laws will be tacitly suspended, provided the clergy obey the common law; and all fresh nominations are to be submitted to the Government. The Pope is satisfied with those terms.

The Bishop of Manchester has been preaching on intemperance in England. He said that on last Christmas-Day he saw what shocked him very much, for between the Cathedral and his residence, a distance of two miles, he saw twelve drunken men, and it was early in the day.

The English Methodists have built fifty-one chapels in London since 1861, with sittings for sixty thousand persons.

Methodist Fraternity.—There seems at the present time some jar to the fraternal relations established in 1874, between the Northern and Southern branches of the Methodist Church. The papers and officers of the one denounce with severity the murders and outrages committed in some parts of the Southern States on political grounds; and of which several of their ministers have been victims. These denunciations are not palatable to some of the Southern Methodists, who feel themselves in measure compromised by the disorders in their section of country. One of these, in an organ of their Society published at Nashville, speaks of lying and baseless reports against their church and people being liberally used by their Northern allies for their defamation. To this the Northern Methodist organ replies, that in this community, where it is published, church members do not join in mobs or mask themselves to murder others at night, or countenance such crimes, or fail to help the authorities and public sentiment against them; and it says, that in speaking against these things, "We never intend to speak against our brethren in the M. E. Church South."

Effect of Ritualism.—One of the English Ritualists says:—"We are teaching men to believe that God is to be worshipped under the form of Bread, and they are learning the lesson from us which they have refused to learn from the Roman teachers who have been among us for the last three hundred years. We are teaching men to endure willingly the pain of confession, which is an intense trial to the reserved Anglo-Saxon nature, and to believe that a man's 'I absolve thee,' is the voice of God. How many English Protestants have Roman priests brought to confession, compared with the Anglican clergy? Could they have overcome the English dislike to numbers as we are overcoming it? On any hypothesis, we are doing their work."

Feet Washing is still practised among the ordinances as a religious ceremony by the German Baptists. A correspondent to the Monthly Review, a paper published in the interest of the United Brethren church, at Harrisburg, gives an account of a communion meeting held at Mt. Joy, Pa.; and a few of the brethren, he says, participated in "the ceremony of feet-washing" which it is the custom of this congregation to observe twice a year. It seems to be going out of use, but three of the old men, and none of the women, participated.

Chinese at First Day Schools.—The Congregationalist publishes an account of a school at Boston, commenced about three years ago by Harriet Carter. She began with two scholar visits to the laundries where the Chinese are employed, and was every where kindly received. The school now numbers forty, and the kindness and sympathy extended to the people, who mingle so little in social intercourse with others, appears to be fully appreciated. They come to the place where the school is held, sometimes an hour before it opened, and study faithfully. "No present," says the account, "is too beautiful to bring to their teacher, no sacrifice too great for them to make for her comfort." One Chinaman who went from Boston to Cleveland there organized a school among his own people. He wrote back to H. Carter: "I love to study Holy Bible, because the words are more useful, and has made me happy."

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 6, 1879.

The testimony to plainness and simplicity our dress and appearance, and to the avoiding of those constant changes in attire exhibited by the fashionable world, which is held up to view by a correspondent in another part of our columns, is one that has often been preached by members of the Society of Friends; but which does not belong to them exclusively, being equally binding on all true Christians of whatever denomination. The addresses on this subject of the apostles of old; and the testimony of the Spirit of truth in the heart of its faithful followers in these days; are not directed to our little branch of the Church alone, but speak with equal force to all those who are endeavoring to walk in the Light of the Lord Jesus as He shines in the hearts of men, and who by their conduct are saying to the world, "Come and have fellowship with us, for truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ." Hence we find that persons of all religious persuasions, as they are redeemed from the spirit of the world and brought more fully into the Divine communion, lose their relish for ornaments and fashionable attire, and are led into a degree of simplicity and plainness appropriate to those whose thoughts are more centred on the enjoyments of Heaven than the gayeties of earth.

It was so with the early Methodists, many of whom were a zealous, self-denying people; and so fully was their conviction of this Christian duty, that strong recommendations in regard to it were embodied in their discipline. This testimony is still upheld in a good degree by the Mennonites and German Baptists, who are regarded as more religiously-minded people than the average of their neighbors. Indeed so naturally does plainness flow from holding ourselves up to the government of Christ, that where an individual is becoming more fashionable in his clothing, we feel almost certain that it has been preceded by a refusal to submit to the cross of Christ, and a consequent decline in godliness.

While the watchful, tender-spirited Christian will not follow the constant changes of fashion, and will not feel himself at liberty to imitate every new device of the tailor, yet he is not restricted from adopting such changes as are real improvements, whose utility is shown by their adaptation to the proper purposes for which clothing is worn; and where the motive is, not "to be in the fashion," but to answer the requirements of comfort, cheapness and sound reason. Thus it is seen that among sober, religious people a gradual change takes place in the form and material of their clothing, as new inventions and industries spring within their reach what at a former period was not available; and as experience demonstrates its superior comfort or propriety. The wide-spread use of cotton garments, which were almost unknown at the time of the rise of our Society, is one illustration of this. Yet throughout this slow process of change, such people never lose the characteristic marks of being the followers of Him who wore the seamless garment, and whose disciples are not to be conformed to the ways of those who follow their own devices. Thus it is, that the consistent members of the Society of Friends have always been known as such by their appearance as well as conduct, although a plain Friend of this day, and one of 200 years ago would probably present several points of difference.

Some who admit the duty of simplicity, object to the wearing of that which is peculiar in its shape. Yet this very peculiarity is in some degree a testimony to religion—because it arose from the Christian duty of refusing to change with the ever-varying requirements of fashion; and in most cases it denotes that the wearer is one who belongs to a religious Society,—and is therefore bound to exemplify in life and conversation the fruits of the religion of Christ.

We believe this subject is correctly treated in the minute on the state of Society adopted by our last Yearly Meeting, which says, when speaking of the effect of "being brought under the government of the spirit of Christ in our own hearts," and of being "concerned to walk in obedience to the light of Christ."

"We would be religiously restrained from following the ever-changing fashions of the world in the form of our apparel, and in its adorning; and we would find the testimony of truth in our own hearts in this matter to be in accordance with the precepts of prophets and apostles of former ages. This was the experience of the early members of this Society. In adhering to this testimony they soon became distinguished by the simplicity and peculiarity of their attire, as well as of their manners; and their very appearance indicated that they were members of a Society who professed to be the followers of a crucified Saviour. Wm. Penn says of them,

"It was not very easy to our primitive Friends to make themselves sights and spectacles, and the scorn and derision of the world, which they easily foresaw must be the consequence of so unfashionable a conversation in it." We believe the same holy watchfulness and submission to the cross of Christ, which is the restraining power of his Spirit in the heart, which made them a peculiar people, will produce similar results in these days, and that if we are truly in earnest in hungering and thirsting after righteousness, we will not be ashamed nor afraid to make that confession before men, which many have felt to be involved in putting on the apparel of a consistent Friend."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The report from the United States Signal Service Office in Philadelphia, gives the highest temperature for 8th month at 93 deg, lowest 55 deg, average 72.7 deg,—which is about one half degree below the average of the past six years. The total rainfall was 7.13 inches, which is unusually large. Prevailing direction of wind south-west. Number of clear days 16. Rain fell on 12 days.

The present population of Philadelphia Altogether is 33,424, an increase of 1,000 in the last year.

In 1877 the anthracite coal regions of Pennsylvania yielded 21,000,000 tons, in 1878 the demand was curtailed to 17,000,000; it is expected that nearly 30,000,000 tons will be required this year. The full average weekly production is estimated at 500,000, and has reached on one occasion 95,000 tons.

At a recent meeting of the operatives of the Schuylkill coal region, the list of prices for line and city trade, shows a decline of 20 cents per ton on lump, broken, and steamboat coal; 25 cents on egg and chestnut; and 35 cents on stove. The local market is well stocked at this time, the supply at the Richmond wharves aggregating nearly 75,000 tons.

In 1810 arrangements were made with Robert Fulton to construct steam ferry boats, and on the 21 of 7th mo, 1812, one named the Jersey was put in operation. A correspondent writing to a newspaper of that time says: "I crossed the North River yesterday in the steamboat with my family in my carriage, without alighting therefrom, in 14 minutes, with an immense crowd of passengers. On both shores were thousands of people viewing the pleasing object. I was anxious to know how much the public mind appeared to be gratified at finding so large and so safe a machine going so well." This "large machine" was 80 feet long, and 30 feet wide. A year later the York was put on with the same machinery. The annual passenger traffic by hour, from sunrise to sunset, but frequently an hour was consumed in making the trip.

It is estimated there are in the United States over 400,000 railway cars, also 15,000 engines. These engines and cars in traveling over the roads, lose annually between five and six million dollars. The rail weight over 1,500,000 lbs, and their cost is between $30,000 and $40,000, and this loss is continued from year to year, in addition to that of nuts thrown into the scrap heap with their bolts worthless, from the use of the jam nut, also the liability to accident from loose nuts.

The steamer Glenfalls, which arrived at New York on the 28th ult, from Shanghai, made the passage from Amoy, where she touched, in 51 days, 11½ hours, the shortest record.

A case mentioned in the British Medical Journal relates a curious case. A lady was listening at the telephone for an expected message during a storm. A loud clap of thunder occurred, and the effect on the listening ear was complete numbness and deafness, accompanied by jerking and giddiness and nausea and ringing in the ears. The effect, except the deafness, passed off in a few moments. The hearing was not restored until after the lapse of two weeks. The physician in view of this incident may be of service, in view of the large and increasing use of the telephone, and physicians who make this hearing the cause of deafness, should draw their attention to the uses and effects of the instrument.

Three prominent silk manufacturers of Macclesfield, England, have been visiting the silk mills of Paterson, N. J., it is said with a view to building mills in that city, and bringing English operatives to work in them. The year's crop of silkworms reported in Memphis on the 31st ult, was 26, against 35 on the previous day. Seventeen cases have occurred in New Orleans since its first appearance 7th mo, 27th. Seven of these recovered, four died, and four are under treatment.

Seventeen hundred cases of cholera arrived at New York on the 31st, making a weekly total of 3224, chiefly English, Scotch and Germans.

Markets, &c.—Government Bonds, sales, 1881, 104½; 5's, 102½; 4½ per cents, registered, 104½; do. coupon, 105½; 4 per cents, 1012.

Cotton, 12½ a 13 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum—Crude, 5 cts.; refined, 6 a 6½ cts. per gallon. Lined oil, Calcutta, 63 cts.; American, 61 cts. Lard oil, 44½ cts. Sperm, crude, 75 cts.; bleached white, 92 a 95 cts. per gallon.

Patent—Lime-speriting, $1.75 a $2.50; patent and other high grades, 25.75 a 27.25.

Grain.—Red and amber wheat, $1.09 a $1.10. Corn, 45 a 46 cts. Oats, 31 a 32 cts. for mixed, and 32 a 34 cts. for white.

Hay and Straw.—Prime timothy, 65 a 75 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 55 a 65 cts.; straw, 60 a 70 cts.

Beef cattle have been dull, but prices were unchanged. Extra, 5½ a 6 cts., and common, 3 a 4 cts. Hogs, 5¼ a 5½ cts. per pound. Sheep, 3¼ a 4½ cts. as to quality.

The public statement, just announced, shows a decrease for the Eighth month of $5,277,000 over the seventh.

The steamship Mosel, which arrived at New York on the 30th, brought $100,000 in gold bars.

The mortality in Philadelphia the last week was 314—161 adults and 153 children, 94 being under one year of age.

FOREIGN.—A number of farmers from northern Yorkshire and Durham, recently left Liverpool on the steamer Helvetia for New York. They are of various classes, ranging from the small farmer upwards. Several of them have capital of from £200 to £500 each, while others have only £20 or £30.

The cotton spinners of Oldham have declared themselves in favor of a scheme for systematic emigration, if reductions in wages continue to be made.

The London Economist of the 12th ult., says, that the exports of produce from the United Kingdom in 1878, fallen in value £29,000,000 (sterling) since 1872. The largest decrease is £26,000,000 in the exports to the United States, the next largest is £12,500,000 in exports to Germany. The particular mark which characterizes the present state of matters, is generally. Almost all classes are feeling the effect of the existing commercial depression.

The Standard's Paris despatch says: Some French Catholics and royalists, who are frightened by the Ferry bill, have determined to emigrate to the island of Papua, where they will found a Catholic colony, under the direction of the Marquis de Roys.

The report of the progress of the French savings, show what a wonderfully thrifty as well as wealthy country, France is. The deposits for seventeen years preceding the war, increased in amount, and the material prosperity of the country, the annual progression being about $6,000,000. After the war the deposits fell suddenly from $144,000,000 to $103,000,000 in 1872. In 1874 successful efforts were made to propagate the system of savings banks, and the deposits rose to $202,000,000 in 1875. No deposit is allowed to exceed $200; when this sum is exceeded, the savings bank purchase rents, which it delivers to the depositor. The reason for this is, the Government pays a higher interest than the ordinary rate of the savings banks. This again, it remembers the inconvenience caused in 1848 by a run on those banks, and which was repeated in a lesser degree in 1870 and 71.

The Times correspondent reports that the Government has declared itself ready to appoint special commissioners to concert with American commissioners for negotiating treaties of commerce between France and the United States.

Prussia has eighteen prisons for tramps and vagrants. In 1847 there were 4,000 commitments to these institutions, but the number has increased every year, and for 1878 was 9,000. Of these were 8,000 men, and 1,000 women. They cost the country $55,000, but earned while in durance $275,000. Many of the arrests were of capable artisans, who were really desirous of finding work. The increase is attributed to business depression.

A leading newspaper gives the following statistics respecting the emigration of the United States to America, from 1820 till 1877: During the first forty years of that period, the total was 3,000; during the succeeding decade 5,000. In 1871, 1,800; in 1872, 1,500; in 1873, 1,000; in 1874, 700; in 1875, 300; in 1876, none in 1877.

An unusual scene for Europe—that of the sun setting, but shining through the whole night—is to be witnessed from the summit of Mount Aava, in Finland, near Torneo, at 69 deg. north, a northern latitude. Every year, in the month of June, a multitude of people of different nations visit the mountain, to witness this interesting spectacle. The Government of Finland is now erecting on Mount Aava, a hotel for the accommodation of travellers.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second day, Ninth mo. 8th, 1879.

A limited number of children will now be admitted to these schools, not members of our religious Society whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, and to common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends in the city and in the neighborhood is particularly invited to these schools. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charge burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends Lightfoot, as Principals, who possess 50 years experience. With these Friends in charge, assisted by a complete corps of teachers, it is thought these schools may safely be recommended as affording opportunities for obtaining a liberal education in useful branches of study, and in the Latin, Greek and French languages. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

Believing that advantage would arise from increased facilities for the instruction of the smaller girls, arrangements have been completed for the open building of Seneca St., which will be ready to be given to those children, who such special attention is desired. The character of the instruction will be of an elementary character. The Primary Schools in Cherry St. and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,

DIED, in Chesterfield, Ohio, Seventh month 29th, 1879, WILLIAM C. WILLIAMS, in the 70th year of his age, a member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting of Friends.

[The following notice has been received from a distant Friend, and a contributor to our columns. The deceased, we believe, was a member of the Society of Friends, but she appears to have been of some other general assembly and church of the first born, whose names are written in Heaven.—Ed.]

DEPARTED, at San Leandro, California, on the 10th of 8th month, 1879, MARY R. BARTON, only remaining daughter of Thomas and Hester Barton, aged 18 years and 4 days. This dear youth was led through the different stages of consumption of which she died, to experience this her great joy, in an unusual degree, the mighty power of the resurrection grace to save to the uttermost, and to transport her affections into the mansions of bliss, those that are heavenly; so that she, with a glad consent to depart and be with Christ, which no doubt is to her far better; leaving her friends in the blessed assurance of her acceptance into those mansions of bliss, through Jesus Christ our Lord and only Saviour.

A gain, thou claimest no authority for preaching the gospel by means of a call thereto from God; hence friend T— how wilt thou manure to escape the censure placed upon some members who professed to be ministers of the Lord, and to speak in his name, where He declared that he had never sent them? It is my faith that there can be no true Gospel Minister, except those who are called of God; it is not as the apostle said that no maneth this honor unto himself, but he that called of God as was Aaron. Heb. v. 4. For were called all the ministers of Christ in His name; nor does it appear that there can be saints except they are called to be such. Rom. i. 1, 6, 7; 1st Cor. i. 1, 2, &c., throughout the whole Bible. But as thou hast attempted a way for escape from reprehension, by doing not a little injustice to thy only rule of faith and practice; for when I referred thee to the call of the Saviour and to his promises to his ministers, that he would be to them strength and wisdom, and that he would give them the Spirit of Truth that should guide them into all Truth, thy reply was, that those promises were made to the apostles, and ended with the apostles! Thus attempting to make a strike off from the Holy Scriptures with thy own hands a great part of their principal and efficient excellencies; not only as to the calling and true anointing of a Gospel minister, but also as relates to the blessed means appointed of the Lord to enable all men to be Christians; for as without Him and his immediate help by his Spirit we can do nothing: as said one of his apostles, "The anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you by this same anointing teacheth you of all things," &c. 1st John ii. 27.

I do not recollect that any were called upon by any rightful authority in Scripture times to prove their profession of immediate Revelation, or gifts of the Spirit, by the working of miracles; but I do recollect what the test was in the days of the ancient prophets, viz: if their prophecies were proved to be true, by the fulfillment of what they foretold, they should be accounted true prophets. And so with us in the present time; for it is not a strange thing for ministers, in the exercise of their gifts, in the "true light" to see and to speak of hidden things and things to come; which preaching stands subject to the same test as above alluded to, as I presume it did in the early Christian Church; but as then, so in the church under our name, there are different gifts by the same Spirit; some are led more to exhortation, and some to doctrine, and others to the states and conditions of those present. But all must be communicated in love and meekness and in the savor of life; and the hearers are authorized to judge agreeably to the usage of the primitive times, "Let the prophets (or ministers) speak two or three, and let the others judge."—1st Cor. xiv. 29.

Thus far my friend have I briefly noticed the calling and spiritual qualifications of a Gospel minister; which subject was the main topic of our conversation; but I would take the liberty of subjoining a few considerations on the subject of the internal manifestations of the light of Christ, or the Spirit of God upon the hearts of all men, showing unto them the evil of their ways, and inviting and drawing them unto God and to acts of righteousness;—often called the Grace of God, represented as a principle, because it teacheth men the denial of ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live in a righteous and godly manner. This light and spirit, then, is a Heavenly gift distinct from man's natural conscience, for the natural conscience may become an evil one, through a wrong tradition, or through an abuse of it, for it is susceptible of being acted upon by evil as well as good, even by the many voices in the world; and all these may be included in two classes, the evil and the good.

And I presume that it is believed by all good men, that there is an evil spirit, and that this evil spirit can act immediately upon the conscience or mind of man, by way of tempting or leading him to evil, and enticing him to disregard the law of God, and that for the purpose of destroying him. And it is also as rationally and as fully believed, inasmuch as God who made him, gave him all the perceptions which at the first he possessed, that He can act immediately by his own spirit, on the conscience or mind of man, by way of leading him to good, in order to save him. And it will also be admitted that God's power is greater than the power of the Devil, and that his love is very great toward man. Who, then, that has the least understanding of his attributes, will believe Him to have given up and abandoned all internal and immediate visitations and government of the heart of his creature man, into the possession and hands of his enemy? For, if the enemy have the sole undisturbed possession of his heart, he can easily entice him to evil, even to disbelieve the Scriptures, and to disbelieve in God, as well as in all the means that God has provided for his deliverance from his enemy's hands. And when this enemy is in man's heart, it is full of darkness, because he is the prince of darkness, and therefore he cannot see whither he goeth, nor what he doeth. But when God is in his heart, he is full of light, because God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all: so that now, having this light in him, he seeth things as they are, whether in him, or around him in the world. But if God come not in, through men's resistances, by taking sides with the enemy, then the enemy's victory would be easily obtained, and that man, if he continue to resist his Maker, cannot be saved!

And if the enemy can so far succeed, through his own suggestions and through the suggestions of men of influence, as to make men wholly to disbelieve and disregard the witness for God in their hearts, he will effectually succeed in establishing his rule and reign in the heart of man, where the sceptre of God ought to prevail, and He to have the dominion there.

These arguments are not only corroborated by a vast amount of Scripture testimony, but by the experience of good men. And there is probably not a rational man, but will acknowledge, if he speak the truth, that he has been reproved for sin by something within him; and this, beyond all Christian disputation is the Spirit of God, which the Saviour has told us does reprove the world of sin.—What a grievous thing it is—what an incalculable evil in the world, for the leaders of the people to try to persuade them that this Reprover is but a mere natural conscience, or light of nature, or the result of tradition; the effect of which is to dishonor and disparage the gift of God; for inasmuch as it is a manifestation of God's displeasure against evil and the author of it, it is the same that will, through the obedience of faith, teach them of all which is good, and what is their duty to do, and I will give them strength to do it, and to become the children of God, by receiving him who is the Light and Saviour of the world, "the Way, the Truth and the Life," for to us as many as receive him, as such, to them He gave power to become the children of God.

Domine H. was one of the old-time circuit riders, whose rough exterior and somewhat non society ways, often obscured his real goodness of heart. One day he was caught in a shower of hail, and going to a rude cabin near by, he knocked at the door. A sharp looking old dame answered his summons. He asked for shelter. "I don't know you," she replied, suspiciously. "Remember the Scriptures," said the domine, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." "You needn't say that," quickly returned the other; "no angel would come down here with a big quid of tobacco in his mouth!" She shut the door in his face, leaving the good man to the mercy of the rain and his own reflections.

Travelling in the Desert of Sinai.

A dragoon, a waiter, a cook, sixteen Bedawin and sixteen camels loaded with baggage, chicken and turkey coops, water-barrels, tents, bedding, all sorts of provisions, and a cooking apparatus, make the caravan for four passengers. The journey lasts thirty days from Suez to Gaza. Hebron, via Sinai and Nakhil, and cost each passenger a little over two pounds ($10) per day. Some go only to Mount Sinai and back again to Suez, which takes three weeks. Others take the route to Akabah, Petra, and the Dead Sea, which is more interesting, but requires from forty to forty-five days, and an extra back-sheesh of ten pounds per person for permission of the Bedawin to pass through Petra. We could not take this route because of war among the Bedawin tribes, and thus missed the pleasure of seeing the Gulf of Akabah, the wonderful rock-hewn city of Petra, and ascending Mount Hor, where Aaron died.

The camel is an awkward, ugly, unclean, stupid, and ill-tempered animal, and looks like personified misery and discontent. But it is truly "the ship of the desert," and admirably adapted for its use on the boundless ocean of sand from the Nile to the Euphrates. It has needed no repair since the days of Abraham, and could not be improved by any invention in navigation. No horse or donkey would answer the purpose. The camel has the reputation of patient endurance and passive submission, which some, however, deny, or regard as mere stupidity. It carries the heaviest burdens on its single or double hump, which is its natural pack-saddle. Its very name means burden-bearer. It can travel five (some say nine or even fifteen) days in scorching heat without water, and resort to its inside tank or cistern, which, at the sacrifice of its own life, has saved the life of many a traveller. It lives on barley, dry beans, and chopped straw while in camp, and on the prickly thistles and thorns of the wilderness, which, much to the annoyance of the rider, it snatches from the wayside and leisurely chews as a positive luxury. It supplies its master with milk, fuel, sandals, and garments; and having done its duty, it leaves its bleached skeleton in the arid waste as a landmark to future travellers. With peevish grumbling growls or sighs of protest, unlike the sounds of any other animal, the camel goes down on its knees in four distinct motions, till it lies on its belly; growling it receives its burden; growling it gets up by several jerks, first on the hind-legs, then on the front-legs, so that the rider is violently pitched forward and then as violently jerked backward, and must hold fast to the saddle or be thrown down on the sand. Once started, the beast moves with long strides on its soft, spongy feet, steadily and noiselessly forward as under a painful sense of duty, but without the least interest in the rider. A primitive wooden frame serves as a saddle, and the mattress or pillow on which we sleep at night is thrown over it as a seat. The swinging motion high in the air is disagreeable and makes us a little seasick, but we gradually get used to it. The break the monotony and the fatigue we change our position, now riding as on horseback, now crossing the legs like the Arabs, now sitting on one side and then on the other. I parted with the "Djemel" at Gaza not without a certain admiration and respect, and yet I was glad to exchange it for the noble, spirited, and dashing horse. The Bible mentions the camel only incidentally, though in a way that implies its great usefulness; while the horse is described with glowing colors and honored with eloquent eulogy (Job xxxix. 19-25).

The programme of travel is the same for thirty or forty days. Before sunrise the camels begin to growl and the Bedawin to quarrel about the baggage. We get up; offer our prayers, eat our breakfast, consisting of coffee, bread and butter, and omelette or boiled eggs, while the tents are taken down, and the camels loaded amid much noise and clamor; we take a morning walk or at once mount our beast. At noon we stop for lunch and enjoy an hour's rest, lying under the shadow of a rock or the umbrella, or like Elijah under a juniper bush, or a tree of shittim-wood—of which the ark was built. If there is no natural shelter within reach, the dragoon spreads a small tent to protect us against the scorching heat. Then another ride of two or three hours till in the distance we see the white tents which have been erected by the Bedawin in charge of the baggage camels, two for the four passengers, one for the dragoon and cook. It is a delightful sight, after a weary ride of seven or eight hours over a distance of twenty-five miles of sand and rock.

Then begins the enjoyable part of the day. We throw ourselves down upon the iron bedstead, for it is the only place where we can stretch our limbs and rest our backs. In about half an hour the bell rings for dinner, and it tastes as good as on any table d'hôte in Europe. Hunger is the best cook. We get soup, two courses of meat, eggs, potatoes, rice and beans, nuts, and an ever-welcome orange for dessert, with a cup of tea. But the bread becomes stale, the water insipid, the orange dry, and the chickens and eggs give out as we approach the end of the journey. After dinner we fill up our journal, study the map, read the Bible and guide-book, and then go to bed. The Bedawin with the camels lie a few yards from us encamped on the ground around a fire and watch our tents. They smoke and chat and quarrel till all fall asleep under the bright stars.

A journey through the wilderness is no pleasure trip. It costs more for discomforts than we pay for comforts in civilized lands. The romance of camp-life among the wild Bedawin lies in anticipation and reminiscence, rather than actual experience. The intense heat, the vile insects, the growling of camels, the barbarous habits of the Arabs, the occasional sand-storms, and the many inevitable inconveniences, take away the rainbow color from the poetry. The journey is a weariness to the flesh from beginning to end, and ought not to be attempted except by persons of vigorous constitution.

And yet it impresses itself more deeply on the memory than most parts of an Eastern journey. It is instructive to the geologist, the botanist, the archæologist, and the Biblical student. It is a great satisfaction to pass over the route of the Israelites on their way to the land of promise, and to ascend the mountain from which God made his greatest revelation before the coming of Christ, and brings the early Bible history nearer and makes it clearer to us. It imparts a life and reality to the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which they never had before. It enables us to understand and appreciate the trials and sufferings, the murmurings and ingratitude of the Israelites, a the greatness, the patience and endurance Moses. Many objections of modern skept against the truthfulness of the Pentateuch are at once removed by a knowledge of the geography and the mode of life among the present Arabs. The frequent Scripture allusions to the refreshing fountains of the Desert the palm-tree, the shadow of a rock, the manna, receive new force. No man can encamp at 'Ayûn-Mûsa, Wady Ghurundel, and Wady Taiyibeh, without reading with a peculiar sensation even the simple words, "And he came to Elim, where were twelve wells of water and threescore and ten palm-trees; and they encamped there by the waters." Ex. xv. 27.

And what is Christian life, after all, but repetition on a higher key of the story of Israel: a deliverance from the bondage of sin and death, and a passage through the desert and over the Jordan to our heavenly home rest and peace.—Schaff's Through Bible Land.

For "The Friend"

"Train up a child in the way he should go."

I was interested and instructed by the conversation of an honest old German, now the 75th year of his age, who came to this country about 50 years ago. He spoke of business difficulties, and the little profit I was able to draw from his employment, owing to sharp competition, and the unscrupulous use of poor material and inferior workmanship in others with whom he had to compete. But the good old man dwelt with much satisfaction on the honest and worthy character of his children; who were making a reputable living, and would not see him suffer if want, if the time should ever come in which he needed their assistance.

This good character of his offspring was a result that might be expected from the careful and prudent training they received when young. At that critical period of their lives he had exercised a vigilant oversight. They were not permitted to remain out in the evenings later than 9 o'clock, and were expected to report how the time had been spent, during their absence from the home circle.

One incident he related which exemplified the good effect of his wife's assistance in training up the children in the way they should go. She had sent one of the boys, when a little child, to a grocery store on an errand and on his return she observed that he had a lump of sugar. To the question, as to how it came into his possession, he replied that the woman at the grocery store gave it to him. She took the boy with her and at once went to the store, and learned that the sugar had not been given him, but that he had taken it without asking, and then told a lie about it. For this double crime he was severely chastised; and the lesson thus taught him was effectually learned, and he was never known again to transgress the rules of honesty.

On another occasion, one of their boys, who was working in a jeweller's establishment, was asked by a neighboring woman to bring her from the shop a little rouge to polish an article of jewelry belonging to her. The mother heard the request, and at once emphatically forbid her son from bringing anything from the shop for any body.

Now that these boys have become middle-aged men, they continue to walk in the pat-honesty in which they were brought up. I sympathized with the old man in his honest jangling over the character of his children; I thought his experience might convey encouragement to others on whom similar responsibilities in the care of the young are now resting. J.

Tunnessassa, 24 mo. —.

By Robert Scottin.*

Dear Friend.—It is with a degree of pleasure that I feel disposed to make an attempt to answer thy acceptable letter. I have often thought of this since thou left Tunnessassa, and when on my visit to Chester county last winter, I thought there was no person, excepting my near relations, that I felt a much stronger desire to see. After I left thee at 10 o'clock, and returned to Tunnessassa, it at times felt lonesome and thought if I had Robert to consult and spend my evenings with, it would afford me much satisfaction; at the same time I think I could not have desired thee to have been out of thy proper place on my account. Dear friend, I think I have at times been favored to feel it a very important thing to know our proper places, and to be in them; it is there we can serve our Divine Master most acceptably, and experience the precious reward of peace, which I hope has been thy experience since thy return to thy friends, and may be the happy experience of us all. We have had a trying time, part of this last summer, contending with that distressing evil, intemperance. There were a number that made some use of ardent spirits who had been previously, for anything I know, entirely temperate. * * * I sometimes felt an inclination to put the law in force against such as sold the article to the Indians, but when I felt more composed, and my mind more favored, it did not feel as if I required of me, but rather to look up to Him who had power to preserve from this dreadful evil, and to labor with those who made use of ardent spirits. I also talked with those who retailed the article, of the sinfulness of the business in which they were engaged. Our trouble in regard to intemperance I think has in a degree abated; may the praise be to Him who in his mercy continues to look down with pity on his poor, helpless, dependent creature, man. * * * Moses Pierce's wife (of Cornplanter's reservation) was buried on First day the 10th, the disease was supposed to be consumption; she appeared to make a good end. I understood she said she felt ready and willing to die, and longed to be with her Divine Master. It has been said that Charles Obail was prejudiced against education on account of Henry's turning out so badly and making such poor use of his [school learning.] In conversation with Charles a few days ago, he expressed himself, as it was interpreted to me, in this way, "he was willing their children should be educated so that they might grow up to be useful;" he also said that he thought their religion and customs would soon be done away, and that he hoped their children might be good Christians. He has shown quite an interest in the support of the school, and when I have been there, he has frequently come and sat awhile in the school. E. Pierce is the teacher, he seems to take quite an interest in the school, and in the subject of education amongst the Indians generally. I understand he spoke in one of their large meetings at Cold Spring on that subject; he keeps pretty good order in his school, and the children appear to be improving. The school at Cold Spring in this neighborhood are not making as much improvement as I could desire. Owen Blacksnake told me to-day he wanted to keep near to the white people in the way of improvement. The Indians generally are getting along pretty comfortably as to provisions. I have sometimes thought the improvement on the upper end of the reservation exceeded that on any other. * * * visited this reservation with a minute from his Monthly Meeting, expressing a concern he felt to aid in the improvement of the condition of the natives. * * * I think Monthly Meetings should weigh such subjects well before they move much more in them. * * *

In sincere love I remain thy friend,
EBENEZER WORTH.

"For The Friend."

I am tired of hearing so much said about progression and higher life, putting the Scriptures before the Spirit, and long prayers in structing the Lord what to do. Now, if we as a church are wiser and better than early Friends, or even our forefathers, where are the fruits? I am now over eighty years of age, and can well remember that fifty and sixty years ago Friends took their children to meeting in the middle of the week. That was before this new-fangled notion got among us, that every converted person will make it manifest by a public confession, by singing or prayer; and when we encouraged the young folks to say in our meetings "thy love Jesus," Now what shall we say to these things? It won't do to get discouraged, for that won't bring peace. I try to bear all this and more, for I love to go to meeting, and believe divine worship to be the most solemn act our minds can be engaged in.

JOSEPH COOK.

Moderate Drinking.—I wish to relate one little incident to illustrate my point. At a meeting in a large town in Pennsylvania at the close of a lecture, a gentleman rose and was announced as Judge So-and-so—Judge of the Quarter Sessions. He said: "Ladies and gentlemen, before the audience is dismissed I wish to say a few words in defence of myself and the class I represent. Now it is very hard to have it publicly stated that I set a bad example. Now I am a moderate drinker; everybody knows me. I take it at home, I take it abroad. I am a moderate drinker—a respectable moderate drinker. Whoever saw me the worse for drink? If young men followed my example they would be as I am, respectable and respected. I challenge the country to say whether my example is a bad one. Let young men follow my example and they will be as I am." A man in the audience cried out, "Give it to him, old man, give it to him. Put a header on him." Some one said, "Put the man out," and a gentleman said, "No, let the man remain: he is the only son of the Judge—his only son tried to follow his example, and there is the result. He is so drunk that he would disturb a respectable meeting." And I tell you, every man from the beginning who has become a drunkard has become so by trying to be a moderate drinker and failing.—John B. Gough.

Summer Precillings.

The Religious Training of Children.—There is scarcely a truth more real and self-evident than that parents and teachers

"Are bound to cast the minds of youth
Betimes into the mould of heavenly truth,
That taught of God they may indeed be wise,
Nor, ignorantly wandering, miss the skies."

The Society of Friends has ever considered it a primary duty in parents to direct the minds of their children to the saving grace of the Lord Jesus within them, as their infallible instructor and guide into all truth. This, they are assured will, as given way to, effectually preserve from the false allurements and contaminating influences that are in the world, teach them all things as it is duly heeded, and lead into the straight and narrow way unto everlasting life. And it is in proportion as parents themselves come to believe in, and to rely upon the light, spirit and power of Christ Jesus revealed in the heart as the primary rule of faith and practice, that they can be instrumental in directing their precious and very responsible charge thereto, as to a Teacher not to be set in a corner; as our Emmanuel, God with us; as the Word nigh in the heart; as the light of life; as "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

To have this fundamental doctrine truly recognized, seems to be the only way to keep things in due subordination or in their right places. The Holy Scriptures themselves, helpful, invaluable, and precious beyond all price as they unquestionably are, are regarded, as their own records teach, as of secondary authority, and as directing to Christ of whom they so abundantly testify; "that the man of God may be perfect" through coming to Him, yet thoroughly furnished for every good work and work. The exercise of the ministry too, designed to be promotive of the same end, should aim to direct people to the Saviour and Bishop of their souls, that, through His day-spring and anointing power from on high, they may be led out of darkness into his marvellous light, and from the dominion of Satan to that of God.

Is it not after this manner that parents should endeavor to train up their children in the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom; and in his new covenant of light and life unto usefulness in the occupancy of the talents committed? As fathers and mothers are themselves thus engaged to hallow the Lord in their own hearts, and to have them dedicated in love and allegiance to Him, they will proportionally experience the indispensable need to

"exert a prudent care,
To feed their children's minds with proper fare."

They will not only seek after and to teach with a better wisdom than their own; not only watch over and restrain, as short-comings, Eli failed to do; not only by a consistent godly life and conversation seek to win them to the truth as it is in Jesus; but they will oft be engaged lovingly to commit the entrusted lambs, with earnest pleading hearts, to that tender Shepherd's care whose heritage children are: and who, under a less perfect covenant, commanded to teach the children to observe to do his law, saying: "For it is not a vain thing for you; because it is your life," &c.

It is in this way only, we apprehend, that the responsible duties inseparable from the parental relation can be duly discharged. And oh! that such might seek often to get to the watch-towers, there to "hearken diligently with much heed" for the still small voice of the Lord omnipotent, concerning the religious training of their dear children. Then might we hope that the hearts of the fathers would be more turned to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers; and, with the blessing of heaven, the joyful promise be fulfilled: "That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace."

A Child's Prayer Answered.—In 1842, I knew a poor family, the mother of whom taught her boy of about five years old to pray. At one time they were out of food and knew not where to get any, as there were no near neighbors, and the child found his mother weeping over their situation, fearing they would starve. With the utmost simplicity and confidence he said: "Why no, mother, we will not starve. I have been praying to the Lord to send us food, and I know He will. Now don't cry, mother, we'll get food somehow, for the Lord will send it." The little boy was more confident than his mother that the Lord would help them, and sure enough, the next day some friends living 14 miles away, who knew nothing of their present distress, made them a visit with a large wagon load of substantial provisions which they gave them, as they knew they were rather poor, and those things might not come amiss. I knew that boy and some of his relatives quite well, and in 1874, was told by his uncle, that he grew up to be a good and worthy Christian man, and at one time was at the head of a school in a western State. His sisters, of whom there were several, were all well married and settled in life. Why should not such a child's prayer be answered as well as the prayer of older persons? It is the Omnipotent God who appointed prayer as a means of grace, who observes the needy, trusting ones who call on Him for help, through the merits of his Son our Saviour, and prayers are being answered in thousands of instances every day, of which the world hears or cares nothing.—B. M. Genning in Chris. Standard.

The Danger of Yielding to Sin.—When Captain Cook went on his survey round the world, there was attached to the expedition, in the capacity of naturalist, a learned Swede named Solander; and when a party from the ships landed in Patagonia, Dr. Solander accompanied them. It was in the depth of winter, and a cold south wind, accompanied with driving snow, surprised the explorers at a distance from their encampment. Dr. Solander called the party round him. "I have had some experience of this," said he, "in my own country, and you have had none; attend to my advice, for upon it depends your lives. We must resolutely set our faces to get back to the encampment; we must do this without stopping, for the danger lies in falling asleep. I warn you that the men, as their blood grows cold, will ask to be allowed to rest; do not permit them for one moment: urge them, urge them with blows, urge them with the bayonet if necessary. The wish to stop is the first symptom of the blood refusing to circulate; to yield to it is death."

The party moved on. The wind blew, and the snow fell, and the frost cut them through and through; but stout English hearts held on still. There was no prayer for rest; there was no wish to stop, or, if there was, it was suppressed and kept under by a firm strong will, until at last, to the surprise of all, the Swedish doctor himself asked for a halt; only for five minutes, he said, and they would all get on so much better after it. The lieutenant in command of the party paused a moment, but he recollected the doctor's own earnest admonitions. "No," said he, "urge him on, drive him on, beat him if necessary; do not let him stop for one moment, or he dies." The doctor expostulated; but the men had their orders, and acted upon them. He stormed, but British discipline was far beyond the reach of his anger. Swedish temper is somewhat of the shortest, and the doctor, grasping his pole, laid about him stoutly, beating this man, pushing at another, kicking a third. Still the men drove into camp, till at last, his blood being got into circulation by his own exertions and the energy of his friends, he awoke to a sense of his danger, and lived to thank his companions for the rough but salutary remedy, and to confess that he owed his life to the steadiness of British discipline and the hearty throaeks of British oak. How aptly illustrative is this of the insidiousness of sin, and of the need of the soul to be kept alive to its terrible danger!—Newland.

DREAMING AT FOURSCORE.

She sits in the gathering twilight
In her well-worn rocking chair,
With the snow of life's long winter
In the meshes of her hair.
She dreams of the little children
Who left her long ago,
And listens for their footsteps
With the longing, mothers know.

She hears them coming, coming!
And her heart is all date
At the patter of little footsteps
Down by the garden gate.
The clatter of children's voices
Comes merrily to her ears,
And she cries in her quivering tremble,
"You are late my little dears!"

And then, they are here beside her
As she had but long ago—
Susie, and Ben, and Harry,
And Ruthie, and little Joe,
And her heart throbs high with rapture
As each fond kiss is given,
And the night is filled with music,
Sweet as her dreams of heaven.

Such wonderful things they tell her!
A nest in the apple-tree;
And the robin gave them a scolding
For climbing up to see!
A wee white lamb in the pasture—
A wild rose on the hill—
And such a great ripe strawberry
As Joe found by the mill!

She listens to all their prattle,
Her heart abrim with rest,
She's queen in a little kingdom,
Each child a royal son,
Queen? 'Tis an empty title!
More than a queen is she;
Mother of young immortals,
Who gather at her knee.

She brings their welcome supper,
And they sit down at her feet,
Tired, and hungry, and happy,
And she laughs to see them eat.
Then she smooths the yellow tangles
With a mother's patient hand,
While she tells some wonderful story
Of the children's fairy-land.

Then a quiet comes about her,
Solemn, and still, and deep,
And she says in her dreamy fancies,
"The children are fast asleep,"
Yes, fast asleep, poor mother,
In their beds so low and green;
Daisies and clover blossom
Each face and the sky between.

A LITTLE WHILE.

What is this that He saith?
"T is but a little while,"
And trouble and pain and death
Shall vanish before His smile.
"A little while," and the load
Shall drop at the pilgrim's feet,
Where the sheep are fast asleep,
Doth merge in the golden street.

But what is this that He saith?
"A little while," and the day
Of the servant that laboreth
Shall be done forever and aye.

O the truth that is yet unmet!
O the sufferings that are yet unmet!
O the offerings manifold,
And the sorrows that have no tongue!
O the helpless hands held out,
And the wayward feet that stray
In the desolate paths of doubt,
And the sinner's downward way!

For a silence soon will fall
On the lips that burn for speech,
And the needy and poor that call,
Will forever be out of reach.

"For the work that ye must do,
Before the coming of death,
There remaineth, O faithful few,
But a little while, He saith."

Providence and Potatoes.—It is a blessed thing to trust in the good providence of God, but those who trust the most implicitly also work the most faithfully. God giveth the increase; but Paul must not leave off planting, nor Apollus watering, on that account; they can do all this, and then have plenty left to trust in God for.

The man who trusts in God to do what the Lord has told him to do himself, will find that there is some misunderstanding about matters somewhere. Faith and works should ever go together, and he who does his best is quite as trustful as he who is less faithful over the few things committed to him.

It is related that the celebrated Welsh preacher—Christmas Evans, was once discussing the potato question with his thrifty, diligent wife, and perhaps in a playful, but still in a characteristic way, said to her:—

"Catharine you never mind the potatoes; put your trust in Providence and all will be well."

"I tell you what we'll do, Christmas," replied Catharine; "you go and sit down on the top of Moelly Gest, waiting for Providence, and I'll go and hoe the potatoes; and we shall see to which of us Providence will come first!"

Noah, Abraham, Moses, Gideon, David, Elisha, Daniel, Paul, Peter, Matthew, James, John, and others whom the Lord chose, honored, and blessed, were very busy, active men, and were, in most instances, called to the work of God when busily engaged in secular pursuits—keeping sheep, threshing wheat, plowing the fields, guiding the State, receiving taxes, catching fish, mending nets, and such like active and useful occupations. From the midst of these labors they were called to deliver nations, lead armies, utter prophecies, and save men.

We should have to look long before we could find an elegant "gentleman of leisure" on the staff of the Captain of our Salvation. Paul, to be sure, was an educated man, but he was also a tent-maker, and was full of restlessness energy, persecuting the saints even to strange cities, when the Lord called him to his work.

Pray much, but work with all your might. "Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."—The Church Union.

Roman Catholic idea of human priesthood.—At the recent consecration of a Roman Catholic Bishop at Hartford, Connecticut, a sermon was preached by one of the bishops, which stated that the clergy were superior to the simple Christians, and were workers of miracles, feeding thousands with celestial food;—that the priest occupies a middle place between God and man. This is quite at variance with the language of the Apostle Peter, who says to the members of the church "scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia," "Ye also as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." Again he addresses them as "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood," &c. In the Christian church there is no priest to mediate between God and man but the Saviour himself, whom Paul describes as "a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people."

Jewish Convention.—A convention of representative Jews from various parts of the world is to meet shortly in Paris, to consider the interests of their race. Committees are to report on different subjects—one, on the schools and agencies for the care of their youth in Palestine; another, on the promotion of Hebrew literature; others, on the condition of their people in Russia, Turkey, Morocco and China.

The Christian Advocate remarks respecting this convention:—"Thus this people retain their distinct existence through all these weary generations, without having any land which they can call their own."

An Instantaneous Judgment.—The Primitive Christian publishes the following incident furnished by one of its correspondents—B. C. Moomaw.

"The following was related to me by a very old man, an eye witness to the scene, whose veracity I have no reason to doubt:

"In the year 1822 at Amherst Court House, Va., the case of Rains against Mitchell, for unpaid wages, was tried, and a fellow by the name of Jordan Rhodes was one of the witnesses. Mitchell was a carpenter, and Rains had done some work for him in a subordinate capacity, for which he could get no pay. Suit being brought, Mitchell hired Rhodes, who was a clever but unprincipled character, to swear that he had witnessed the payment of the money. Barely had the last word escaped his lips when he fell unconscious to the floor; the application of restoratives revived him, but he could never speak a word; to the day of his death he was dumb, and, in writing, acknowledged the calamity as a judgment sent upon him for his presumptuous and infamous act of perjury."

Bible in Mexico.—It is reported from Mexico that the Catholic Church authorities have sanctioned the printing and distribution in that country of the New Testament in Spanish. A Mexico correspondent of The Methodist, writing of this, says it is looked upon as one of the most remarkable things that has occurred in that country for years, and that it will no doubt open the way to get the Bible without notes into the hands of the people. There seems to be no essential difference between this translation and the one used by Protestants. There are entire chapters without a single note; and on many of the passages especially relied upon by Rome to uphold her teachings, there are only a few brief words. Some persons say that the funds raised by the sale of the books go to build a convent in London.

Chinese Methodists.—On the 3rd of 8th mo. a new chapel was opened at Oakland, California, by the Methodist Episcopal Chinese located there. The congregation had been increasing in size till it became necessary to build a larger place for worship. Some assistance was rendered by Americans, but more than one half of the expense was paid by the Chinese themselves. Several of their native preachers were present on the occasion.

A Burning Coal Vein.—A fire in a colliery is by no means an uncommon occurrence in this or any other coal region; but in most cases the flames are soon drowned out, the water removed, and mining continued as before. It is only on rare occasions that the flames make such headway (before being discovered) that they cannot be extinguished in a few weeks by the introduction of water and steam. One of the most interesting and extensive fires ever known in this country has been raging in a colliery in Schuylkill county for nearly forty-five years. Thousands of dollars have been spent in vain endeavors to extinguish the fire, but at last the idea was abandoned, and since the beginning of the war nothing has been done to subdue the conflagration, which rages without interruption. The history of this mine is very interesting, and, strange to say, although hundreds of travellers visit the coal fields of this and adjoining counties every year, hardly any of them hear of this great curiosity. The vein that is burning is called the "Jugular," and the surface crop was first worked in 1833 by Lewis E. Dougherty, at a place called Coal Castle, one and a half miles west of what is now known as Mount Laffee. The coal taken out was of excellent quality and the mine very productive. Where a drift is worked above water level it is the custom to keep a huge grate filled with burning coal just inside the mouth, to keep the water in the gutters from freezing. Such a grate was in operation in the upper drift of Dougherty's mine in the winter of 1835. One Saturday night the grate was filled with an unusually large quantity of coal, and the miners went to their homes. On the following Monday morning, when the mine was visited, it was found to be filled with flames. It is supposed that the fire in the grate became communicated to the timbers, and, moving along the upper drift, was, by means of an air-hole, carried into the lower drift. At any rate, the coal in both drifts was on fire when the men came to work, and two of the miners recklessly went in to save their tools and never returned. Efforts were made to extinguish the fire, but after working with that object in view for several weeks, Dougherty at last gave up all hopes, and abandoning the place, opened another colliery about half a mile west of it. During the winter of 1856-57, John McGinnis, a well-known resident of Pottsville, heard of the large body of coal that lay near the abandoned mine, and concluded that some of it could be got out without reaching the fire. With that in view he put in a slope on the east side of the vein and below the water level. The work, however, progressed slowly, and owing to the heavy masses of rock encountered was very expensive. He was finally rewarded by striking the "Jugular" vein at a point where there was a deposit of coal so thick that two or three miners could keep the breaker going, and, although it was worked for months, they never succeeded in getting through it. The coal proved to be first-class, and four hundred yards of gangway had been driven when the miners began to complain of excessive heat, and then McGinnis knew they were approaching the fire in the mine Dougherty had abandoned. This was about a year after the slope had been started, and McGinnis saw that it would be necessary to open an air-hole. This work began at once, but after driving twenty or thirty yards the heat became so intense that the workmen were almost suffocated, and many of them refused to continue. By paying double wages, however, a number of men were found willing to work in the air-hole; but some idea of the intense heat may be had when it is stated that the men worked perfectly naked, and were relieved every ten minutes. After the air-hole had been opened about fifty yards the heat became unbearable, and the men fainting when exposed to it a minute or two. Seeing that it was impossible to complete the air-hole, work in it was given up, and at a fortunate time, for it was afterwards discovered that if the hole had been carried up a few yards further, it would have struck the water in the mine. About this time the miners noticed that when a shot was fired, and the coal came rolling down in huge masses, it was so warm that it could not be comfortably handled. Every day the miners expected to see the fire break out, and at last, on coming to work one morning they found the gangway filled with smoke and flames. As this was expected to happen sooner or later, preparations had been made to extinguish the fire, and the mine was soon filled with water. This treatment had the desired effect, and when the water was pumped out work was resumed. From this time forward it was almost a continual fight with fire, and no less than eight times was the colliery filled with water and pumped dry again. The ninth time the colliery was filled with water, the machinery got out of order and the pump refused to work. As McGinnis had sunk all his capital and could not raise enough money to purchase new machinery, the mine was abandoned in the winter of 1859. The fire

continued to burn until the barrier between the mine were consumed and the timbers in McGinnis' mine gradually rotted away, and finally the slope caved in. From that time until now the fire has continued without interruption, and the coal has been consumed for a half mile in every direction. The ground has caved in in many places, leaving great chasms that vary from fifty to one hundred feet in depth. To travel over the burnt district is exceedingly dangerous to any one not familiar with the country, for in many places great holes are fully covered by a shell of burned earth three or four feet thick. McGinnis states that even as familiar as he is with the locality, he came very near losing his life there a few years ago by falling through the crust. He was crossing a portion of the burnt field when he felt the earth giving way under his feet, and on starting to run for firmer ground he sunk up to his armpits in dry ashes and burned earth. Fortunately he managed, with the assistance of a friend, to extricate himself and reach solid ground without injury. Inhabitants of the region never attempt to cross over the burning vein at night. The only external evidence of the great conflagration that is going on underneath the ground at that point, is the total absence of vegetable life. Stones on the surface of the ground are so hot that they cannot be held, and snow is melted as fast as it falls. During rainy weather the surrounding country is enveloped in dense clouds of fog that rise from the overheated earth. The fire has now burned across the top rock and into a dirt vein of soft coal, where it may last for many years.—Pottsville Miner's Journal, Travelling Rocks.—A strange scene, for example, which came within my observation last year, completely puzzled me at the time and has done so ever since. I was in Nova Scotia in the fall, when one day my Indian told me that in a lake close by all the rocks were moving out of the water, a circumstance which I thought not a little strange. However, I went to look at the unheard-of spectacle, and, sure enough, there were the rocks apparently all moving out of the water on to dry land. The lake is of considerable extent, but shallow and full of great masses of rock. Many of these masses appear to have travelled right out of the lake, and are now high and dry, some fifteen yards above the margin of the water. They have plowed deep and regularly defined channels for themselves. You may see them of all sizes, from blocks of, say, roughly speaking, six or eight feet in diameter, down to stones which a man could lift. Moreover, you find them in various stages of progress, some a hundred yards or more from shore, and apparently just beginning to move; others had way to their destination, and others again, as I have said, high and dry above the water. In all cases there is a distinct groove or furrow which the rock has clearly ploughed for itself. I noticed one particularly good specimen, an enormous block which lay some yards above high-water mark. The earth and stones were heaped up in front of it to a height of three or four feet. There was a deep furrow, the exact breadth of the block, leading down directly from it into the lake, and extending till it was hidden from my sight by the depth of the water. Loose stones and pebbles were piled up on each side of this groove in a regular, clearly defined line. I thought at first that from some cause or other the smaller stones, pebbles and sand had been dragged down from above, and consequently had piled themselves up in front of all the large rocks too heavy to be removed, and had left a vacant space or furrow behind the rocks. But if that had been the case the drift of moving material would of course have joined together again in the space of a few yards behind the fixed rocks. On the contrary, these grooves or furrows remained the same width throughout their entire length, and have, I think, undoubtedly been caused by the rock forcing its way up through the loose shingle and stones which compose the bed of the lake. What power has set the rocks in motion it is difficult to decide. The action of ice is the only thing that might explain it; but how ice could exert itself in that special manner, and why, if ice is the cause of it, it does not manifest that tendency in every lake in every part of the world, I do not pretend to comprehend.

My attention having been once directed to this, I noticed it in various other lakes. Unfortunately my Indian only mentioned it to me a day or two before I left the woods. I had no time, therefore, to make any investigation into the subject. Possibly some of my readers may be able to account for this, to me, extraordinary phenomenon.—Lord Dunsaree in Nineteenth Century.

The Academy of the Natural Sciences.—At a recent meeting of the Academy of Natural Sciences, Dr. Leidy called attention to a broken rose diamond set in a sleeve button. While the wearer was recently sitting in the sun, the diamond exploded with sufficient force to drive one fragment into his hand and another into his forehead. On examination the explosion was thought to be due to the expansion of a volatile liquid contained in a cavity on one of the cleavage planes of the stone. The artificial culture of ostriches has become an important industry at the Cape of Good Hope, the value of the annual yield of feathers being estimated at $2,500,000. It has been suggested that the business might profitably be introduced into the United States, and in response to the question, "Could ostriches be raised in the United States?" the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institute says there is not much doubt that the whole western slope of the Pacific south of San Francisco, as also portions of Arizona, and probably even Texas, would serve for the cultivation of the ostrich.

The other day I had an attack of neuralgia in the face; it was as if fingers of fire were feeling for every nerve, and it was so agonizing at times that I grasped the side of my face with clenched hands and cried out. A gentleman said to me, "Would you take a tablespoonful of brandy if you knew it would relieve you of that pain?" I was not long in saying, "No." You may call that extra fanaticism, but I would not take a spoonful of brandy to save my life. If I were to take a glass of brandy to ease me of pain, it would injure my influence for good; and a man who willingly does that which will injure his influence for good among his fellow-men, I hold, commits a sin.—J. B. Gough.

"Well, madame," said John Newton to one who was complaining of the imperfections of others, "if there were a perfect Church on earth, it would cease being so the moment you and I entered it." And that remark still has a pertinent application for those who, we fear, will not apply it.

We have received the following communication, referring to the case of the Friend who felt restrained from complying with the request to offer vocal prayer by the bedside of a sick woman, as mentioned on page 15 of our journal.

On page 485 of the Journal of George Fox is the following incident:

"We visited Friends and were visited by them at Cossel; where, amongst others, came a woman and brought her daughter for me to see how well she was, putting me in mind, that when I was there before, she had brought her to me, much troubled with the king's evil, and had then desired me to pray for her; which I did, and she slept upon it; praised be the Lord."

I write this for the eye of the person who was the subject of last week's Editorial in "The Friend." And though not wishing to call forth unfeigned expression, to be instant in season and pray without ceasing are scripture injunctions, and the prayer of the righteous avails much.

William Penn wrote of George Fox that "the most awful, living, reverent frame I ever felt or beheld was his, in prayer." Let us endeavor to be equal to all the occasions of life; if we are not 'tis our fault, and not His, "who would have his sons and servants like himself."

"On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires."

8th mo. 24th, 1879.

On this we desire to remark, that while George Fox and all true Friends have ever believed in the efficacy of that prayer which proceeds from the prompting of the Spirit in the heart, they have borne uniform testimony against all vocal expression in the form of prayer which did not originate from that source. Robert Barclay does not hesitate to stigmatize such offerings as "will worship" and "idolatry." The appropriateness of this last term will be more obvious if we consider the meaning of the word, which is literally—the worship of images. When we attempt to offer prayer without the heart, being rightly influenced thereto, we do not really worship the Father, who can be worshipped only in spirit and in truth.

In the case referred to, George Fox no doubt felt the Divine requirement to offer prayer for the restoration to health of the sick girl, or he would not have ventured unbidden to approach the King Immortal, of whose majesty he had such an "awful, living, reverent" sense as William Penn expresses. This is evidenced by another passage in his journal, where he relates that in a meeting at Mansfield, one of the professors came to him and desired that he would pray, "but," he says, "I could not pray in man's will."

John Richardson says that when he was in the Bermudas, at the house of Judge Stafford, the judge sent a message desiring he would come and pray for him, before he went away. To which John replied, "Tell the judge, that if he will suffer us to come into his room, and sit down and wait upon the Lord, as our manner is in such a case as this, if it please the ord to move us by his Holy Spirit to pray, or may; but if not, let not the judge take it miss, for we are willing to be at the Lord's disposing in all things." This deeply experienced minister did not presume to utter words without a sense of the Divine requiring; but he waited on the Lord, the same good spirit that raised desires for his soul's welfare in the mind of the judge, enabled his servant to intercede on his behalf. For he says, "The Lord was pleased in his love and by his mighty power to break in upon us, and also pen my mouth in his gift of grace and of application, in which gift, ardent and fervent cries went up to the Lord of heaven and earth that He would send health and salvation to the judge, and also to all his family, and to all people far and near, that all every where might repent and come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved. The judge wept aloud, and a mighty visitation it was to his family."

Isaac Pennington wrote a letter to one who did not understand why it was that he did not conform to the practice of other professors of religion in his day, of offering prayer in his family at stated times. In this, he says: "The Lord hath shown me that prayer is his gift to the child which He begets; and that it stands not in the will or time or understanding or affectionate part of a creature, but in his own begetting, which He first breathes upon, and then it breathes again towards Him; and that He worketh this at his own pleasure, and no time can be set Him when He shall breathe, or when He shall not breathe; and that when He breathes, then is the time of prayer."

We do not suppose that our correspondent understands the Scripture injunction—"Pray without ceasing"—to justify the offering of words without Divine life and authority accompanying, for such words are not true prayer; nor would he have considered it the duty of Jeremiah to approach the Almighty with petitions for a rebellious people, after receiving the express command, "Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up thy cry nor prayer for them, neither make intercession to me; for I will not hear thee." Jer. vii. 16.

The exhortation of the Apostle Peter—"watch and pray" throws some light on Paul's advice to "pray without ceasing" and taken in connection with the beloved John's assertion that, "if we ask anything according to his will, He heareth us;" we believe it implies, that we should live in that watchful state of mind in which our attention is turned to the Light of Christ inwardly revealed, with desires to know the Divine will, and to receive strength from the Lord to obey it. Here we shall be instructed what to pray for, and shall become fruitful in the field of offering.

This text has been some-times misapplied, so as to sanction formal petitions at stated times, such as regularly saying "Grace" at table, and vocal prayer (so called) on all occasions of a family gathering for reading the Scriptures and waiting on the Lord. Such performances are often seen to be exceedingly flat and lifeless by those whose ears are in measure anointed to try words as the mouth tasteth meat. We well remember the instruction conveyed on this subject by the remarks of an aged Friend, who had for many years been enlisted in the Lord's service. In a large meeting for discipline, where the queries and their answers were being considered, some younger men had urged the need of family prayer in strong language, and without calling attention to the indispensable requisite, that the mind should on every occasion be freshly anointed for the service. The aged Friend arose and related his own experience when a lad of fifteen years of age. He was at that time in a tender, watchful condition; and when he was conscious at any time of having missed his way, he was accustomed to retire in secret, and pray to his Heavenly Father for forgiveness and the restoration of peace of mind. These prayers were always the silent breathings of his soul to God, and were heard and answered by Him who seeth in secret, and who knew the sincerity and fervency of his heart. On one such occasion, the thought presented, "Why do I not pray aloud, as they do in meeting?" He had never felt this to be required of him, but thought he would now comply with the suggestion. But on attempting to utter words, which were not called for by the Lord, the spirit of prayer left him, and all became dry and lifeless. As he mused in wonder on the change of feeling, the instruction was sealed on his youthful mind, that though vocal prayer might be called for under some circumstances, especially in meetings for the sake of those who were present, yet words were not necessary for intercourse between the soul and its Creator.

Robert Barclay in treating on this subject says, that prayer is twofold, inward and outward. "Inward prayer is that secret turning of the mind toward God whereby being secretly touched and awakened by the light of Christ in the conscience, and so bowed down under the sense of its iniquities, unworthiness and misery, it looks up to God, and joining with the secret shinings of the seal of God, it breathes toward Him, and is constantly breathing forth some secret desires and aspirations towards Him." It is in this sense that we are so frequently in Scripture commanded to pray continually, which cannot be understood of outward prayer, because it were impossible that men should be always upon their knees, expressing words of prayer; and this would hinder them from the exercise of those duties which are positively commanded. Outward prayer is, when as the spirit, being thus in the exercise of inward retirement, and feeling the breathing of the Spirit of God to arise powerfully in the soul, receives strength and liberty by a supernatural motion and influence of the Spirit to bring forth either audible sighs, groans, or words, and that either in public assemblies, or in private, or at meat, &c.

He adds that "such as are diligent and watchful in their minds, and much retired in the exercise of this inward prayer, are more capable to be frequent in the use of the outward, because this holy influence doth more constantly attend them." And he further gives this caution, which it would be well for all of us to lay to heart, "We question not but many, through neglect of this inward watchfulness and retiredness of mind, miss many precious opportunities to pray, and thereby are guilty in the sight of God, yet would they sin if they should sit about the act until they first felt the influence."

AGENT APPOINTED.

Since publishing the names of Agents for "The Friend" in last week's issue, Allen Parnas, of Danville, Henriicks Co., Ind., has been added to the list.

NOTICE.

Agents and other Friends, sending us the name of New Subscribers, are particularly requested to mention this fact in their communications with full mailing directions.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—An order for fifty two-horse cars, for use in South London, has been recently completed by a New York firm. They are now building for the same market a number of one-horse cars, which will be known in London as coupés. American cars are preferred in England for their superior strength and lightness.

The great majority of the sugar and molasses hog-heads which are emptied of their contents in this city, says the Boston Commercial, find their way back to the West Indies. The hog-heads are purchased from the refiners by an enterprising firm who take them apart, clean the staves, and bundle them into shocks, and export them, together with their heads, to Cuba. This firm have one yard in South Boston, in which they thus prepare 2000 hog-heads per week for export.

The consumption of wood in the United States is enormous. Railways sleepers alone require 150,000 acres of the best timber every year. The annual expenditure for railway buildings, repairs, and cars, is $38,500,000. The locomotives in the United States consume $6,000,000 worth of the article. Wood industry amounts to $500,000,000, in which there are 40,000 artisans.

Fifty-two vessels belonging to, or bound to or from America, ports, were wrecked during the last month. The value of the vessels, exclusive of cargoes, is estimated at $685,500.

The steamship Laborer, which arrived at New York on the 31st inst. from Europe, brought $1,000,000 in gold bars, and $300,000 in 20 franc gold pieces.

The total receipts of the Patent Office, during the year ending 7th mo. 30th, were $703,146, and the expenditures $948,611.

Eight hours were sent from Chester county, Pa., to England last week. These animals were selected with special reference to size and style, speed being a minor consideration—none are less than sixteen hands high.

The receipts of wheat for the last month at this port, were 4577 bushels, which nearly double the amount received during the same month last year. The receipts of all grains at the four principal Atlantic ports, for the week ending the 26th ult., were 7,201,818 bushels; and the receipts since the first of the year are 153,923,064 bushels.

At the recent election in San Francisco, the Working men appear to have elected their candidates for Mayor, Sheriff, Auditor, District Attorney, Tax Collector, Public A. Mini-truster and Surveyor.

The number of deaths from yellow fever, during the last week in Memphis, was 165, making a total to this time of 272. Three new cases were reported in New Orleans on the 6th inst.

The mortality in this city the past week, was 345, an increase of 31 over the previous week, and 37 over the same period last year.

Markets.—Consolidated Bonds, sizes, 1831, 104½; 5½, 102½; 4½ per cents, 104½; 3½, 1907, 101½.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings at 12½ a 13 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 5 cts. in bids, and refined, 7 a 7½ cts. per gallon. Lard, 55 a 56 cts. for California, and 61 cts. for American. Lard oil, 46 a 46½ cts. Crude sperm, 75 cts.; bleached winter, 92 a 95 cts. per gallon.

Flour.—Minnesota extra, $5 a 57½; Ohio, $5.25 a $5.60; patent, $6 a $7. Eye flour, $3.25 a $3.37½. Bran, $1.25 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat in fair demand.—Penna. and southern red, and amber, $1.10 a $1.11; white, $1.11 a $1.11½. Rye, 53 a 54 cts. Corn, 45 a 48 cts. Oats, 33 a 34 cts. for mixed, and 36 cts. for white.

Hay and Straw.—Prime Timothy, 70 a 85 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 60 a 70 cts.; straw, 70 a 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

Wool.—The market was inactive, and prices were lower—Extra, 54 a 55 cts.; medium, 4 a 4½ cts.; common, 3 a 3½ cts. Cows, $20 a 35 per head. Calves, 4 a 5½ cts. per month. Sheep, $5 a 6 cts. per pound, as to quality. Lambs, 4½ a 5½ cts. per pound.

FOREIGN.—The British trade returns for the seven months ending 7th mo. 31st, show the declared value of British and Irish produce exported to the United States during that period, was £67,48,200, equal to $53,741,480. For the corresponding period of '57, the total value was £1,078,069, showing a decrease of more than 40 per cent.

A paper recently published in Germany showing the different rates of velocity of railway trains, states the swiftest runs are in England, the highest of which average 50 miles an hour. In Belgium, some trains average only 42 miles. The express from Paris to Bordeaux, averages 39½ miles. The Austrian express speed is from 40 to 48 miles. On the Moscow and St. Petersburg line, one travels at nearly 27 miles per hour; the same speed is observed in Switzerland, on some of the lines, but on others would not be content with a slower pace; there are no through trains in Switzerland.

The Vienna Free Press states, there were in Europe at the close of 1877, 58,446 post-offices, with 228,517 persons employed; this making an average of one post-office establishment for every 6,134 inhabitants. These post-offices are most thickly planted in Switzerland, next, Great Britain and Ireland. In Russia there is one post-office to every 5,678, and in Turkey one to every 1,106 square miles. There were 5,682,000,000 letters, papers, &c., sent by post in the course of the year. Great Britain and Ireland the total was 1,483,075,000, or at the rate of 347 letters, and 9.4 newspapers for each inhabitant. In Switzerland, each inhabitant on an average sent 23.7 letters, 18.8 papers in the year; Germany, 16.8 letters, 10.1 papers; Holland, 13.6 letters, 7.9 newspapers; Belgium, 12.6 letters, 10.1 papers; France, 12.7 letters, 5.6 papers; Denmark, 12.5 letters, 12.3 papers; Russia, 1.2 letters, 0.9 papers; Turkey, 0.2 letters, 0.1 paper.

From the Maritime Statistics of the Kingdom of Norway, it appears that in 1877, the tonnage of that country, the second largest in the world, numbered 8,064, of 1,493,041 tons burden. Of these, 4,777 vessels belonged to the cities and the larger shipping and fishing places, while 3,287 were owned by country districts. The explanation of this is, that in Norway ship-building is carried on almost entirely in one form of money investment. Instead of putting their money in banks, the inhabitants of a village or parish, put together their savings and build or buy a ship. Though there is money enough in Norway, all the Norwegian railways have been built and are being built, and the fact that a Norwegian peasant considers it below his dignity to own railway shares, while his reputation is increased by being owner of shares in ships.

At the recent meeting of the Suez Canal Company, some important resolutions were working were given. It appeared the receipts of the canal for the year 1878, of ships passing through the canal, showed in 1878, for the first time since its opening, a threatening diminution. Five-sixths of the whole tonnage is British. The diminution of traffic is unequally distributed: three-fifths fallen 41 per cent; Germany, nearly 45 per cent; Danish 53; and Egyptian 47 per cent. The trade under the French, Spanish, Portuguese and American flags has slightly increased.

The national debt of the Russian empire, bearing interest, has become enormous. Holland it owes $4,507,000, 000; to England £11,709,000, and to France 565,231,000 F. In the Seventh month, the sum of its public money, not bearing interest, amounted to 716,512,225 roubles, to which must be added 415,650,000 francs, besides cash on hand.

Arrangements for the expedition into Central Asia to investigate the practicability of diverting the Amu Daria, and causing it to flow into the Caspian Sea, have been completed. The expedition has been divided into three detachments, of which two will be sent to Krasnodarsk and Khiva, and the third will examine the river and delta. The latter has started, the departure of the others has been postponed in consequence of the disturbed condition of the Turcoman Steppes.

General Grant, accompanied by the Swedish arctic explorer, late Mr. Bell, met at Stockholm, and says: "All are well. The Vega is in excellent condition. Have had no sickness."

General Grant and family sailed from Yokohama on the 24th inst. for San Francisco.

The return of the steamer Japan for Fifth month, give the value of merchandise imported into the country at $2,500,000; exports amounted to $2,607,000. Imports of specie $518,000; exports $1,911,357. The exports of duties for the month were $117,439.

Information has been received from the British Embassy that heverald Afghanistan regiments. The Amer writes that he was completely surprised and that he is entirely deceived. After the buildings of the Embassy had been fired, the survivors sallied out and fought till all were killed. The circumstance has caused much excitement throughout India.

The mails from Calcutta bring confirmation of the report that the United States Consul has invited in active mediation between the South American countries now at war. It is said the entire press of Chili has pronounced against any intervention.

The official return for 7th month, gives the total deaths from small-pox in Calcutta, and in Calcutta, for the same month, 130. The deaths are largely in cases of unvaccinated children.

EVENING SCHOOLS FOR ADULT COLORED PERSONS.

Teachers will be wanted for these schools, to open 16th month 6th. Application may be made to James Bromley, 644 Franklin St., Colburn Smith, 1110 Pine St., Thomas Elkinton, 9 N. Front St., Charles C. Cresson, 1132 Grand St.

WESTWON BOARDING SCHOOL.

Our friends Benjamin W. and Rebecca G. Passmore having resigned their positions as Superintendent and Matron of Westwon Boarding School, Friends will may feel drawn to engage in the important and responsible duties of superintending this Institution, are requested to communicate with either of the undersigned. The present Superintendents desire to be released 1st month next, or earlier.

William P. Townsend, West Chester, Pa.
John S. Comfort, Fallington, Bucks Co., Pa.
Charles J. Allen, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.
Elizabeth R. Evans, 322 Union St.
Anna V. Edge, Downingtown, Pa.
Deborah Rhodes, Haddonfield, N. J.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second day, Ninth mo. 8th, 1879.

A limited number of children will now be admitted to these schools, not members of our religious Society whose parents may have their children educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is particularly invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, may have their names put on the list of the burlesque, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of John H. Dillingham and Margaret Lightfoot, as Principals, both successful teachers of many years' experience. With these Friends in charge assisted by a complete corps of teachers, it is thought these schools may safely be recommended as affording opportunities for obtaining a liberal education in useful branches of study, and in the Latin, Greek and French languages. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

Believing that advantage would arise from increased facilities for the instruction of the small girls, arrangements have been completed for the opening with the fall term, of a primary department in the building on Seventh St., in which special attention will be given to those children whose studies are of an elementary character. The Primary Schools in Cherry St., and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,
JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

The immediate knowledge or revelation of the will and law of God in the heart of man, was, by the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xxxi. verse 33, 34, called a Law and a Covenant. "After those days saith the Lord I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God and they shall be my people—for they shall all know me," &c. And the apostle, Rom. ii. 15, speaking of the Gentiles, who he says, "show the work of the law written in their hearts, their consciences also bearing witness," &c. And again, chap. vii. verse 22, "for I delight in the Law of God after the inward man." Further, Rom. viii. 2, "For the Law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

Is not the law which Jeremiah spoke of, the same law that delivered Paul from the law of sin and death and set him free? Again is not the law prophesied of by Jeremiah and corroborated by the apostle's testimony, as witnessed by himself, the same inward law of God and work of his Holy Spirit in the heart of man, called the baptism of the Holy Ghost, that which alone can operate to the effecting of the new birth in man, without which the Saviour declared that no man can see the Kingdom of Heaven?

And is not this the one Spirit which the apostle said the true believers should be baptized by, into one body, and should be made to drink of the one Spirit? And is not this the same one Spirit which the Saviour promised his Church and people, that He should guide them into all truth, and that He should teach them all things? Is not this the same Spirit which the Saviour spoke of when He said, "If ye then being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give of the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him." And is not this the one Spirit which the Saviour spoke of when He said, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink," speaking not only of man's partaking, but also of his preparation thereby to impart; when he subjoined, "for he that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." And this, says the Evangelist, "spake He of the Spirit which they that believe on Him should receive." A blessed faith this! And is not this the same thing which the apostle spoke of when he said, "The Grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and the world's lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." Or that which he referred to when he said, "God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." And did not the Evangelist John mean the same thing when he said of Christ, "In Him was life and the life was the light of men." And again, "That was the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." And He was by another apostle called, "The Lord from Heaven, a quickening spirit." In this capacity it truly was that He followed the Israelites; and in the same capacity of a quickening spirit it was that He promised his Church that He would be with them to the end of the world. And is not the life of Christ spoken of by the apostle, Rom. v. 10, as saving, identical with his quickening spirit? And again, is it not the same which he saith hath shined in our hearts, giving unto us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face (or appearance) of Jesus Christ? And was it not the same which the Saviour breathed on his disciples and said, receive ye the Holy Ghost? And was it not the effectual working of the same spirit which the apostle alluded to in his Epistle to Titus, iii. 5, "Not by works of righteousness which we have done but according to his mercy He saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost?"

And now in conclusion I would ask, whether men's hearts can be changed from evil to good—can be purged from their sinful and corrupt nature, sanctified and regenerated, without the light or spirit of Christ and of God, manifested, working and operating inwardly in their hearts? If any man think so, his faith is at variance from the faith of all those apostolic writers, to whose authority I appeal for the correctness of my own, as well as for the faith of the Society of Friends, clearly defined by Barclay, Penn, and others.

Thy friend, JOHN WILBUR.

P. S. As a testimony to the continuance of Divine Revelation, I would relate the circumstance of ten infidels, in or near Westchester Co., N. Y., who practised elubbing together to strengthen one another in Atheism. To one of their meetings, Daniel Haviland, a minister of our Society, with whom I was well acquainted, was constrained to go, and to warn them to repent of their wickedness, assuring them "that there verily is a God who judgeth in the earth." And by his mission was led to tell them that if they did not repent they would be made such an example of God's displeasure, as that scarce an individual of them should be permitted to die a natural death. But this message was not proved to be true, by any miracle wrought at the time, but by its subsequent fulfilment upon every one of them to the letter. See Cunningham on Revelation.

Again, David Sands, a minister whom I well knew, during his travels in Ireland, on a certain day felt a stop in his mind, and a strong impulse to hold a meeting that evening in a barn, near the place where he was, and it proved providential, for a certain man had selected that night for the execution of a premeditated purpose to take his own life; and soon after the meeting convened, he was for that end passing near the said barn, and I seeing a light was led to step in, and very soon after, David Sands rose and declared that his mind was remarkably impressed with a belief that there was an individual present who was under a temptation to take his own life, and had now left his home for the purpose; and expressed the conviction, that he thou had the instruments of death about him, but told him, if he would resist the temptation now, that Satan would never be suffered to tempt him any more.

After the meeting closed, a person came to David Sands and acknowledged the truth of his testimony, and that he was the man; and then on his way for the execution of his fatal design. And the account states that he was never so tempted afterwards, and was inexpressibly thankful for the interposition of a Divine Providence for his escape. See David Sands' Journal of travels in England and Ireland.

John Fletcher, a minister of the Church of England, entered the pulpit at his own place of worship at Madely, intending to preach a sermon which he had prepared. But his mind became confused—he could neither recollect his text nor any part of his discourses. In his distress and perplexity, he knew not what to do, and thought he should be obliged to leave the place, without addressing the congregation at all. Becoming somewhat composed, his mind was turned to the account in the 34 chapter of Daniel, of the three worthies who were cast into the fiery furnace. On this subject he commenced speaking, and received singular enlargement of heart and extraordinary assistance from his Divine Master. Believing there must be some peculiar cause for his being thus led and aided; he desired, if any of his congregation met with any thing particular, they would acquaint him with it.

During the ensuing week he received the following information: A female of the name of K—, the wife of a butcher in the neighborhood, was under deep and serious convictions. Her husband was exceedingly enraged at her becoming religious, and uttered many vindictive threats what he would do to her if she did not cease going to hear John Fletcher, or to any meeting for worship whatever. On her telling him she could not in conscience refrain from going, he swore dreadfully, that if she went any more, he would cut her throat as soon as she came home. This drove her to look to her Heavenly Father for help, and to cry unto him that he would be with her in the trying hour. Being favored with some confidence in her Almighty helper, she concluded to continue faithful in the performance of her duty. The next meeting day, after many struggles against the suggestions of Satan, and with the fears of her own heart, she came down stairs prepared to go to the place of worship. Her husband enquired if she was going thither; and as her replying in the affirmative, said, "I shall not as I intended cut your throat, but I will heat the oven and throw you into it, the moment you return home." This threat he enforced with many a bitter oath; but she was not to be deterred by the fear of personal violence; she went on her way with her heart humbled in prayer, endeavoring to seek strength from the only sure fountain. It was the day already described; and as J. Fletcher was speaking of the Hebrews whom Nebuchadnezzar cast into the fiery furnace, she felt every word applied to her heart, and as if all belonged to her. Strengthened and animated she felt the love of God flowing into her soul, and a willingness wrought in her to lay down her life for his sake. She hastened home, nothing doubting, but that some way would be opened for her deliverance, as had been for the three children; or that if burned to death that her immortal spirit would be gathered in mercy into eternal rest. On opening the door of her dwelling she found her husband's wrath abated, and he under a fresh visitation of divine love which had awakened in him a concern for the salvation of his soul. John Fletcher concludes his account of this occurrence with these words: "I now know why my sermon was taken from me, namely, that God might thus magnify his mercy."

To Joseph Elkinton.

Dear Friend,—I have thought it a little strange that I have not (heard) from the Committee since your meeting in the 12th month; at the same time I do not feel disposed to censure any one on that account. I know I have neglected writing to the Committee in the proper time, and have been afraid my last did not get to the city in time for your last meeting. My excuse for it is, that I have felt so weak and discouraged that it seemed as if I could not write. The cause of these feelings is best known to Him who knoweth all things, and who I hope will forgive, if it has been caused by evil acts, or omissions of duty. The thought of leaving this place, even to visit my friends, without Divine permission, has felt to me to be a serious matter. I have lately passed through some close trials and exercises, after which I have been favored to experience a good degree of peace, quietness and composure of mind accompanied with love to my Divine Master; now under these feelings I have tried to weigh the subject, and think it right for me to inform thee, my dear friend, and others of the Committee, that I feel liberty to return home in the Fourth month and attend the Yearly Meeting. As to my returning to this place I must now leave it, with a desire that I may be rightly directed and obedient to what my Divine Master is pleased to require. * * * Thou hast probably been informed that there is a party among the Senecas that are trying to establish what they call a republican government, and do away the office of chiefs—that party has sent on a delegation to Washington. The chiefs have also sent (a delegation). On Sixth-day evening last, there were a number of white men who live up Cold-spring creek (supposed to be from seventeen to twenty) came to the council-house where the Indians had been holding their new years' meeting, or dance. They had all left except a few who staid to watch the house; they had been informed these white men were coming on to injure them or their property. I understood the most of the Indians were in the bushes near the house when they came; not finding the Indians, they commenced to break the windows and doors, and attempted to set fire to the house. When the Indians saw them destroying their property they went to them. It is said the whites were armed with clubs and abused the Indians. Thomas Jacob was so badly hurt that his recovery is thought to be doubtful. The chiefs have sent to Lodi for their attorney to advise and assist them in enforcing the law against these men. The schools have been rather better attended this winter than they were in the fall.

I remain in sincere love thy friend,
EBENEZER WORTH.

Tennessee, 9th mo. 13th, 1849.

Dear Friend Joseph Elkinton,—I have once more, in unmerited mercy, been favored to reach Tennessee in good health, after passing through some trials. Before we got to Auburn, N. Y., I felt unwell. Passing along, I saw in large letters upon a wall, "Beware of Pickpockets." The man who sat on the seat with me, said he thought there had been two attempts made to take his pocket-book in Albany, while he was waiting an opportunity to buy his tickets. I felt for mine, and to my surprise found it was gone. I had a little money of my own in my purse. When I got to Rochester my pain was such that I did not know whether I would be able to go any further. I thought I had strong symptoms of dysentery. Perhaps thou can form as correct an idea of my feelings by supposing thyself similarly circumstanced as by any description I can give thee; sick,—far from home, amongst strangers, and having but a dollar and a half in money. The agent told me when I got out of the car, they would stop two or three minutes; when I came to get in again, he said they had heard from the west that an accident had happened on the railroad, and that they would probably be detained there some time. I got a cup of warm coffee, and took some medicine I had with me, and put on my overcoat in order to keep myself warm. After seating myself, was brought to think seriously of my situation. The pain gradually abated, and before I got to Buffalo I got pretty well. The accident alluded to thou hast no doubt heard of; a collision of the eastern and western trains. After the pain had pretty much left me, and I looked back on the gloomy prospects which but a few hours before had been presented to me in relation to my health and circumstances, also the sufferings of these passengers in those cars alluded to, I felt more thankful and more comfortable in thinking how much I was favored, than if nothing had happened. Samuel Cary was very kind and let me have a little money.

"For The Friend"

"Thy Kingdom Come."

The practical fulfilment of the petition "Thy Kingdom come," so oft perhaps taken into the lips, can alone consist in giving our hearts wholly to the Saviour, or in letting him come into them to rule and to reign, and to set up his kingdom there; whose undoubted right it is, having bought us with the price of his own cruel sufferings, and ignominious death upon the cross. The adoption of such an appeal bears upon its face the Christian, living desire for the overthrow of all our Master's enemies, and for the establishment of that kingdom within us which is not only an everlasting kingdom, but is represented to consist even here in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. The prophet's declaration, "The Lord is our king," seems also of like import with that of the apostle, "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own?" &c.

No doubt one of the great stumbling blocks to a practical belief in, and a full reception of this kingdom of the dear Son and sent of God, which is to be set up within man, lies in our unanointed eyes and unhumiliated, unhalloved hearts overlooking the simplicity and littleness of it; which is declared, by its Divine Original himself, to be like "the least of all seeds;" "like leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal," &c. A kingdom that "cometh not with observation" or with outward show; "Neither," as the same authority adds, "shall they say, Lo here! or lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you." Oh! the danger there is of overlooking the second manifestation of Emmanuel in his spiritual appearance, as the Jews overlooked and rejected Him in his outward coming, even unto betrayal and crucifixion.

The true Christian recognizes Christ as his Master and Lord, to whom allegiance is proved by, and is in proportion to, his obedience. Thus it is written, "One is your master, even Christ;" and, "His servants ye are whom ye obey;" and again, "He became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." Such entire, willing, whole-hearted obedience—the fruit of unfeigned repentance, and a faith which works by love to the purifying of the heart—little by little purges from the old leaven, casts down imaginations with every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, works out all hostile, rebellious thoughts, and so gradually transforms by the renewing of the mind, and brings into childlike dependence and conformity to his will, which is our sanctification.

This reception of the Saviour as our Emmanuel, in his second coming or spiritual appearance in the temple of the heart, constitutes the preciousness and excellency of the new covenant dispensation of light and life, wherein all are to be taught of God. A covenant having the promise of the Anointing for our leader, and the Lamb to be our light. A covenant in which all shall know the Lord, through a manifestation of his Spirit being given to every man to profit withal. A covenant established upon better promises; that speaketh better things than that of Abel; and which has Jesus for its mediator.

Notwithstanding the intercession, "Thy kingdom come," has been enunciated nearly eighteen hundred years, so slow has mankind been in recognizing or acknowledging it in the way of its coming—in the authority and power of the Comforter or the Holy Ghost—that too few practically demonstrate by their lives and conversation, and "closer walk with God," that they are true subjects of a living, all-seeing, ever-blessed Father in heaven, being baptized with his baptism, and resolved in humility and contrition of soul, come what may, to follow him whithersoever he may be pleased to lead. But it is in this strong-hold of obedience to Christ our Lawgiver, that our attention should be primarily directed. It is the truth as it is in Jesus that we must individually come. It is a heart subjected to the will of God, and taught by the motions of his Spirit of life and power within us that we must experience, if we ever become living branches in a Living Vine unto a union with him in time and in eternity.

It is an exceeding mercy, that where the heart is sincerely given up to serve the Lord of life and glory, so far from being "an austere man," or "a God afar off," He proves himself on the contrary, to be a loving, tender, and faithful High Priest, compassionately touched with the feeling of our infirmities; who, having ascended on high, "received gifts for men," yea, "that the Lord God might well among them." Moreover, that they might "be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man; that Christ might dwell in their hearts by faith; that they being rooted and grounded in love, might be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge;" and even that they "might be filled with all the fullness of God."

Oh! may none of us lightly esteem our high calling, or turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven. May none forsake their own mercies by forgetting the covenant, perhaps in earlier days entered into, with the Lord of Sabbath, so as to make any graven image or likeness which he hath forbidden, or any league with the old inhabitants of the land. May we in no wise neglect or refuse to seek an interest in that kingdom which is promised to all who reverently ask that it may come; being engaged at the same time to submit their hearts to the transforming power and cross of Jesus, which can alone lead safely into it. "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God," saith the apostle, "whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption." It is only by taking heed to the visitations and convictions of this Spirit, or to the reproofs of instruction which are the way of life, that any can grow up in good liking before Him, or bring forth fruit in his praise. The sun may shine, the ground be often watered, servants and hand-maidens may industriously labor, yet if the vineyard of the heart be not, in the first place, yielded to the Heavenly Dresser so as to become like the prepared ground in the parable, the good seed of the kingdom may in vain be looked to for increase.

On the contrary, as this little seed of the kingdom is permitted to grow up unto dominion within us, as the door of the heart is opened to Him that knocketh thereat, we shall be enabled to increase in the increase that is of God, and strengthened availingly to plead "Thy kingdom come;" and thus knowing Jesus to sup with us, and we to hold sweet communion with Him, we shall more and more become engrafted into Him, the Living Vine, and hereby prepared for that eternal, incorruptible inheritance of peace and joy where the Lamb shall lead unto living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from the eyes.

"For The Friend."

William Cullen Bryant.

From an interesting series, entitled "American Authors," by Prof. David J. Hill, of Lewisburg University, we propose extracting some account of Wm. Cullen Bryant, hoping it may prove interesting to the readers of "The Friend," especially the younger portion.

"For nearly a century," says the author of his life, "he saw 'the flood of years' poured from the exhaustless urn of time by the mighty Hand, and watched the eddying movements of men and nations as they swept on in their courses, or sank forever beneath the tide."

"William Cullen Bryant was born on the 3d of November, 1794, at Cummington, Mass. He sprang from that vigorous and God-fearing Anglo-American race that has subdued the rugged soil of New England, and furnished the leaders of our intellectual life in larger proportion than any other. The first Bryant is said to have crossed the ocean in 'The Mayflower'; but the tradition is not authenticated by documentary proof. One Stephen Bryant is known to have settled at Plymouth, Mass., before 1640, where he married, and was afterward a town-officer. This was probably the 'Mayflower' colonist, and the first American ancestor of the poet.

"The great-grandson of Stephen Bryant, inherited from his father the name of Peter and the profession of medicine. Having established himself in practice, in 1792 he married Sarah Snell, a descendant of John Alden, the secretary of Miles Standish; and removed to Cummington, where her father resided, under whose roof their seven children were born, William Cullen being the second."

The poet alludes to his mother in his poem, "A Lifetime," written when the scenes of childhood were recollections of a remote past. He pictures himself standing by the knee of his mother, and

Reading of ancient peoples
And realms beyond the sea;
Of the cruel king of Egypt
Who made God's people slaves,
And perished with all his army,
Drowned in the Red-sea waves;
Of Deborah, who mustered
Her brethren long oppressed,
And routed the heathen army,
And gave her people rest;
And the sadder, gentler story,—
How Christ, the crucified,
With a prayer for those who slew him,
Forgave them as he died."

"The career of young Bryant seemed to have been fixed for him in the selection of his name. His father loved his profession and his boy, and thought to honor both by devoting his son to medicine. Four years before the poet's birth, a great medical authority at Edinburgh had died. Dr. Bryant had read and admired his able lectures on the healing art, and had learned to venerate the amiable qualities of his personal character, he therefore called his son after the Edinburgh professor, William Cullen.

"There was little promise of a long life in the frail child, but even reason to fear that it was needless to select a profession for him. His body was small, and seemed to lack vitality; while his head, and especially the cerebral regions, showed an abnormally rapid development. The parents became alarmed; but the good doctor adopted a course of treatment, which, at least, has the merit of having proved effectual. Not far from the house was a deep spring of cold water, and into this the protesting infant was immersed at an early hour every morning by Dr. Bryant's students. The philosophy of this hydropathic treatment probably is, that all the vitality of the child was aroused in his struggles to prevent the process!

"The Bryant homestead, owned at the day of his death by the poet, is situated in the grand hill-country of Western Massachusetts. The summits of the hills are still covered with dark, waving forests, and gray rocks gleam out here and there from their shadowed sides. Along the slopes well-tilled farm-lands stretch away to the rushing streams that have cut down deep into the narrow valleys between the hills.

"Thou wilt find nothing here

Of all that pained thee in the haunts of men,
And made thee leathe thy life."

"From these hills and woods and streams the poet drank in that deep, pure love of Nature that breathes through his noblest lines. Here springs beneath the brown trailing skirts of Autumn 'The Fringed Gentian,'—

Blossom bright with autumn dew,
And colored with the heaven's own blue,
That opened when the quiet light
Succeeds the keen and frosty night."

Here too,

When beechen buds begin to swell,
And woods the bluebird's warble know,
The yellow violet's modest bell
Peeps from the last year's leaves below."

Here, not many rods from the homestead, flows 'The Rivulet,' whose warbling waters often drew his 'little feet, when life was new,'—

'This little rill, that from the springs
Of yonder grove its current brings,
Plays on the slope a while, and then Goes prattling into groves again.'

Beyond a meadow to the south of the old house is the 'Entrance to a Wood,' over which the poet's eye read the inscription,—

'Stranger, if thou hast learned a truth which needs
No school of long experience,—that the world
Is full of guilt and misery,—and hast seen
Enough of all its sorrows, crimes, and cares
To tire thee of it, enter this wild wood,
And view the haunts of Nature.'

"To these healing scenes of childhood the poet throughout his life made frequent pilgrimages. Wearied with the strifes of men, and worn with the distractions of a toilsome profession, a return to these haunts of innocence was like turning back the hand on the dial-plate of life. Nature, like a fond mother, ever seemed to wait his coming, and to give him new heart for the struggles of the world. His joy is almost rapturous as he sings,—

'I stand upon my native hills again,

Broad, round, and green, that in the summer sky,
With garniture of waving grass and grain,

Orebanks and beechen forests, basking lit;
While deep the sunless fens are scooped between,
Where brawl o'er shallow beds the streams unseen.'

"There seem to have been domestic reasons for the child's love of outdoor life and the consolations of Nature's freedom. His mother's father, Ebenezer Snell, retained many of the sterner Puritan qualities, and was a rigid disciplinarian. He inherited a magisterial severity from his good ancestors who burned witches, and whipped culprits, and carried his notions of government into the household, and was a terror to the entire family. Bryant has given an interesting picture of the position of children generally in the days of his childhood, and has drawn his illustrations from his own home. It will be best appreciated in his own language:—

"The boys of the generation to which I belonged—that is to say, who were born in the last years of the last century or the earliest of this—were brought up under a system of discipline which put a far greater distance between parents and their children than now exists. The parents seemed to think this necessary in order to secure obedience. They were believers in the old maxim, that familiarity breeds contempt. My own parents lived in the house with my grandfather and grandmother on the mother's side. My grandfather was a disciplinarian of the stricter sort; and I can hardly find words to express the awe in which I stood of him,—an awe so great as almost to prevent any thing like affection on my part, although he was in the main kind, and certainly never thought of being severe beyond what was necessary to maintain a proper degree of order in the family.

"The other boys in that part of the country, my school-mates and playfellows, were educated on the same system. Yet there were at that time some indications that this very severe discipline was beginning to relax. With my father and mother I was on much easier terms than with my grandfather. If a favor was to be asked of my grandfather, it was asked with fear and trembling; the request was postponed to the last moment, and then made with hesitation and blushes and a confused utterance.

"One of the means of keeping the boys of that generation in order was a little bundle of birchen rods, bound together by a small cord, and generally suspended on a nail against the wall in the kitchen. This was esteemed as much a part of the necessary furniture as the crane that hung in the kitchen fireplace, or the shovel and tongs. It sometimes happened that the boy suffered a fable similar to that of the eagle in the fable, wounded by an arrow fledge with a feather from his own wing; in other words, the boy was made to gather the twigs intended for his own castigation."

A Serpent among the Books.—One day a gentleman in India went into his library and took down a book from the shelves. As he did so, he felt a slight pain in his finger, like the prick of a pin. He thought that a pin had been stuck by some careless person in the cover of the book. But soon his finger began to swell, then his arm, then his whole body, and in a few days he died. It was not a pin among the books, but a small and deadly serpent. There are many serpents among the books now-a-days; they nestle in the foliage of some of our most fascinating literature; they coil around the flowers whose perfume intoxicates the senses. People read, and are charmed by the plot of the story, by the skill with which the characters are sculptured or grouped, by the gorgeousness of the word-painting, and hardly feel the pin prick of the evil that is insinuated. But it stings and poisons. When the record of ruined souls is made up, on what multitudes will be inscribed, "Poisoned by serpents among the books!"

MY BIRD.*

BY EMILY C. JUDSON.

Ere last year's moon had left the sky,
A birdling sought my Indian nest,
And folded, O, so lovingly!
Her tiny wings upon my breast.

From morn till evening's purple tinge
In winsome helplessness she lies;
Two rose leaves, with a silken fringe,
Shut softly on her starry eyes.

There's not in Ind a lovelier bird;
Broad earw oats not a happier nest;
O God, thou hast a fountain stirred,
Whose waters never more shall rest!

This beautiful, mysterious thing,
This seeming visitant from heaven,
This bird with the immortal wing,
To me—to me, thy hand has given.

The pulse first caught its tiny stroke,
The blood its crimson awe, from mine;
This life, which I have dared invoke,
Henceforth is parallel with thine.

A silent awe is in my room;
I tremble with delicious fear;
The future, with its light and gloom,
Time and eternity are here.

Doubts—hopes in eager tumult rise:
Hear, O my God! one earnest prayer:
Room for my bird in Paradise,
And give her angel-plumage there!

"SPIRITUAL RAILWAY."

LINES WRITTEN BY AN INDIAN CHIEF.

The line to heaven by Christ was made,
On heavenly ties the rails are laid;
From earth to heaven the line extends,
To life eternal where it ends.

Repentance is the station then,
Where passengers are taken in,
No fee for them is there to pay,
For Jesus is himself the way.

The Bible then is engineer; }
It points the way to heaven so clear;
Through tunnels dark and dreary here,
It does the way to glory steer.

God's Love the fire, His Truth the steam,
Which drives the engine and the train;
All you who would to glory ride,
Must come to Christ, in Him abide.

In first, and second, and third class,
Repentance, faith and holiness,
You must the way to glory gain,
Or you with Christ can never reign.

Come then poor sinners, now's the time,
At any place along the line;
If you repent and turn from sin,
The train will stop and take you in.

* Written from Maulmain, India, on the birth of a daughter.

{† It would have been a better simile to have compared the Bible to a sign-post whose finger points heavenward. That which "steers" the way to glory is the Spirit of Christ, whose place and office no subordinate agency can supply.

The poem was sent to us by a western correspondent who met with it while visiting in the Indian Territory.—Ed.]

"WHAT! YOU ARE STEPPING WESTWARD?"

A salutation addressed to the poet Wordsworth and his sister, while on their "Tour through Scotland."

"What! you are stepping westward?" Yes,
'Twould be a wildish destiny
If we, who thus together roam
In a strange land, and far from home,
Were in this place the guests of chance;
Yet who would stop, or fear to advance,
Though home or shelter he had none,
With such a sky to lead him on?

The dewy ground was dark and cold,
Behind all gloomy to behold,
And stepping westward seem'd to be
A kind of heavenly destiny;
I liked the greeting, 'twas a sound
Of something without paces or bound,
And seem'd to give me spiritual right
To travel through that region bright.

The voice was soft; and she who spake
Was walking by her native Lake;
The salutation was to me
Its very sound of courtesy;
The power was felt, and while my eye
Was fixed upon the glowing sky,
The echo of the voice enwrapped
A human sweetness with the thought
Of travelling through the world that lay
Before me in my endless way.

Wordsworth.

An example is set by the plainness and simplicity of the funeral of Judge Packer that ought to be generally followed. There has been a growing tendency to pomp and circumstance in the observance of funeral rites that is productive of no good. Had it not been for the expressed wish of the family, who knew so well what would best have pleased the unostentatious and simple-minded man whom they all loved, the house would probably have been filled with flowers. There would have been every conceivable combination that the ingenuity of the florist could have suggested, until the solemn occasion would have seemed more like a flower show than a funeral.

The Logic of a Holy Life.—Some years ago a young man, who gave clear evidence that he was truly a subject of the regenerating grace of God, was asked what had led to the change in him, as he had been wild and thoughtless. Was it any sermon or book that had impressed him? He proudly answered, "No!" "What was it, then? Did any one speak to you specially on the subject of religion?" The same response was given.

"Will you, then, state what first led you to think of your soul's eternal welfare?" The reply was:

"I live in the same boarding-house and eat at the same table with J. Y."

"Well, did he ever talk to you about your soul?"

"No, never till I sought an interview with him," was the reply. "But," he continued, "there was a sweetness in his disposition, a heavenly-mindedness, a holy aroma about his whole life and demeanor, that made one feel that he had a source of comfort and peace and happiness to which I was a stranger. There was a daily beauty in his life that made me ugly. I became more and more dissatisfied with myself every time I saw him; and though, as I said, he never spoke to me on the subject of personal religion till I myself sought the interview, yet his whole life was a constant sermon to me."

For "The Friend."

"My money is my own, and I expect to spend it as I please,"—this is not the feeling or the language of the true, humble follower of the Lord Jesus—of the man who having been redeemed from self and self's bondage, realizes in the light of the blessed gospel that he is no longer his own, but is bought with a price; but it is the feeling and language of delusion, and alarms the godly when they hear it uttered by men responsible for their stewardship. It has its origin in that spirit of selfishness which would appropriate to itself God's every gift, raising self to an eminence that forgets or disdains to recognize the promptings of the great and good Giver in the use of what He has bestowed; and so subtle is the spirit of delusion, that even allowing myself to proceed from the desire to gratify self, and yet pass for righteousness. Where self reigns along with vague desires to do good with a superfluity of means, attempts will often be made to satisfy divine justice with giving; to return to God a "quid pro quo" for gifts received, forgetting Peter's rebuke in Acts viii. 20, to such as think the gift of God can be purchased with money.

In the spending of money either on ourselves or on others, the motive only will be regarded by the great Judge; and the motive will partake of the condition of the heart.—See Luke xxi. 3. With the pure in heart self is restrained when spending on self, and forgotten when spending on others.—See Matt. xxv. 38, 39.

When money becomes the chief object of a man's thoughts, it becomes also the root of much evil to him: his judgment regarding its true value and uses is apt to grow sadly perverted; and whichever way his mind trends, whether towards saving or spending, self soon assumes the first place in his consideration—the virtue of economy degenerates into penuriousness, and of giving into much un-wisdom; one time determined to be rich, and at another thinking to purchase favor with God who has been neglected, the poor deceived traveller is hastened forward with an ever accelerating speed towards an eternity that has for him no comfortable assurance whatever.

Happy is that steward entrusted with more than enough, who can so far realize the keeping power of the most High as to escape those snares which so peculiarly beset the pathway of the rich—being equally redeemed from that spirit which would yet drive on adding house to house, and that which thinks to purchase pardon, favor and final salvation with money. "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved," than "the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth," and "by their spirits ye shall know" who are in Him and who are not, but think "to climb up some other way."

Telling the Truth.—When John Wilson was a boy, he was remarkable for his strict adherence to the truth. At school his teacher described him as one who never told a lie. The following incident is related by a friend of his boyhood.—Dr. Fairbairn:

"I remember in one of the intervals of our school-day, a band of us started up the burn for fishing and other diversions. Seduced by the summer sunlight (oh, how bright it was on those days!) we heeded not the lapse of time till the school-hour had passed. Then came a conference to determine what we should say for ourselves, and various proposals, savoring, I fear, of diplomacy, were made. But the discussion was cut short by John Wilson saying, in a tone unusually energetic for him, 'I tell you what—we will tell the truth' and the truth he told—aye, and continued to tell it till his dying day."—Life of John Wilson.

The Appetite for Strong Drink.—A gentleman had got so far in drinking that he was known to drink a quart of brandy a day. He was a fine business man, and yet he was ruining himself in the estimation of those who knew him well. One day, when in the house, he said, "Wife, come and sit on my knee." She sat there, and then she said, "If my husband didn't drink, I would be the happiest woman in Canada." "Well, my dear," he replied, "I married you to make you happy, and I ought to, and if that will make you happy, I will never drink another drop as long as I live." Now, that man cut it off square, and kept his word for eight years, without any belief in Christianity. Walking down the street with him, a little while ago, he said, "Do you see that red-fronted drinking saloon? Well, I have been afraid of that for many years, and so I used to go down a street and go around it, but since I have got the grace of God in my heart, I go right by that saloon, and if I have the slightest desire I breathe an ejaculatory prayer, 'Lord, keep me for Christ's sake,' and I go by it safe."

When a man abstains from drink, and has an appetite which he controls in his own strength, he does it at daily risk, but when he puts forth all the energy God has given him, and trusts God for the result, he is safe.

The appetite for intoxicating drinks—what is it? What is that appetite? As near as I can define it, it is a mysterious something produced in certain systems by the use of intoxicating liquors, that will respond to the first drop of alcohol when it touches it. You can not make a moderate drinker out of a drunkard. I don't care how many times he may join the Church. It has been tried over and over again. Total abstinence is necessary to save a man from drunkenness.

A gentleman said to me in New York, "I was a sad drunkard: I became a Christian. Well, I believed and boasted that the love of Jesus had taken away all appetite for the drink. Three weeks ago there was the Communion Service in Dr. Tyng's. I smelt the drink and wanted it. My fingers began to tingle. There was an itching, burning, dry sensation in my throat. I wanted it. I tried to pray. I tried to think that I had come there to show forth the 'Lord's death till He come.' It was no use. I gripped the seat. I ground my teeth. I sat in perfect agony. The wine approached me. I shuddered from head to foot. If I had taken it in my hand there would not have been a drop of it left. I know it, and I have been fighting that appetite for three weeks with all the power I had to fight anything."—John B. Gough.

What an Influence.—There are at least three millions of mothers in the United States. These mothers, aside from older children, have, it is supposed, between two and three hundred thousand infants in their charge. No influence, at present, can reach these infant minds but that of a mother. These minds may be moulded at the will or discretion of these mothers. If the army of mothers should combine to accomplish any given object, what may they not do? If every mother should imitate the example of Hannah of old, and consecrate her infant to the service of the Lord, what could withstand such a moral influence? And yet from these infants are to come our rulers, our judges, our ministers, and all the influence, either for good or evil, which is to sway the destinies of the nation.—Selected.

The Present Crisis in England.—C. H. Spurgeon, after speaking of the needless foreign wars, the commercial distress and the unusual and hurtful amount of rain under which England has been suffering, thus refers to the public prayers for the Divine blessing which were desired to be offered. "I desire to speak about prayers in the way of warning, lest men should place an unwise confidence in the formality of reading a form of prayer in the churches, or uttering extempore formalities in meeting-houses. Few men believe more thoroughly in the power of real prayer than I do, and I have tested and proved it in many remarkable ways so fully that I can have no doubts as to its efficacy, but heartily magnify the name of our prayer-hearing God. But still we must use our understandings, lest we be deceived, and come to expect what we shall not receive.

"I would call to your recollection the fact that, under certain circumstances, God does not answer prayer. Our text says, 'I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence'; and, if this be the case, there will be no answering of prayer till repentance is manifested. Sometimes the heavens are brass, even to good men, and their cries reverberate and come back into their own ears, not without a blessing to themselves, but still without any visible reply as to the people for whom their intercessions were offered.

"David, doubtless, prayed earnestly that he might escape from the chastisement of his sin when he numbered the people, but it could not be removed. He had the choice of three evils, but one of the three was inevitable. When God has come to this pass with a people, that He must and will smite them, prayer is their only resource, and even that may fail to avert the threatened stroke. A child may have so transgressed that his father may feel bound to punish him, and then he will not spare the rod because of his crying. I pray God that the rain may cease, but if it should be continued it will not be because the Lord cannot help us, or has ceased to answer prayer. Here is the secret of it all, and with trembling do I quote the words: 'Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear; but your iniquities have separated between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear. For your hands are defiled with blood.' (Is. lix. 1, 3.)

"Remember, too, that not only may God withdraw Himself in anger, but it may be his determination to punish a people out of a far-seeing design for their good. Perhaps, as a nation, we have had too much prosperity. Ease and plenty have begotten pride and luxury, and these may have weakened the spirit of the nation. It may have become absolutely necessary for this favored nation, if it is to be still the stronghold of liberty and the fortress of gospel truth, that it should again endure those northern blasts of adversity which have aforetime strengthened it at heart. It will not be the first time that our land has suffered for her good."

A crowded meeting of Roman Catholics has been held in Paris (the Duke of Rochefoucauld presiding) to protest against the substitution of lay for ecclesiastical teachers in the municipal elementary schools of Paris.

An interesting account comes from India of the conviction of a Brahman from the fourth or highest order. Gungahir is a native of Bhillwara, in the North-west Province. He married at an early age a woman to whom he was passionately attached. His wife died and left him inconsolable. He abandoned the world and became a wandering devotee or fakir, and resolved to reach the highest position in this order. The process of acquiring the title of fakir, is a very singular one:—1. For the first four months he abstained from salt. 2. For five months, in the native city of Poona, he endured the trial of swing in the smoke. 3. For the next six months he was concealed in a cave dug in the earth. He did not see the light of day, but sat in meditation, only emerging from his retreat at midnight to receive the food left for him. 4. The next six months he passed in communion with the river god (Gunga). From 12 o'clock to 4 o'clock each night he stood in the Ganges, waist deep in water, to wash away his sins, and to retaliate the wakefulness of Brahm. 5. He next practised sitting in the presence of the dead every night for a year on the banks of the Ganges. The next rites—such as painting the body with ashes of the dead, remaining silent, &c.—were duly observed, and thereupon Gungahir received the coveted title of Swami. Thereafter he was worshipped as a deity. In the course of his wanderings he became possessed of a copy of the New Testament. He read and studied it diligently for eight months, and emerging from the jungle he sought out J. M. Douglas, a missionary. He told him that he was convinced of the truth of Christ's claims and the efficacy of prayer.

"Forgive us our Trespasses."—The story is told of a certain nobleman of Alexandria, who complained bitterly to the bishop of that city of his enemies. While in the midst of his tale the bell sounded for prayers and bi-hop and nobleman dropped to their knees, the former leading in the Lord's prayer and the latter leaving for the time his story untold. When the bishop came to the petition, "Forgive us our trespasses," he stopped suddenly, leaving the other to go on alone. The nobleman attempted to continue, but, startled by the sound of his own unaccompanied voice, and recalled by his companion's silence to the significance of the petition, stammered, ceased praying, and rose from his knees, a hopeless man—until he afterward found hope in a better disposition toward his neighbor. It is an easy thing to say "Forgive us our trespasses" by rote; it is difficult, sometimes, to say it understandingly. If we stop at this petition, when we are repeating the Lord's prayer, until we have taken in the idea of it, how many of us will go on!—Christian Union.

Freezing Fish.—To equalize the supply of fine fish, several varieties of which are apt to be over abundant in summer and scarce in winter, the fish-dealers of New York have created three large refrigerating houses where in many tons of frozen fish are stored. When there is a greater supply of fish in the market than is likely to be sold during the day the wholesale fish-dealers select the best and remove them before daylight from the vessels to the freezing-houses, where each fish is cleaned and prepared for the refrigerator. The walls of the rooms are coated with zinc, a second or inner wall of the same metal separating each apartment. The spaces between the subdivisions are filled with ground ice and rock-salt, a mill being used for grinding the mixture together. In the hot weather it requires over 3000 pounds of ice and 14 bushels of salt daily to keep the freezing houses in proper order. The selected fish having been cleaned, are placed in freezing pans covered with ground ice and salt. When frozen stiff they are taken to the apartment of the special officer and there laid away in the cold till wanted.

The Corn-beetle in Russia.—The insect is of a deep-green color, and bears a pair of gossamer-like, delicate rose wings under its horny wing cases. It spends the autumn and winter in a larva state in the earth, acquiring wings towards the end of the Fifth month, when its career of destruction commences. First it attacks the steppe grasses, now just about to bloom, then the spring rye on whose sweet milky grains it feeds till they become hard and dry, and then attacks the young wheat in its turn. This year the beetles have appeared in such prodigious swarms, from the centre of the Government of Charkow to the borders of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof, that immense quantities of cereals, especially wheat, are either destroyed or threatened with destruction. Their career of destruction lasts about a month, but the mischief effected is so great, that the Russian Government has invested the Minister of the Interior with full powers to carry out the destruction of the insect by any means he may see fit to employ. With this view extraordinary meetings of agriculturists were called, large money premiums voted, prizes offered for the invention of catching or killing appliances, and last, an order was issued compelling every inhabitant of the infested districts whatever his rank or calling, to pay to the authorities a tribute of beetles in kind, under pain of heavy penalties. A pamphlet was issued gratuitously on the nature and habits of the insects; and records are kept of the numbers of them destroyed. Altogether many millions of roubles have been expended in South Russia in the attempted extirpation of the pest.

African Live Stock.—For some time past 250 or 300 truck loads of sheep and oxen have been sent up every week from Marseilles to Paris. The great majority of these come from Africa.

The Colorado Potato Beetle has been officially announced as found among the potato crops in Europe, near Einolbstadt.

The Cuckoo-hafer Plague in Schleswig-Holstein.—The annual visitation of these destructive insects appears to have been on a large scale the present year. About the 20th of 5th month they appeared in countless numbers. All the school-children and many of the adults of the districts attacked, sallied out to wage war against the invaders. Their operations were in most cases conducted by shaking down the insects from the trees on which they had settled, into sheets outstretched below, and then destroying them. A small reward of one-half penny per pound was offered in most districts for the "catch," and some of the children made considerable sums in this manner. For instance, on one farm near Lutzenberg, no less than 130 tons of the insects were collected, all of which were paid for at the above-mentioned rate. The visitation is not regarded as an altogether unmixt evil, for the bodies of the slain enemy, form a rich manure, and when dried upon malt kilns are said to supply a most excellent food for poultry.

Sparrow Hawks.—For a number of months a pair of sparrow-hawks have adopted as their hunting ground, the populous Corinthian capitals of the east front of the general post office building in Washington, decidedly the busiest and noisiest spot in the city. These birds, ordinarily considered our wildest, as they are undoubtedly one of our most beautiful and graceful species, have so evidently learned that the uproar below has no dangers for them, and that the human forms around and beneath them are after other prey. In truth, very few persons seem to notice them. They will swoop after the skurrying sparrows within a few feet of a constant stream of foot-passengers and rattling vehicles, and between the stories of well-filled rooms of the department building and the private offices opposite. Very often the smaller birds take shelter in the crevices of the marble foliage which crowns the columns, and the hawks follow them. It is curious to watch the chase as it winds from one refuge to another, now a-wing and now a-toot, wile encountering wile, the keen persistence of hunger and sport overcoming the hasty expedients of terror. And all the time the drama of a larger life goes on side by side with it, unnoting.—Atlantic Monthly.

Song of the Lark.—Above our heads, almost invisible, poises a lark, singing his "profuse strains of unpremeditated art." The tuneful spire is half a mile above us, yet every note and trill falls clear and sweetly on the ear. The little vocal chords within his throat, which constitute his lyre, are scarcely a third of an inch in length; yet their vibration fills the air with melody. On every side for half a mile his song is heard, and thus he fills a sphere of air a mile in diameter with music. Music, and indeed all sound, is the effect produced upon our ears by vibrations or tremors of a certain frequency. Hence every particle of air in the mile-wide sphere is pulsating in unison with the lark's small vocal chords. A cubic foot of air at this time of year weighs about four hundred grains, and the number of cubic feet which are taking up the song amount to tens of thousands of millions. If we weigh that air the result is even more astounding, for we find our full-throated warbler has set quivering nearly two millions of tons.—Sunday Magazine.

The Snowy Owl.—The snowy owl is a common winter visitor, near Chicago. It frequents the haunts of rabbits and various members of the grouse tribe. On the borders of Lake Ontario, in the great wooded marshes, these birds find thousands of rabbits roaming at night time in the frozen tracts. The manner in which these owls are captured is of no little interest. During the day they take to the open lots adjoining the marshes, but in the night ravage the woods. They are seldom known to leave the small area selected for their depredations, unless driven away. In the day area they have but three or four places on which they alight, and when they are disturbed are sure to fly to one or other of these places, often moving in a circuit for hours. A high stake being placed in the centre of the open lot, and a small steel trap placed thereon, they will speedily take to the take in preference to other resorts, and are consequently caught. No bait is placed on the trap, the bird being caught by making simple use of the peculiarity of their habits.

—W. H. Ballou.

Meteoric Dust has been found in the snows of Scandinavia and Finland, or those lying in the Arctic circle, hundreds of miles from any human habitation. Iron dust has been gathered in ice-holes in Greenland; and in matter raised from the bottom of deep oceans, magnetic particles have been detected which must have been deposited there recently, and must have come from the air, and originally from the depths of space.

Meteoric matter is constantly falling upon the earth, and it awakens a strong feeling of interest.—Humboldt says: "Accustomed to know non-luminous bodies solely by measurement, by calculation, and by the inferences of our reason, it is with a sense of wonder that we touch, weigh, and submit to chemical analysis metallic and earthy masses appearing to the world without."

Of the system of meteors which come within the range of the earth's orbit, there cannot be millions which do not cross her track or one that does. Yet from calculations based on the number of shooting-stars observed on a clear evening, it is estimated that the earth encounters as many as 400,000,000 in a single year.

The Death-Watch and the Book-Worm.—The curious little insect called the death-watch is a kind of beetle. Its larvae are extremely partial to old furniture, in which they perforate numerous round holes. In the larvae state, they resemble small, white, soft worms, with six short minute feet. The head is furnished with two strong cutting pincers, with which these little insects scrape the wood into the finest sawdust. Other species of the genus feed on flour, bread, wafers and other substances, in which they form grooves or galleries. The sound called the death-tick made by the insect striking its mandibles upon the wood. The number of distinct strokes is generally from seven to eleven, and of the insect be in a situation where it can be watched, it will be observed to nod its head as it makes each stroke, the whole being done with great force and quickness. The sound greatly resembles a moderate tapping on a table with the finger-nails; and, indeed, in old houses, where these insects are numerous, they may be induced to make their noises at any time, by tapping on a table, the wood of which contains them.

The little insect called the book-worm, belongs to the same genus as the death-watch, and in some cases it will bore through books with as much ease as the death-watch bores through furniture. Kirby and Spence mention an instance, where, in a public library but little frequented, twenty-seven folio volumes were perforated in a straight line by the same insect, in such a manner that, on passing a cord through the round hole made by it, these twenty-seven volumes could be raised at once.—Leisure Hour.

An Underground Lake.—The Tlemcen Courier (Algeria) describes a wonderful discovery recently made at the picturesque cascades of that place. Some miners had blasted an enormous rock near the cascades, and, on removal of the debris, found it had covered a large opening into a cave, the floor of which was covered with water. Constructing a rude raft, and providing themselves with candles, the workmen sailed along this underground river, which, at a distance of 60 metres was found to emerge into a large lake of limpid water. The roof of the cavern was very high and covered with stalactites, the brilliant colors of which sparkled under the light of the candles. Continuing their course, the workmen had at certain places to navigate their craft between the stalactites, which meeting stalagmites from the bed of the lake, formed enormous columns, which looked as if they had been made expressly to sustain the enormous arches. They thus reached the extremity of the lake, where they noticed a large channel extending toward the south, into which water quietly made its way. This is supposed to be a wide fissure which has baffled exploration hitherto at Sebdon, and which connects the cascades with that locality, and thus with the mysterious sources of the Taina. It is possible that here they have found an immense natural basin, supplied by powerful sources, and sending a part of its waters toward the lake, while the rest goes to Sebdon. The workmen estimated the distance underground traversed by them at three kilometres, and the breadth of the lake at two. They brought out with them a quantity of fish, which swarmed around the raft, and which were found to be blind.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 20, 1879.

Some of our readers will probably remember that several articles appeared in our columns some months ago relative to a separation that occurred in Norwich Monthly Meeting, Canada. The last of these contained a statement of the proceedings of a committee of the Yearly Meeting appointed to consider the subject; and was furnished by Thomas Clark, who was a member of that committee. This statement has been said by some Canada Friends to be inaccurate, and a communication was forwarded to us soon after, making the corrections that were thought needful. This communication reached Philadelphia during a prolonged absence of the Philadelphian it was addressed. After his return it seemed out of season, and was laid aside, through a desire to avoid all unnecessary controversy, and it was thought that possibly some further action might be taken at the next Canada Yearly Meeting on this subject. That meeting has now passed, and the Friends of Norwich, who were disowned in such a wholesale manner, still remain in their isolated position. As we are anxious that the records contained on our pages should be an accurate account of what we undertake to publish, we believe it right, though at this late date, to insert a few words from a letter received from one of the members of the Yearly Meeting's Committee.

The communication of Thomas Clark was so worded as to convey the impression that the Yearly Meeting's Committee were united in their approval of the report to the Yearly Meeting. The letter referred to says: "He [Thomas Clark] is certainly mistaken in saying that no objection was made to his being directed to sign [the report]. He cannot deny that seven or eight objected to it, and that one Friend was trying to make some remarks when the Committee arose."

The proceedings in Canada appear to us to be marked with a measure of the same partisan spirit which was manifested years ago in New England, and which would not brook the public bearing of a testimony for the truth which John Willbur and other Friends believed was called for at their hands. Like causes produce like effects, and history repeats itself.

In New England, an attempt was made to compel a Monthly Meeting to disown one of its members whom it believed to be innocent of any breach of discipline. When the Monthly Meeting declined to be coerced into taking such a step, the Quarterly Meeting endeavored to take away its rights and attach its members to another meeting. This was one of the prominent steps in causing a breach which has not yet been healed.

In Canada, Norwich Monthly Meeting declined to receive an application for membership from a person who was engaged in teaching music. In the discussions that accompanied the consideration of this subject, so heated a feeling was produced, that the members favoring the reception of the application organized a separate Monthly Meeting in a manner which all the accounts that have reached us show to have been clearly at variance with good order.

In both cases, we do not believe such things would have been done, if a heated and partisan spirit had not existed, which was determined to accomplish its object, even if that required a disregard of the rights of members and meetings, and a deadly blow at the harmony and good feeling which should prevail among those belonging to the same household of faith.

One cannot but mourn that there did not exist that coolness of temper, calmness of wisdom, self-restraint of spirit, and unity in doctrine, which would have enabled superior meetings to interpose effectually for the healing of these difficulties. We emphasize unity in doctrine, because, where there is any considerable variance from the doctrines of Christianity, as held by our Society from its beginning, we do not believe it possible for the harmony and efficiency of the church to be long maintained. Yet we are satisfied that even where a belief in the same doctrines exists in a meeting, there may arise disputes and dissensions which require the labor of the spiritually-minded to remove—even of those who are clothed with the meek, restoring love of the Gospel, and who bear in mind their own weakness, remembering the caution of the apostle, "Considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."

We greatly desire to see more and more developed in our beloved Society, a disposition to rally to first principles; a willingness in the individual members to live in a humble, self-denying obedience to the revelations of the light of Christ in their hearts; and an increasing degree of that love which flows from a fellowship "with the Father and with His Son, Jesus Christ." It was a precious testimony borne to our people in former days, that from whatever part of the world Friends came, they all spoke the same language in a spiritual sense.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—At a recent experiment with the electric light on the tower of the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga, an open parabolic reflector, but no lenses being used, the light was turned towards a spot in Ballston Lake seven and a half miles distant, where by previous arrangement, a number of persons were present to witness the experiment; so powerful was the light, and so accurate the focusing, that the designated spot was instantly illuminated, and fine print could be easily read. This is the longest distance at which illumination of equal degree has been accomplished.

The exports of wheat during the fiscal year ending 6th mo. 30th, 1879, were 122,353,936 bushels, valued at $130,701,079, and of flour 5,629,715 barrels, valued at $2,507,713. The total value of cotton exported in the same time was $1,225,829. The exports of provisions, exclusive of fish and tallow, were $119,967,783, and of other breadstuffs than wheat and flour $48,346,265.

Nine regular Trans-Atlantic steamers sailed on the 15th inst. from New York, and the agents say there has never been such demand for freight tonnage. Over 350,000 bushels of grain, 4,000 barrels, and 19,000 casks of flour, 3,800 tons of cotton, 40 bales of domestics, 125 bullocks, 100 tons and 1,600 quarters of fresh beef and 500 carcasses of sheep, constituted prominent features of the exports.

There were seven steamers, having an aggregate tonnage of 13,507 tons, to run to be established by merchants of Norfolk, Va., to run between Norfolk and Liverpool at intervals of ten days.

Preparations are being made in San Francisco to give a general Grand Meeting in the City of Tokio, on which it is crossing the ocean, to be held outside the heads by a squadron of yachts and steamers, sailers first, and the city decorated.

The St. Louis School Board, in resolving to employ never been such teachers in the expired schools hereafter, have provided for fifty-six of these teachers. The attendance is said to have increased, and colored parents are taking greater interest in the schools. A change in the system and grading of these schools has been adopted in order to make them better adapted to the shorter school time of these children.

The National Board of Health, comparing the yellow fever epidemic of this with last year, finds that last week there were cases reported in only three cities and towns, as against fifteen last year. There were two cases and no deaths in New Orleans last week, in 1878, 1,228 cases and 529 deaths. In Memphis there were 145 cases and 44 deaths; corresponding week of last year 687 deaths.

The total tonnage of anthracite coal for the year up to the 1st inst. is 37,123,125 tons, an increase over previous year of 6,690,943 tons. Of bituminous coal for the year 2,372,568 tons. In the aggregate all kinds of coal for the coal year, is 39,495,813 tons, to same date last year 12,738,727 tons.

The total amount of Philadelphia for the 8th month of last year, 1879, was $1,401,827. Of this total amount one-sixth was exported in American vessels, and our chief customers were Great Britain, which took nearly $2,000,000; France, $1,175,000; Belgium, $916,000; and Portugal, $370,000.

The total amount of gold received at New York from Europe during last week, was $8,900,000. Of this amount $6,900,000 was deposited in the United States assay office for recoinage. The amount of gold coin paid to bankers by the assay office was $4,555,000. There were 513 deaths in New York city during the past week. In Philadelphia, 232.

Markets.—C.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 101½; do. do. 5½, 102½; 4½ per cent, 101½; 1 per cent, 102.

Made in most departments has been quite active during the past week and prices of several of the leading articles were higher.

Cotton sold in lots at 12½ a 13 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum—Crude, in bids, 5 cts. refined, 6¼ a 7½ cts. per gal.

Flour—Minnesota extra, 4½ for medium and $5.75 for fancy; Ohio, $5.25 a $5.60; patent, 56 a 57, 47 flour, $8.30 a $8.40. Bran, 13 a 25 cts. per ton.

Grain—Wheat was in good demand—Pennsylvania, southern red and amber, $1.12; white, $1.13. Rye, new, 53 a 54 cts.; old, 60 a 61 cts. Corn, 47 a 50 cts. Oats, 33 a 34 cts. for white, and 30 a 32 cts. for mixed. Hays—Cloversed, 7 a 7½ cts. per pound. Flaxseed, $1.20 a $1.25 per bushel. Potatoes—New York, 12 a 13 cts. and Straw.—Prime timothy, 80 a 90 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 65 a 75 cts.; straw, 70 a 80 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle, extra, 53 a 55 cts.; good, 44 a 51 cts. and common, 3 a 3½ cts. Cows, $28 a $50 per head. Hogs, 51 a 53 cts. for fat. Sheep, 30 cts. as to quality. Lambs, 4½ cts. for medium, and 6 cts. for extra.

FOREIGN.—London.—The Times in a leading editorial article says: "Nothing is known to confirm the rumors of a general uprising in Afghanistan. We are not a little surprised to find that the country has become no worse since the first outbreak." The correspondent of the Daily News, at Lahore, reports that the mutineers are advancing on Jellalabad and Cabul, and that the Mohamnds are threatening General Roberts at Alh Khely, who has telegraphed for four more regiments.

A recent official return of the national debt of Great Britain puts the exact figures on the first of 4th month last at £778,078,840.

An explosion has occurred in the colliery pit of the Crofton Colliery, near Newcastle, England. Five persons are already known to have been killed.

All the directors of the West of England and South Wales District Bank, except one, have been committed for trial, for publishing false balance sheets.

A great tenants' rights meeting was held in Malton, Ireland, on the 12th, at which 20,000 people were present. Resolutions were passed calling the attention of the Government to the distressed condition of Ireland, and suggesting the establishment of a system of State relief and a general abatement of rents.

A correspondent writes to the Times that King Messa, a powerful ruler in Victoria Nyanza, has abolished slavery throughout his dominions. At least half a million of slaves were to be liberated on the 13th inst.

A detailed annual statement relative to the French harvest, says it has been very good in four departments. There were 47,000 acres of wheat, 30,000 of rye, and 100,000 of corn. This year's aggregate crop will be ninety million hectolitres, against sixty-five million last year. This will necessitate the importation of five or six million hectolitres.

EVENING SCHOOLS FOR ADULT COLORED PERSONS.

Teachers will be wanted for these schools, to open 10th month 6th. Application may be made to James Bromley, 641 Franklin St.

Ebrahim Smith, 1110 Pine St.
Thomas Elkinton, 9 N. Front St.
Charles C. Cresson, 1132 Girard St.

WESTWON BOARDING SCHOOL.

Our friends Benjamin W. and Rebecca G. Passmore having resigned their positions as Superintendent and Matron of Westwon Boarding School, Friends, who may feel drawn to engage in the important and respectable duties of superintending this Institution, are requested to communicate with either of the undersigned. The present Superintendents desire to be released 10th month next, or earlier.

William F. Townsend, West Chester, Pa.
John S. Comfort, Fallsington, Bucks Co., Pa.
Charles J. Allen, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.
Elizabeth R. Evans, 322 Union St.
Anna V. Edge, Downingtown, Pa.
Deborah Rhoads, Haddonfield, N. J.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Sunday, Ninth mo. 8th, 1879.

A limited number of children will now be admitted to these schools, not members of our religious Society, whose parents may desire to have their educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is particularly invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges beneficial, are invited to send them.

The principal schools will open for the next term, under the care of John H. Dillingham and Margaret Lightfoot, as Principals, both successful teachers of many years' experience. With these Friends in charge, assisted by a complete corps of teachers, it is thought these schools may safely be recommended as affording opportunities for the best of education in successful branches of study, and in the Latin, Greek and French languages. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

Believing that advantage would arise from improved facilities for the instruction of the smaller classes, arrangements have been completed for the opening with the fall term, of a primary department in the building on Seventh St., in which special attention will be given to those children whose studies are of an elementary character. The Primary Schools in Cherry St. and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former excellent management.

DIED. at his residence, near Monrovia, Morgan Co., Indiana, on the 19th of First month, 1879, PHILEAS JOHNSON, a member and elder of West Union Monthly Meeting, in his 81st year of age.

He was born on the 5th instant, at Canton, N. J. JOSEPH H. BROOKS, in the 71st year of age. Being made sensible of the tendering influences of Divine love, he was religiously inclined from very early life. He attended the meetings of Friends from a child, and joined our Society on 7th mo. 20th, 1820, after having spent twenty-one years ago. Having received the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ, in the love of it, he was, we believe, in good degree favored to experience preservation therein to the end of his race. He was often conversant to extend to his friends in private way, the word of loving exhortation and affectionate counsel. He was an example of Christian patience and resignation to the Divine will, during an illness of eighteen months' duration; saying to a Friend a few days before he died "that it had been a comfortable time to him," and "that he was pleased and contented in the belief to remove him hence, we are consoled in the Father that our loss is his gain for ever.

Brief Review of Reported Proceeding of London Yearly Meeting in its consideration of the report of the Deputation to visit Western Yearly Meeting.

It is with sorrow that we notice in The British Friend of 6th mo. 2, that in the report of the Friends who were appointed to visit Western Yearly Meeting, as well as in their remarks while said report was under consideration, that statements were made which are calculated to mislead the readers of that journal as well as those who heard the remarks in the Yearly Meeting, and we believe that every candid Friend would be willing to have such facts in the case as will enable them to form a correct and impartial judgment of our position.

First, we may say that on receiving information about one year ago, of the appointment of this committee we were glad that one Yearly Meeting appeared willing to hear and understand our case. How fully those anticipations were realized let the reader judge.

In what seems to be a synopsis of the report it is stated that "in the afternoon they went into their meeting." We have no knowledge that they intimated any desire to attend any of the sittings of our Yearly Meeting, they asked an interview with the Friends who retired; such an interview was granted as they requested, and as the meeting or interview was at their request it was considered as under their control. They had ample and uninterrupted opportunity for labor as they wished. They pressed earnestly the interest and love of their Yearly Meeting, and their desire that we would re-unite with the other body. They reminded us of the weakening and desolating effects of separations. They would also have us to understand that they were aware of the causes which had led to our course of action. In this they followed closely the information given in London Yearly Meeting last year, as reported in The British Friend, which we could not admit to be true.

Near the close of their remarks one of them informed us that they should expect to hear very little, if any thing, in reply. As they made a move to conclude their interview, one Friend asked of them the privilege to speak a few words. They assented, and he spoke very briefly, showing his desire that those who had as we believed made serious infraction on those principles and testimonies which have ever distinguished our Society, should return thereto; that thereby the broken bonds of union and Christian fellowship might be restored. Thus it seemed our interview was to be ended, with no opportunity for correction.

At this moment as they were rising to take their leave, a Friend arose and stated that it was quite evident judging from their remarks, that they were laboring under misapprehension as to our position and the causes which had led thereto; and asked if they would be willing to meet with us either collectively, or with a few who might be set apart for that purpose. To this they assented, and after the meeting requested that the interview might be with a few individuals.

The report states "the meeting then appointed a committee to have further conference with the deputation." No such committee was appointed by our Yearly Meeting, nor was any official notice taken in any way of their visit or labor amongst us. Subsequently a short statement was drawn up by a few individuals (of which the following is a copy) and being approved of by a number of Friends to whom it was read, four Friends were requested to present it to those to whom it was addressed, and give such further explanation and information as might seem right to convey to them a proper understanding of the case.

Soon after the close of our Yearly Meeting an interview was sought and obtained. The document was read to them and then given into their possession, and to each was presented a copy of a "Testimony for Truth," issued by our Meeting for Sufferings, and also a Testimony of a conference issued some time previous.

The following is a copy of the statement alluded to:—

To Joseph Bevan Braithwaite, Richard Littleboy, George Tatham, and J. J. Dymond, Dear Friends.—Judging from the remarks you made during the interview which we granted you on the 11th inst., we are convinced that you do not rightly understand the causes which led to the unhappy relation now existing between the two Yearly Meetings, and that we have the additional evidence that your information relative to these subjects is not altogether correct, because the reasons given were not the facts in the case, as is shown by statements in public print, purporting to have been made in London Yearly Meeting by persons from this country occupying positions that would seem to entitle them to respect and confidence.

Therefore we cannot silently admit them to be true, nor scarcely approximating to the true cause which led us publicly to testify against those who compose the other organization; but we do certify that the real causes have been in progress for several years past, some of which are briefly set forth in a testimony issued by our Meeting for Sufferings last spring, to which we now refer you.

The departure there mentioned do involve some of the dearest fundamental doctrines of the Society, and they were persistently and continually pressed upon us and our children, not so much, as was intimated by other persons in the "zeal of immature experience," as they were by those in the very highest position in society, thus giving more authority to that which was felt to be fast destroying the confidence and regard of large numbers of our children, not only in the doctrines of the Society, but in the reality of the Christian religion. Hence we felt drawn in brotherly kindness to thus correct your misapprehension."

After the reading of this statement and a friendly presentation of some points, an attempt was made by one of our number to state in a brief and plain way what had come under his own observation relative to the case before us, giving some of the real causes which had led to our present situation. He had spoken but very little when one of the deputation laid his hand upon his shoulder and requested him to stop. We were astonished. Could it be possible after having prohibited, even before we asked it, any opportunity for correction at a meeting of their own appointment, that now, at an interview at our request and for that especial purpose, we should be again refused the opportunity of speaking freely as we had accorded to them. Such seemed to be the case. They seemed desirous to hear nothing of the kind, saying they could not go behind the instruction of their Yearly Meeting.

It is stated further, "whatever individual difference of opinion there might have been, the deputation could not ascertain that there was any difference of view in doctrine between these Friends who retired and the recognized principles of the body."

"It seemed more to be done to misgiving and mistrust of certain practices which had been used by individuals in revival and mission meetings, and which they believed the Yearly Meeting practically recognized."

This appears to be the only sentence in the report which indicates the cause of the separation.

We may not clearly understand what was intended to be conveyed by it. If by "certain practices" they mean those practices which involve a violation of the "recognized principles of the body" (which they give us credit of holding to) then we accept the term; and if by "individuals" they mean men and women who occupy the highest positions in society, who are appointed and reappointed, or liberated again and again for service, when it is well known that their service includes the practices alluded to, then we accept the word individuals, and do believe that the Yearly Meeting practically recognized them and their services; and, farther, if with "revival and mission meetings," they will include other meetings and exclude very few, we accept the whole sentence.

We believe that if those Friends had been willing to hear, there would have been disclosed to them the fact that there are many differences of view with regard to important doctrines, and we are at a loss to perceive how, without investigation, they could say, as G. Tatham remarked, "There was no point of doctrinal difference, but simply uneasiness at certain action taken."

R. Littlejohn seems to indicate that one cause of our trouble is on account of the conduct of those recently united with us, and their inability to "enter into the ways of our organization," and represent our Society so fully as Friends who have been born and educated in our midst." It seems very strange to us that this sentiment should be so persistently pressed, after the information with which they were furnished. We cannot accept it, for we believe their conduct is mainly consistent with the teaching which caused them to unite in membership.

The report states, "opportunity being desired for visiting the families of the seceders, it seemed as though it might be granted, but finally it was not." We should not at all have felt at liberty to allude to this subject had it not been thus published. Such request was made on the occasion of the presentation of the document above copied.

We were aware that the confidence of our Friends towards the deputation was already greatly impaired, on account of their course at the public interview a few days previous, and they informing us that the object of their visit was to encourage us to re-unite with the other body, we did not believe that such visit was likely to result in any benefit, and so we felt easy to advise them.

We are not willing to surrender important principles and testimonies as a matter of expediency, but we would rejoice if all would return to a support and maintenance of them, that thereby the severed bonds of Christian brotherhood might be re-united.

We desire no controversy but believed that correction was due, and we trust we entertain nothing but a spirit of love, and desire for the spread of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

The Power of God.—A little before Joseph Baynes was seized with the increased illness from which he died, a concern came upon him to advise young men and women to wait for the power of God, which would work a change in their hearts, and make them new creatures; otherwise, said he, they will have a form of godliness, without the power; and such live in an unregenerate state; who produce the fruits of nature, but not of grace. Mark, said he, grace teaches to deny ungodliness, and the world's lusts; to live soberly, &c. But alas! too many of our youth, for want of taking the grace for their teacher, go into a false and undue liberty in their words and apparel, making that of no conscience to them, that the power of Truth made conscience to us. For by that power we were made willing to put off all superfluity in eating, drinking, and wearing apparel. Our words were few and savory, for the Lord's dread was before our eyes, and our peace with Him was precious to us, which we, through obedience to the grace of God in our hearts, enjoyed.—From a Memoir of J. Baynes, Piety Promoted.

"For The Friend."

Six Months in Ascension.

This is the title of a sprightly and instructive little volume written by the wife of David Gill, who accompanied her husband on a trip from England to this barren volcanic rock, whither he went to take astronomical observations of the planet Mars, with the view of determining the distance of the sun.

The principle on which the sun's distance is found, is the same as that by which a surveyor calculates the distance of a tree which is visible but inaccessible. He measures the length of a line on solid ground, and with his compass or theodolite takes the angular position of the tree from both ends of his line. The measurements thus made enable him to determine the distance of the tree.

Our author (woman-like) makes use of knitting needles to illustrate the method pursued by astronomers, and she uses her feminine instruments with considerable skill. She refers to a remarkable meteor seen in 1866, which to an observer at Aberdeen seemed to burst near a certain star in the south. An observer at Newcastle saw the same meteor burst to the north of him, and apparently near another star. She imagines an astronomer, with a map of England before him, placing one end of a knitting needle on the town of Aberdeen, and pointing the other end of it in the proper direction and altitude. Similarly he takes another knitting needle, places one end of it in Newcastle, and turns the other in the direction as seen from that town. The point where the needles cross each other must be the place of the bursting of the meteor, which in this case was found to be 40 miles vertically over the town of Dundee.

In the fall of 1877, the planet Mars approached unusually near to the earth, and it was to avail himself of this favorable opportunity of observing its position, that David Gill planned the expedition to Ascension. He proposed to observe the planet in the evening soon after it arose, and again towards morning shortly before its setting. The rotation of the earth would carry him 6,000 or 7,000 miles, and give him the same advantage that would be found in observations made at the same moment by observers stationed at the same distance from each other on the earth's surface.

The calculation of the distance of Mars from the earth, would enable him, by a well known astronomical law discovered by Kepler, to deduce that of the sun.

Through the aid of the Astronomical Society and other interested parties, the expedition was well provided with the delicate instruments necessary for taking accurate observations. Of these one of the most important was a splendid Heliumeter loaned by Lord Lindsay. This valuable instrument met with a sad mishap, which our author thus describes:

"Before starting, very particular attention was required in regard to the Heliumeter—the keystone on which the whole structure of the work rested. And here begins the story of its adventures and mischances.

"The instrument had never been used in so low a latitude as Ascension, and it was necessary to test it carefully, in order to ascertain whether it would perform its functions well under the untried circumstances.

"Considerable interest in the expedition having been shown by members of the Royal Astronomical Society, it was thought best to erect the instrument in their rooms at Burlington House, where the necessary trials could be made, and that the instrument might afterwards be exhibited and explained at one of the evening meetings. The Heliumeter was duly erected, and all had been brought nearly into the same condition of affairs as would be required at Ascension. David was applying a level to an inclined piece of wood cut to the angle of the latitude of Ascension, and was directing the workmen to give a final motion to the screw by which the inclination of the axis is changed, when slip! the screw gave out, the overhanging weight of the Heliumeter and its counterpoises tore the lower end of the cradle from his hand, and, tilting upwards, the polar axis, counterpoise weights and Heliumeter-tube, in all several cwt., came down crash, from a height of 7 or 8 feet, upon the floor.

"Imagine the astronomer's feelings as he saw the Heliumeter of all his hopes light upon its delicate eye-end; that eye-end driven through the floor and slowly torn off, as the whole mass gradually turned round, smashing and crushing the more delicate rods, handles and other attachments to the tube, and finally squashing one of the copper caps which protect the ends of the slides from dust.

"As the whole thing lay there on the floor, within ten days of the time when it must be packed for shipment, it seemed impossible that it could be restored fit for use. The apparent ruin of so many hopes and plans was paralyzing, and for some minutes David was quite incapable of examining the amount of damage done. By-and-by, however, as he came to look into details, matters did not prove to be so desperate as they had at first sight appeared. The tearing and smashing and crushing of the eye-end, handles, &c., had had the happy effect of breaking the fall; and on removing the head, he was delighted to find that the object-glass, the slide, the scales, and in fact all the really vital parts of the Heliumeter proper were intact, and working as smoothly and beautifully as ever.

"The life was still there, and the shattered limbs were at once placed under the care of able surgeons, who in six days made them whole as before. But what a time of strain it was, and how tired we were before we started! Yet all the while we never ceased to congratulate ourselves on the misfortune having taken place when and where it did.

"The cause of it was simply that the elevating screw was too short, and the instrument being called a 'Universal Equatorial,' that is, adapted to all latitudes, this deficiency could not have been anticipated. Had it not been for this trial in Burlington House, in all probability, a like accident would have happened at Ascension, the result of which would simply have meant the utter failure of the expedition.

"It was only at the last moment that we were ready; but we were ready. The evil that is past is not to come."

As none of the outward-bound English mail-ships touched Ascension, D. Gill and his wife were under the necessity of taking passage to

t. Helena, and there waiting for a return steamer from the Cape of Good Hope, to convey them to their destination.

During a week's sojourn at this place they visited Longwood, the residence of Napoleon during his imprisonment on the island, and its tomb, of which she says: "It is a lovely spot that the great general chose for his last resting-place, close by the clear spring that used so often to refresh him after his walks upon Longwood, over a mile distant. We found the place under charge of a French sergeant, and almost over-ruling in its exquisite neatness. A plain iron railing encloses a plot of mossy grass, shaded by cypress, willow and their sombre 'rees, and an inner rail, round which climb bright geraniums, protects the tomb itself. An ancient-looking, leafless willow hangs over it, but this is not the original willow as I had fondly hoped. That has been ruthlessly hacked to pieces—long since by relic-hunters, and this lineal descendant, though better protected, already looks tattered and forlorn, and will, no doubt, soon die the death of its predecessor. With a view to this fate indeed, a younger willow has been planted close by to take the place of honor when the present tree falls."

For "The Friend."

The following dialogue between that once eminent Friend, Thomas Story, and a Roman Catholic, in Ireland, written by himself, appeared to the writer calculated to inform such as are looking outwardly, as to what is the true and right reception of Christ.

After a somewhat lengthy dispute concerning the outward body and blood, the Catholic then said, "That Christ told the people that except ye eat the flesh and drink the blood of the Son of man, ye have no life in you; there must then be some way of eating and drinking to make good that saying, which is also very plain in its own nature, the flesh and blood in a proper sense." To this Thomas said, that Christ did say so, and the people took Him to mean properly, and without a figure as ye now do, looking upon the impossibility as it really is in the sense they and you take it; but when they were all offended and gone, He turned to his disciples and explained it to them, for they seemed not rightly to understand Him, saying, will ye also leave me; to you it is given to understand the mysteries, but to them (the world) in parables.

What then was the parable or mystery? It is the Spirit that quickens, the flesh profiteth nothing; and thus it is in your bibles as well as ours. Thomas further added, that if therefore the bread were really substantiated after the words were said, and were the true body and blood of Christ, and if they eat and drank the same flesh and blood, which then they beheld, it would profit them nothing. Then he said, 'tis true the flesh and blood by itself, without the spirit, does not profit, but when we eat the flesh and blood together we eat the Spirit also, and that quickens as we eat it. This was a deep fetch, and the last shift, which Thomas answered thus, viz: "This cannot be Christ's meaning, for here he does not only distinguish, but divide between the flesh and Spirit; it is the Spirit that quickens. Here is the whole work of quickening ascribed to the Spirit, and the same that quickens also continues life in him who is quickened; for from the Spirit came flesh, blood, bread, wine, and the whole universe, and all that in it is, and are all continued by the same spirit, the substance of all things; but the flesh profiteth nothing. Here it is set apart from the Spirit in the same sentence, and profiteth nothing to be eaten; and for the further interpretation of this, observe the words of Christ to Satan, 'Man shall not live by bread alone; but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God;' the words which proceed out of the mouth of God are Spirit and Life, as said the Lord Christ, who is that Word, 'My words they are Spirit, and they are Life;' 'My Word the apostles knew by experience to make them alive and preserve them; and appears secondly by the answer of Peter at the same time: whether shall we go? Thou hast the words of Eternal Life. So that this quickening is not by this so gross and carnal eating and drinking here imagined, but by receiving of the Spirit through the words of Christ, abstracted and apart from that holy body, and all other corporeity of body; and for the further understanding of sayings of this nature, observe that where the disciples were showing Him the temple at Jerusalem, and the beauty of it, He said to them, 'Destroy this temple, and I will raise it up in three days.' The temple at Jerusalem was the object of their eyes and subject of their discourse, which gave them just occasion, as men, to suppose He meant that temple which they said was forty and six years in building, and could He raise it in three days? They admired at his saying; but yet in the sequel of things, they understood afterward, though not at the time, that He spoke of the temple of his body. Again, in like manner, where He said, 'I am the Vine, ye are the branches,' &c. This may well explain that other saying, 'I will drink no more of the fruit of this vine, until I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom,' which can mean no other than as his coming in the flesh consecrated the way, and was previous to the coming of the Spirit, so his drinking new wine in the kingdom of God, must intend that community of spirit intended in the words of the apostle afterwards concerning the whole church, 'We have all been made to drink into that one Spirit.' Christ's terms are, that we give up ourselves wholly, body, soul and spirit, that He may dwell in us as in the saints of old.

"For The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

To Joseph Elkinton.

Tunnessassa, 11th mo. 3d, —

Dear Friend, * * * The appearance of things amongst us at the present is truly humbling. O! was there more of that living concern in our members to dig deep and lay their foundation upon that blessed immovable Rock, and a patient humble abiding there, in place of the dividing and scattering which has of latter years happened to us, there would be a drawing of others towards the precious doctrines and testimonies which our predecessors were remarkably favored in holding forth to the world, and supported in suffering for, and which I believe, will ever be held precious by the living members amongst us. May such, in this trying season, labor to get into the quiet, and there wait upon God for wisdom to direct, and for a renewal of their spiritual strength. Although it is trying at times, and humbling, to experience a sense of our own great weakness and inability of ourselves to think a good thought or to do an act that would promote the glory of our Heavenly Father, it has been my experience at times, and has been very profitable to me to know it; how comforting at such a time to feel that his grace is sufficient for us.

Our friend, Robert Scotton, has no doubt given thee an account of their visit to the natives; for my own part I can say their company was pleasant to me, but have feared they were in too much of a hurry—their own feelings can tell them best.

The chiefs have held councils at different times in order to unite in making an effort to get the whites moved off the Reservation. They held one some time ago, in which they came to the conclusion to have the most of the families removed. Benjamin Williams has, I think, five families living in houses of his about Cold Spring, and opposed the chiefs strongly. The chiefs that are most opposed to the whites living on the Reservation have been so trifled with by the judges and officers of the county, who appear to favor whites continuing on the Reservation, that they appear a good deal discouraged. They held a council on Sixth-day last, on the subject of removing the whites, and came to the conclusion to let them remain six months longer, and then have them removed; some of the chiefs were much tried with the conclusion, and I was exceedingly tried when I heard of it; I have always opposed their living on the Reservation.

At present I have but one school in operation, the one at Cold Spring, which is small, from 9 to 13 scholars. There are a few on this side of the river, that meet at Moses Snow's, where I call in the evening on my way from school, and give them lessons. * * * I continue to feel a deep interest in the welfare of our poor red brethren, for there are times when they feel like brethren to me.

There are such floods of obstruction thrown in the way of their improvement, by the whites, as to make it at times very discouraging, yet I am sometimes comforted in believing there is a power that can overrule the designs of the wicked one, and that we do not serve a hard Master. If we do what He requires of us, we shall be clear, and our reward sure. It feels to me at times, it is enough to know we have done our blessed Master's will; the riches and honors of this world are mere bubbles compared with it; O! the peace, the quietness of mind, and perfect enjoyment which it affords.

I feel comforted in believing the labors of Friends in this place have not been lost; some of the older ones have spoken to me of the benefit that it has been to them to take the advice that Friends gave them a long time ago.

In sincere love I remain thy friend,
EBENEZER WORTH.

There appears to be no record of the time when E. Worth formally relinquished his interesting charge at Tunnessassa, other than a minute of the Indian Committee of 12th mo. 20th, 1849, which is as follows, viz: "Our esteemed friend, Ebenezer Worth, who has for several years been residing near the Allegheny Reservation, and usefully engaged in promoting the concern of the Yearly Meeting and of this Committee for the gradual civilization and improvement of the Indians, believing that the time has come for his release from this service, and desiring that the minute granted him by Bradford Monthly Meeting, in the 4th month, 1843, may be returned, the committee think it right to state on his behalf, that they believe he has been rightly engaged in this concern, and that his labors have been very acceptable and satisfactory to us."

Solomon and Susan Lukens remained at Tunessassa in charge of the Indian concern until the autumn of 1852, when they were succeeded by John and Susanna L. Wood, of West Chester, Pa. In the month of 1853, Susanna L. Wood was removed by death from the effects of typhoid fever, which was prevailing among the Indians; in reference to which our friend E. W. writes to his friend Jos. Elkinton, whose wife had also had the fever at Tunessassa, where she had gone to assist J. and S. L. Wood.

I received thy acceptable letter of the 23d, on Seventh-day evening, and was truly glad to hear that Mary was favored again to return to her family and friends so much restored to health. I esteem it a great favor, and hope it will not soon be forgotten by any of us; considering her age and delicate constitution, I thought her a doubtful case. It is a source of great consolation and encouragement to feel that our Divine Master is omnipresent and can administer to all our wants, and with Him all things are possible. * * * Susan Wood's example has left a sweet savor behind her, which will do more to preserve her memory than all the marble that could be placed to her grave. I hope her being so soon removed from the field of Christian labor, will not serve as any discouragement to others whom the Master may be pleased to call to that service; but on the contrary, ought not that evidence which was felt of her Divine Master's presence with her at that solemn period, to comfort and support her, serve as an encouragement to others to go forth and serve Him in the place allotted to them.* I have felt much for J., also for the Indians, but do not feel as if the time had come for me to go to Tunessassa. I hope when the right time comes (if it should be required of me) I may be favored to see it clearly and feel willing to go. * * *

In love I remain thy friend,

E. WENDELL FORTH.

The luxury of luxuries is that of doing good.

* Of this dear friend and her interment, our late valued friend Thos. Evans, of Philadelphia, thus writes to Joseph Elkinton, who was at Tunessassa in attendance upon his sick wife: * * * "The affecting event of dear Susan Wood's death, has made a deep impression on many of our minds, and cast a shade over the prospects for the future. * * * We had previously heard of the solemn event, and though it greatly surprised me, yet a stillness spread over my mind, and all anxiety and questioning seemed taken away, and a quiet submission raised to Divine ordering, not at all doubting but it is in mercy and wisdom that she is called away from this scene of trial and suffering; and we may humbly hope is entered into the joy of her Lord. The funeral was a time of unusual solemnity; I think I never witnessed an occasion when the covering over the company was such as at the house and ground, Samuel Bethel remarked afterward, that his feelings were peculiar; almost joyous; such was the sense of the happy state of the disembodied spirit, and that he could hardly help expressing it."

THE ONLY PORTION.

"Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides Thee!"—Psalm lxxiii. 25.

Lord of earth! thy bounteous hand
Well this glorious frame has planned;
Woods that wave, and hills that tower,
Ocean rolling in his power,—
All that strikes the gaze unsought,
All that charms the lonely thought!—
Friendship—gem, transcending price,
Love—a flower of Paradise.
Yet, amid this scene so fair,
Should I cease Thy smile to share,
What were all its joys to me?
"Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

Lord of heaven! beyond my sight,
Rolls a world of purer light,—
There, in love's unclouded reign,
Parted hands shall join again;
Martyrs there, and prophets high,
Blaze a glorious company,—
While immortal music rings
From unnumbered seraph strings.
O, that scene is passing fair—
Yet, shouldst Thou be absent there,
What were all its joys to me?
"Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

Lord of earth and heaven! my breast
Seeks in Thee its only rest:
I was lost—thy accents mild,
Honeyed lured thy wandering child;
I was blind—thy healing ray,
Charmed the long eclipse away,—
Source of every joy I know,
Sustainer of my every woe,
Yet should once Thy smile divine
Cease upon my soul to shine,
What were heaven or earth to me?
"Whom have I in heaven but Thee?"

—Songs in the Night.

LEARN A LITTLE EVERY DAY.

Little rills make little streamlets,
Streamlets swell the river's flow;
Rivers join the mountain billows,
Onward, onward, as they go!
Life is made of smallest fragments,
Shade and sunshine, work and play;
So may we, with greatest profit,
Learn a little every day.

Tiny seeds make plenteous harvests,
Drops of rain compose the showers;
Seconds make the flying minutes,
And the minutes make the hours!
Let us hasten, then, and catch them,
As they pass us on their way;
And with honest, true endeavor,
Learn a little every day.

Let us while we read or study,
Call a flower from every page;
Here a line, and there a sentence,
'Gainst the lonely time of age!
At our work or by the wayside,
While we ponder, while we play,
Let us thus by constant effort
Learn a little every day.

THE LILY OF THE VALLEY.

I thank my God, I feel that not alone
On mountain peaks his blessed sunshine glows,
And dews drop sweetness;—even here, for down
In meads, a lily grows.

I am His work, who made the evening star,
Wherefore I lift to Him my flowing brar;—
They die to-morrow, but to-day they are Beautiful in His sight.

I look upon the hills, and sometimes dream
How they rejoice in morning's earliest light,
And how, serene, and strong, and still they seem
To guard us all the night.

'Tis said the brights are cold; it might be so;—
That winds are keenest then, and winters drear;—
I know not how it is; I only know
My God has placed me here.

Selected.

Here in this little nook of earth,—my own,—
And sent a sunbeam,—mine,—to cheer my heart,
He bids me bloom, perhaps for Him alone—
Is there a better part?

I bloom,—stars shine;—we bloom and shine for Him;
We give our best, grand world and humble flower;
The light through ages never growing dim;—
The fragrance of an hour!

So then He smiles, and takes with equal love
Our various gifts, nor knows or great or small;
But in His infiniteness sits above,
And comprehends us all.

"For The Friend."

William Cullen Bryant.

"How soon young Bryant began to write verses there is no means of knowing. He is said to have made a metrical paraphrase of the first chapter of the Book of Job when in his tenth year. His first literary labors were more profitable than those of most young writers; for his paraphrase brought him ninepence from his rigid but well-meaning grandfather. This performance was followed by numerous efforts; among them an ode on an eclipse of the sun, and an elegy on the death of a cousin.

"Although this precocity is unusual, it is by no means unparalleled. Pope wrote smooth verses at twelve, and Cowley at ten. Though Chatterton died a mere boy, his verses deceived some of the crowned heads of literature. Tasso began writing at nine; and a book of poems has recently been printed, composed entirely by two little children.

"Bryant himself, in later years, did not regard this early gift of versification as at all remarkable or promising. Speaking of Fitz-Greene Halleck, he says, 'I do not find that Halleck began to write verses prematurely. Poetry, with most men, is one of the sins of their youth, and a great deal of it is written before the authors can be justly said to have reached years of discretion.'

"During his early years he was much interested in botany, of which his father was particularly fond. Together they rambled over the fields in pursuit of rare flowers, analyzing and preserving them with scientific enthusiasm.

"When Bryant had reached his sixteenth year, he was found to possess enough knowledge of Latin and Greek to admit him to the sophomore class in college. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1810, he was sent to Williams College, at Williamstown, Mass. At this institution he seems to have manifested little that attracted attention, or foreshadowed a distinguished career. He was known by his professors and classmates as a ready and industrious student, especially fond of the classic languages and the best literature.

"While still a youth in college or at home, he composed the first sketch of the one poem by which he is best known, and doubtless always will be,—'Thanatopsis.' 'It was at Cummington, while wandering in the primeval forests, over the floor of which were scattered the gigantic trunks of fallen trees, mouldering for long years, and suggesting an indefinitely remote antiquity, and whose silent rivulets crept along through the carpet of dead leaves, the spoil of thousands of summers, that the poem was composed. The young poet had read the poems of Kirke White, which, edited by Southey, were published about that time, and a small volume of Southey's poems; and some lines of those anshers had kindled his imagination, which, going forth over the face of the globe, sought to bring under one broad and comprehensive view the destinies of the human race in the present life, and the perpetual rising and passing away of generation after generation who are nourished by the fruits of the soil, and find a resting-place in its bosom.

"The first draught of the poem lay among the poet's papers for nearly five years before it was brought to light. At length, one day, after the author had left home, his father discovered the poem, and said to a lady who was fond of poetry that he had found some of William's verses. The lady read them, and, as she looked up from the paper, burst into tears, moved by the sad paths of mortality as pictured in the lad's solemn lines."

The poem was sent to R. H. Dana, one of the editors of the North American Review, who was so surprised at the genius displayed in it, that he seriously questioned its being the composition of an American. It was published in 1817, when its author was 23 years old.

"Perhaps there is not in the history of literature a better illustration of the slow evolution of a poem. As published in the Review, the blank verse is introduced by the following stanzas, which may be quoted here, as they are omitted from later editions of the poem:—

'Not that from life and all its woes
The hand of death shall set me free;
Not that this head shall then repose
In the low vale most peacefully.

Ah! when I touch Time's farthest brink,
A kinder soulance must attend:
It chills my very soul to think
On that dread hour when life must end.

In vain the flattering verse may breathe
Of ease from pain, and rest from strife:
There is a secret dread of death
Inwoven with the strings of life.

This bitter cup at first was given
When angry Jactus frowned severe;
And 'tis the eternal doom of Heaven,
That man must view the grave with fears.'

"The remainder of the poem consists of forty-nine lines, instead of eighty-one as in the final version. The beautiful conclusion beginning, 'So live, that when thy summons comes,' was added later. Hardly a sentence remains unaltered. Crude forms of expression have been elaborated. Puerile conceptions have been expunged. Noble images have been introduced. The flow of the verses has been rendered more musical. Instead of

'Take the wings
Of morning, and the Borean desert pierce;
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
That veil Oregon, when he hears no sound
Save his own dashings,—
We now have,—

'Take the wings
Of morning; pierce the Barcan wilderness;
Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound
Save his own dashings,—
Instead of

'Thousands more
Will share thy destiny. The titling world
Dance to the grave. The busy brood of care
Plod on, and each one chases as before
His favorite phantom,—
We now read,—

'All that breathe
Will share thy destiny. The gay will laugh
When thou art gone; the solemn brood of care
Plod on, and each one, as before will chase
His favorite phantom.'

"Though art has heightened the coloring, and smoothed the metre, the immortal part of the poem belongs to its earliest as well as to its latest form. It is safe to say that nothing equal to it had previously been written on this side of the Atlantic."

Having studied law, and been admitted to the bar in 1815, he began the practice of his profession at Plainfield, Massachusetts. "It was during his residence in this place that he wrote the lines 'To a Waterfowl,'—the best known of his earlier poems after 'Thanatopsis.' "Like the other productions of his author," says a friend of Bryant's, "its conception was natural. One evening he saw a wood-duck flying across a sky of marvellous beauty, and a picture of the Divine Providence was revealed to him. Southey's poem "Ebb-Tide" suggested the form of the stanza; and his genius wrought the elevated and tranquilizing verses, which were published in The North American Review."

"In 1817, having found Plainfield too small an arena for his ambition, he removed to Great Barrington, a picturesque village situated among the noble hills of Berkshire, in the beautiful valley of the Housatonic."

While at Great Barrington, Bryant met and loved Fanny Fairchild, a person of good family and possessed of many womanly graces. "Though diffident in the expression of his love, it was not misplaced. For more than forty years the happy pair journeyed on together, mutually helpful and trustful. The poet has embalmed the memory of his wife's purity, devotion, and piety, in 'The Future Life' and 'The Life that Is,' and finally lamented her loss in the touching revery dated October, 1866.

"It was in this same year (1821) that Bryant was invited to deliver a poem before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard College at the commencement anniversary."

"The young lawyer appeared at Cambridge, in response to the invitation, with 'The Ages,' one of the longest and most elaborate poems that he ever wrote; 'the best poem of the kind,' says Richard H. Stoddard, 'that was ever recited before a college society, either in this country or in England,—grave, stately, thoughtful, presenting, in animated, picturesque stanzas, a compact summary of the history of mankind.' It has the honor of standing first in the complete editions of the poet's works, as the fittest prelude to all the poems of his life."

The Eleventh Commandment.—At the annual exhibition of the grammar schools of Boston, Edward Everett closed an admirable speech with the following anecdote:

"The celebrated Archbishop Usher was, in his early days, working on the coast of Ireland, at a place where his person and character were alike unknown. Stripped of everything, he wandered to the house of the dignitary of the church, in search of shelter and relief, craving assistance as a brother clergyman. This dignitary struck with his squalid appearance after the wreck, distrusted his tale and doubted his character, and said that, so far from being a clergyman, he did not believe he could tell how many commandments there were. "I can at once satisfy you," said the Archbishop, "that I am not the ignorant impostor you take me for. There are eleven commandments." This answer confirmed the dignitary in his suspicion, and he replied with a sneer: "Indeed there are but ten commandments in my Bible; tell me the eleventh and I will relieve you." "Here it is," said the Archbishop; "A new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another."

A Few Serious Reflections.

The apostle advises (1 Tim. ii. 9), that women adorn themselves in modest apparel. Many of our members in the present day seem to think that they may follow the fashions of the world in their dress. It must be admitted that simplicity in attire is required of every true and watchful Christian believer. Though no marked singularity may be laid upon us, yet when our hearts and minds are redeemed from the love of the world, and its spirit, our outward appearance will not fail to show that we desire to be the self-denying followers of a crucified Redeemer, "who pleased not Himself."

Many those who are in any way engaged in teaching, pause to consider what will probably be the effect on the minds of their scholars, if they are wearing the outward ornaments of gold, feathers, flowers, lace, beads, &c., instead of a becoming propriety and neatness, and the ornaments of "the hidden man of the heart," which is "a meek and quiet spirit," which is in the sight of God of great price." And in visiting their cottages, may not the poor be led to observe that the cost of some of these superfluities might have ministered to their necessities. But above all, how can any be prepared to speak to others in a meeting for the worship of God, until they have yielded to His transforming power? He requires the whole burnt sacrifice—a forsaking of all for Christ's sake. Our Lord's words to Peter were, "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren."

The good and pious Leigh Richmond advises one of his daughters to study and observe great simplicity and plainness in dress.

May we all beware that we do not drift more into the world. The disciples of Christ are separate from the world, and how striking is his prayer for them, "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil."
—The British Friend.

Flattery Rewarded.—Frederick William, father of Frederick the Great of Prussia, painted—or fancied he painted—but his works were mere daubs. Such, however, was not the language of his courtiers when descending on the merits of the royal Apelles.

On one occasion his majesty favored them with a sight of a new specimen.

"Suppose," said the king, "that some great painter—Rubens or Raphael, for instance—had painted this picture, do you think it would fetch a considerable price?"

"Sire," replied the Baron de Polnitz, who passed for the most practiced and most obsequious of his majesty's courtiers, "I assure you that a connoisseur could not offer less for such a picture than twenty-five thousand florins."

"Well, then, baron," cried the gratified monarch, "you shall receive a proof of my munificence. Take the picture for five thousand florins, which you shall pay me in ready money; and as I wish to render you a service, you have my permission to sell it again."

"Ah, sire!" returned the baron, who was fairly caught in his own snare, "I can never consent to take advantage of your majesty's generosity."

"No reply," said the king; "I know that I make you a handsome present, by which you will gain fifteen thousand florins or more. But your zeal for my interest has been proved, and I owe you some recompense. Your love for the arts and your attachment to myself entitle you to a mark of my esteem."

It is a very blessed state to be found true waiters for, and witnesses of, the "second coming of Christ, which is without sin unto salvation;" for true happiness doth not consist in having seen one of the days of the Son of man; or in being witnesses of his first appearance, wherein he convinceth and reproveth for sin; but in waiting for and witnessing his second coming to cleanse, save, and redeem from sin: herein is the joy of God's salvation felt and enjoyed.

Christ's appearance is first to convince of sin; and this is a ministration of condemnation, which is glorious in its time; but there is a ministration which exceeds in glory, which all are to wait for, witness, and not sit down short of. This is the mark of the high calling, the high and heavenly state which they are called to, even to know the second coming of Christ without sin unto salvation, and a being presented to the Father without spot or wrinkle. This to possess and enjoy, is the end, sum and substance of all the dispensations of God toward mankind ever since the fall. This is the end of all good words and writings, and the end of Christ's first and second appearance.

All men have sinned and come short of the glory of God, therefore must know the ministration of judgment, and condemnation fulfilled in and upon them, before they can know the glory that is in it, and before they come to know the second ministration, which exceeds in glory.

This is the high and heavenly state that some were in when they could say, "truly our fellowship is with the Father and with the Son." This to witness is the feast of fat things prophesied of, and the broad rivers and streams which make glad the city of God, beyond what all the dainties of the earth can afford. This is the soul's delight, rest and happiness, praises to God forever.—William Shewen.

The Poor Couple.—One day during the spring of 1879, a lady member of my church awoke in the morning with her thoughts dwelling upon a poor couple who lived in the suburbs of our city. Do what she would these people were ever before her mind. While dressing and after dressing; at breakfast and after breakfast; alone in thought, or in conversation with her husband; moving about the house, or seated at her sewing; all the while the thought of these poor people would intrude itself. It was now a long time since she had seen them, and she knew of no urgent reason for her making an early call upon them. She might well have excused herself from so doing, for she was suffering from a cold which had confined her to her home for the greater part of two weeks. Besides, it was one of those blustering March days, so trying both to sick and well, and with an injunction from her husband "not to go out of the house" that day, she might have had ex-use enough to stay at home. But "that poor couple" were staring her in the face wherever she went, and answering her unseen but felt call, she started out to see them. On reaching the house she knocked at the door was answered by the poor woman herself, who on opening it, with expressions of gratitude, threw herself on the floor, and poured out her thanks to God for sending a timely deliverer. A look at the room revealed the greatest poverty. A few hard crusts of bread were all they had to relieve hunger, a few bits of coal were just dying out in the fire place, and a handful more was being husbanded for the needs of a coming cold night. Want, gaunt want was seen everywhere. The husband, breathing out his prayer to God, had started out to find relief; and the echo of the woman's uncomplaining crying and praying still lingered within the room when the deliverer entered.

What a scene to behold! The needy one on her knees, thanking God, who had heard and answered her, although down at the feet of a human helper, looking beyond all surroundings into the very face of God, and thanking Him who hears the needy when they cry. The help was at hand; for faith had triumphed, and fire and food were quickly furnished. Who will say that prayer was not answered? The Lord heard. Hence the burdened mind, the uneasiness and the resolve of one of his own dear children, who for the unrest of the morning was more than compensated by the thanksgivings and benedictions which were poured out before noon.—J. Y. M., in Presbyterian.

Religious Items, &c.

Disrupting Religious Meetings.—The Christian Advocate contains a notice of several decisions under the laws of different States prohibiting the disturbance of religious meetings. In a case in Alabama, not long since, several persons were arrested for riding furiously near a meeting-house during worship, and using profane language. They afterward entered the house, and one of them laid down on a rickety bench that made a noise every time he moved. They were acquitted on the ground that there was nothing willful in their conduct. In a later case, in the same State, the defendant, after the service, but before the congregation had gone away, obtained leave to speak, and said: "I rise neither to preach, pray, or sing, but I want to talk to the Church. I have meditated, thought, and prayed to know what I ought to do. I demand my letter. I cannot live in the Church with liars, thieves, rogues, and murderers." Held guilty, not on account of his sentiments, but for such an expression of them.

In Indiana the plaintiff, a minor, attending a camp meeting, persisted, against the rules of assembly, in sitting among the women. Some of the brethren removed him and detained him in a tent for half an hour. He sued his captor for false imprisonment, but the court held the action would not lie, he having known of the rule and disobeyed it, and that the authorities had a right to enforce observance to their rules.

In an early case in New York (Wall vs. Lee, 31 N.Y., 141), the defendant, a Catholic priest, had commented in a sermon upon a dance recently held in the vicinity of the church. While the collection was being taken the plaintiff rose in his pew and demanded an explanation, and the minister's source of information. The defendant told him to sit down or go out, but he refused, and the defendant, with others, undertook to put him out. He sued them for assault and battery, and it was held that the disturbance need not be willful, and that the priest had a right to preserve order. The court also held that although the benediction might have been pronounced, yet the collection was a part of the religious exercises.

In Texas it has been held that cracking and eating pecan nuts during service is a disturbance of a religious meeting. The indulgence cost the defendants $25 each.

Temple Movement.—The so-called "Liberals" of this country have called a convention at Cincinnati to consider the formation of a new political party to farther their objects. They wish to remove from the laws of the country every recognition of God or religion, to allow no teaching in the public schools of such matters, to abolish all regulations which make a distinction between the First-day of the week and other days, and to rescind the legislation which prohibits the transmission of indecent matter through the mails. Their organ advertises a number of infidel tracts, which they appear to be zealously circulating.

Whatever temporary success may appear to attend these efforts, we have no fears that the cause of true religion will ever be suffered to fall by its omnipotent Author; but sadness clothes the mind in reflecting on the deluded condition of many of these people.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Ropy and Coagulated Milk.—At the Delaware Co. Institute of Science an article on this subject was read. In very hot weather this condition of the milk is sometimes observed very soon after milking. It is thought to be caused by excessive heat and unsuitable food, under the influence of which the secretions are altered in character. L. B. Arnold, President of the American Dairyman's Association says: "I have found a small feed of cornmeal in a heated term to produce all the effects you describe, when the milk would be normal without the meal. The milk when thus affected is but little changed and only delicate infants would be inconvenienced by it. The greatest change is in the total of albuminoids. They become largely increased, and the per cent. of albumen is relatively much increased, and that of casein diminished. In the place of part of the fat glycerine appears, and for part of the sugar, glucose. No other change in the composition has been discovered, but a change in the tendency to curdle while sweet is increased in a marked degree. Such milk is apt to coagulate spontaneously without becoming at all acid. The coagulating agency in cream produced under an elevated temperature of the blood is not infrequently so great as to answer in the place of rennet in converting milk into curd and cheese of good quality, by the influence of cream alone. Milk and gastric juice when minutely studied have many points in common both in structure, function and mode of development, each being composed of a viscid fluid abounding in animal cells, developed alike in ultimate follicles by a process of building and shedding. The remedy for ropy and self-coagulating milk consists in regulating the amount of heat-producing food, and cooling the cows by shade and plenty of food water."

The American Naturalist quotes from Daines Barrington, some interesting information concerning the teaching of birds to sing. The latter says: "I have educated nestling linnets under the three best singing larks—the skylark, woodlark, and titlark—every one of which, instead of the linnets's song, adhered entirely to that of their respective instructors. Linnets, which had been educated by a titlark, was kept for three months with common linnets in full song; but it adhered to the titlark melody, borrowing no passage from the linnets. It appears, therefore, that birds acquire their songs as infants acquire a language—by instruction rather than by instinct—and that those of the same species sing alike, for the same reason that children of one nationality speak alike, namely, that their instructors have a common tongue.

An English mechanical journal favors drilling triangular holes for blastings, instead of circular ones as by the ordinary method. To effect this the boring bar or jumper is partly run on each side of its cutting alternately, so difficulty is found in boring the holes to its shape, and they are found to be more effective than round holes, the corners forming points at which the fracture of the material operated on appears to commence, the line of fracture usually forming a prolongation of the triangle.

Memory in a Bird.—When I returned from the Pacific about two years ago, I brought sulphur crested Cockatoo (Cacatua galerita) from Australia. Soon after my arrival in England I had occasion to cut his wing, and thus destroyed all his former friendly feelings towards me. On my removal from Blackheath to Dublin, I placed him for a few weeks in the Zoological Society's Garden, Regent's Park. Being in London in May I brought him home on my return to this city. I went to the Gardens for him myself and was interested and somewhat pleased to find on denking to him, that he had apparently forgotten me. On my way, in a cab, to the hotel here I was staying, he was very friendly; at my arrival there, as soon as I took off my hat, it was evident that he recognized me, or his old manner at once returned. On arrival here he appeared to remember my children, and resumed his former friendliness towards them, but he still regards me as his enemy.—S. J. Whitmer in Nature.

The Waste of Natural Resources.—Our soils present the waste of an enormous period of time, during which the decay of the rocks was slowly built them up, including the subsoil. It is not too much to say, that to form them anew would require a longer time than has elapsed since our oldest civilizations began to exist. In most regions they represent the ash of great thicknesses of strata mingled with the remains of an inconceivable succession of organic generations. This commingled waste of organic forms and rocks makes the life of the land possible; the soil is the common reservoir where life comes, and to which it returns by death. There is no doubt that the course of civilization has led, and is still leading to a steady and increasing waste of this precious heritage. Old-lands, such as Persia, Mesopotamia, Greece, parts of Italy, &c., have had their production steadily lowered by the waning fertility of their once rich soils. America is using, or rather misusing, in a year, the treasures that a thousand years have been preparing. Parts of Europe, it is true, hold their fertility, or even gain something in richness; but it is at a great cost, and often at the expense of the resources of other lands, through importation of manures, or the use of manures made of the foreign soil products. Year by year, however, a vast amount of this store of possible life contained in our soils slips from our grasp into the depths of the sea. It has been suggested that we may recover it thence by means of marine animals and plants used as fertilizers; but though we may thus regain a part of the waste, the depths of the sea will permanently claim the largest share of the materials taken from our soil. The rapidity and destructiveness of this process can be appreciated only by those who have carefully watched its operations.

Except under cultivation our soils hardly waste at all. Until man seizes on them they constantly gain in depth and fertility. From the forest clad region the streams send water with little trace of sediment in it; from the cultivated valleys come waters yellow with a mass of wasted soil. Whoever will follow this subject in the fields of Europe and America will be convinced that a progressive lowering of fertility in the soils of the earth has attended, and must attend, the continued advance of man.

A similar waste attends the use of the more limited stores of metallic wealth of the earth. Of the readily attainable stock of coal, iron, &c., we have probably at this out-set of our career consumed at least the one-hundredth part, and in the time to come we may not unreasonably conjecture that each century will demand even as much of this limited store. So that in metals, as in soils, man finds himself with a limited store, from which to supply a demand of which he cannot see the bounds.—N. S. Shaler in Atlantic Monthly.

The apostle Paul freely confessed that he had no sufficiency in himself to think a good thought.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 27, 1879.

The ultimate object of all church organizations is the promotion of the Redeemer's kingdom in the hearts of those belonging to them, and of the world at large. If we retain this truth in remembrance, and conform our actions thereto, it will raise us above mere party spirit in our labors for the welfare of the religious Society of which we are members. In all our movements and efforts, this test will be practically applied—"Is this step taken to promote the honor of God, to spread his truth among men, and to perform that which the all-wise Leader of his people appoints as my duty?"

Those members of the Society of Friends who really believe that its principles are nothing less than Primitive Christianity revived; that they are the doctrines taught to the world by our blessed Saviour and his apostles 1800 years ago; and that the Holy Spirit teaches the same unchangeable truths to those who reverently regard its instructions in these days; these Friends from conviction feel that in bringing these blessed truths to the notice of others, and pressing upon them the duty of faithful compliance with the self-denying, cross-bearing life they require, they are actuated by a higher motive than blind attachment to any outward organization; they believe that they are promoting the best interests of the human race, and encouraging their fellow men to walk in that path which leads to everlasting blessedness.

But when those principles which we regard with veneration not only as true, but as of momentous importance to the eternal interests of mankind are slighted by others, or even rejected and contemned, how easy it is for poor human nature to allow a false zeal to be kindled, and to enter on their defence in a measure of that spirit which would regard opposers as personal assailants! The combative disposition natural to man is sometimes allowed to have sway, and we contend earnestly, as we think, for the faith, but not in that meekness of wisdom which belongs to the anointed servants of the Lord. We have no doubt that the Lord does often require of his servants to bear clear and decided testimony to those glorious truths which He has been pleased to open to their understandings; that his command, to them is to cry aloud and spare not; that at times even sharp rebuke becomes a duty; and that our Great Captain does arm his faithful soldiers with keen weapons to be used in his cause; but these weapons, says the apostle, "are not carnal," they come from the Heavenly treasury, and are to be used in the fear and the power of their Divine Gift.

It is of the utmost importance to individuals and to churches to experience that heavenly communion and fellowship with the Lord which is the mark of the Christian. There can be no true growth or preservation without this partaking of the water of life. A body of people may retain the form of sound doctrine, and may even be zealous in its defence; but if the love of God waxes cold among them, if their affections become set on other things, and they depart from that close walking with the Spirit of Christ in their hearts, which is the safe dwelling-place of the Christian, their vitality as a religious body is gone, and they have ceased to be as a light to the world—their works no longer bring glory to God.

It is a serious thing to live. We may shut our eyes to the responsibilities that rest upon us, but we cannot avoid them. We believe that many in this day of unsettlement are deeply tried with the perplexing things that surround them. Our desire for all such is, that they may not lose their confidence in Him who is the Leader of his people, but that abiding under the shadow of the Almighty,—under the precious influence of his Spirit,—they may patiently wait and quietly hope for his salvation, moving only as He directs and opens the way. In his own time He will make their way plain before them. To such the prophetic promise is applicable: "Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servant, that walketh in darkness and hath no light? Let him trust in the name of the Lord and stay upon his God."

In proportion as the members of any church or body of religious professors become living members of the true Vine, and continually partake of Divine nourishment from the Fountain of life, will that church experience the fulfilment of the prophecy, "In that day shall the Lord of Hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people, and for a Spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment, and for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate." The feeblest and most hidden member of the flock may in this way contribute to adorn and beautify our beloved Society; and it is only in this way that the talents and energies of the strongest and ablest can be made effective.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The annual statement of the Board of Revision of Philadelphia, makes the value of Real and Personal estate of the city, subject to taxation, $5,067,894. The Commissioners have fixed the rate of tax for 1880, at 2 per cent, which is slightly lower than that for the present year.

President Hayes, in a recent speech at Detroit, quoted the words of the prophet, as applicable to the cities and communities and individuals—"Never live beyond your means," and "Pay as you go." He reprobated the practice of creating public debts, as a great and growing evil, the tendency of which is to lead to dishonor and repudiation; and advocated the extinguishment of the national debt.

The annual exportation of animals, oxen and bulls from the United States to Great Britain, has increased in value from $60,000, in 1875, to nearly $6,000,000 in 1878.

A few weeks ago a wealthy man residing near Zanesville, Ohio, died and was buried in a suit of his own clothing. Some important papers belonging to his estate were not discovered until found, although known to exist. After several weeks of ineffectual search in other places, the grave was opened, and the lost papers with others of value were found in a side pocket of his coat.

Disturbance has been received of Indian troubles in New Mexico, caused by the predatory attacks of a small band of Indians, who are said to have killed some herders and run off with part of their stock. It is not supposed that the outbreak will be difficult to quell.

Over 2,000 Massachusetts women have registered their names for voting at school elections. The number is smaller than the advocates of female suffrage had expected. Boston is the only city where the female vote will be large enough to have any effect on the result of the election.

A company has been organized for the construction of a new railroad to Atlantic City, to use the West Jersey Railroad as far as Newfield. The principal object appears to be to accommodate the manufacturing establishments now without railroad facilities. The stock has all been subscribed.

FOREIGN.—The attention of the English has been drawn to the loss of strength incurred by the British Empire by emigration to the United States and other countries not under British control, as is thought desirable to direct the attention of those intending to emigrate to Australia, Canada, New Zealand and other countries belonging to the British Crown.

Cetewayo, the fugitive Zulu king, has been captured by a party of exiles, at the residence of a friend, who fled with his wives and some companions, and the royal cattle. The rumor that these herds were being driven to the junction of the White and Black Nyalovakigwe the British their first clue to his hiding place. They started on a pursuit on the 13th of July with muskets. On the morning of the 15th they arrived at the kraal where he had spent the night. His followers left him one by one. His Prime Minister, two of his sons and three of his brothers surrendered, with 650 head of his cattle. Almost every day since that time he has surrendered to the English. It is said that toward the end of his flight Cetewayo had no more than two or three followers who remained faithful to him. He was captured on the 25th of July, and taken to his residence at Cape Town, and be detained there to await directions from England.

The rebellion in Tonquin is reported to be crushed. In accordance with a barbarous custom, orders had been issued at Peking for the mutilation of three sons of the grandson of Yakoh King, because they were implicated, "although innocently," in the Kashgar rebellion.

Late advices from Afghanistan not only confirm the killing of the British residents at Herat by the Hinduu-oozoo regiments of the Amer, but indicate that there may be further disturbances. A recent publication of the Signal Service gives an account of the hurricane which swept over the Island of Reunion in the Indian Ocean in 3rd month last. The captain of the port, a trained meteorologist, foreseeing the approach of this storm, urged the ships in port, 24 in number, to put to sea. They followed his directions, and all escaped but, whose crews had otherwise were saved. On reaching the island, a storm-wave from the ocean rolled in on the land and thirty-five persons perished.

Africa seems to be on the eve of great changes. The different exploring expeditions which have latterly been sent to the continent, unless their hidden ulterior are likely to be followed by important movements of a commercial and political character. The English are gradually extending their sway from the Cape of Good Hope northward, till now a very large extent of country is subject to the British Crown. Unless their policy should be governed by different principles from the past, we may look for an almost indefinite expansion of their South African empire. At Zanzibar on the east coast, they are about making the first survey of a road from that point to the great lakes of inner Africa. If this can be undertaken, it will open legitimate traffic with those regions and check the abominable slave trade carried on by the Arabs of Zanzibar, it will be a great blessing to that country. France proposes to connect her Algiers provinces with her possessions in Senegal by a line of railroads to open legitimate traffic with the interior, and thence to St. Louis on the coast. A commission has been formed under the presidency of the Minister of Public Works to examine the feasibility of the plan. They are encouraged to hope for success by the report of an unofficial exploring party which went South from Algiers with a large caravan, and found more fertility and population than they expected.

EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary.

DIED, suddenly, at his home in Iowa, His first wife, Mrs. DREW, WARNER ATKINSON, in the 80th year of her age, on the 21st of July, 1878, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the Annual Meeting of Friends at this year. This dear Friend was of a humble and quiet disposition; yet much attached to his doctrines held by our religious Society, and concurred that they might be maintained on the ancient foundation. His example and precept have been a constant and extraordinary aid to the Society, and in any proper use of the means committed to our care. He was a tender father and loving companion, and is therefore much missed by relatives and friends. They have the consoling belief that, as he was faithful over a few things, he has been made ruler over many.

For "The Friend"

Indians under the Care of Friends.

[Knowing the general interest felt by our readers in the Indians of this country, it seems desirable to record in our columns the tabulated table showing the condition of the tribes placed by President Grant under the care of members of our Society, and the progress made in civilization. It is taken from the Tenth Annual Report of the Associated Executive Committee of Friends on Indian Affairs. From the same source we extract the additional information explaining the motives which induced the Committee to resign all official connection with the Indians under the care of the United States government.—Eds.]

Whilst the last report was being printed, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs removed Mahlon H. Newlin from charge of the Agency for Indians in Kansas, so that there remained but four Agencies under our supervision, viz: the Cheyenne and Arapahoe, the Osage, the Sac and Fox, and the Quappaw Agencies.

Upon inquiry it was found that Agent Newlin, with some other Agents nominated by Religious Bodies, had been removed wholly for political reasons. The Secretary of the Interior assured us that in removing Agent Newlin, it escaped his recollection that he was one of the Agents named by us, or it would not have been done without consultation with us. The management of the Agency by Mahlon H. Newlin had been efficient and successful.

This, and other explanations, made by the Department, gave the Committee hope that we could still be useful to the Indians in co-operating with the Department. But in the Fourth Month last, an insubordinate clerk was returned by the Department to service at the Sac and Fox Agency, which was in charge of Agent Levi Woodard, who declined to receive him as an employee, believing him injurious to the best welfare of the Agency. Nearly the same time, Agent H. W. Jones was removed from the Quappaw Agency, without cause assigned in the request for his successor, and it is believed, largely because he had dismissed an employee for gross and notorious immorality, who after removal, was sent back to the Agency by the Commissioner, at a higher salary, to fill another position. This was in contravention of the express assurance of the Commissioner that Agents named by us should have the appointment of their own employees, with our approval. Members of a sub-committee had seen the Commissioner about these points, without being able to obtain any relief. He sustained his appointment, and seemed strongly prepossessed against the Agents.

At the meeting of the Associated Committee held in New York, a Committee was appointed to call upon the Commissioner and endeavor to secure a faithful conformity to the written agreement with President Hayes as to the dismissal of Agents, and also with the Commissioner's own assurance that our Agents could control the appointment of their own employees, except clerks. Otherwise our Agents could not be held responsible for the condition of the Indians at the Agencies.

This Committee had an interview with the Commissioner. He gave us to understand that he would do as he pleased about employees, notwithstanding his former assurance, and distinctly stated that he believed certain infamous charges against our people made by the before-mentioned employee at the Quappaw Agency.

Under the authority given by the Associated Committee, the sub-committee, after careful deliberation, and taking into consideration the whole course of the Indian Office during the period of nearly two years it has been under its present management, believed that no other course was left open but to resign the charge committed to us by the Government.

Repeated interviews with the President had shown that he was not prepared to oblige the Department to carry out the agreement made with us; therefore the Committee called upon President Hayes, Fifth Month 20th, 1879, and respectfully informed him that we could no longer be responsible for Agencies under the official control of Commissioner Hayt, and that we now resigned the charge committed to the Society represented by us. The President expressed his regret, and asked that the resignation be in writing.

It remains to be added, that in addition to the testimony before the Associated Committee at its last meeting, affidavits have been furnished to show that our Agents were clear of the charges made against two of them, and that the management of the Quappaw and Modoc school has been not only irreproachable, but excellent, while the character of the party making most of these charges has been amply proved to be one of the worst, although the trusted witness of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The Citizen Pottawatomes have an interesting history. Gradually moved westward from Ohio, a part of the tribe accepted school education, became farmers, and were made citizens; their large funds in the Government hands were divided among them, and the usual result followed. They quickly lost their farms, squandered most of the money and with the residue, bought land in the Territory, asking permission to go thither and be Indians again. They are farmers, and able to support them-selves. They have had a school opened at government expense, the books and appliances being supplied by Friends.

Among the Cheyennes are about 600 Northern Cheyennes, brought down from Dakota in 1877, and 300 brought in 1878. The history of the desperate attempt of the Dull Knife Band of these Northern Cheyennes to return to their native country, is one of the saddest in Indian Annals. The Agent did his duty. The Indian Department was to blame only so far as that more abundant medicines and rations should have been supplied. The first wrong began in 1874. A military force explored the Black Hills region. Gold was found. A military order was issued against intruders upon the lands. The order was disregarded. The Indian Department sought to buy the lands. Congress would not give enough money. The Indians retaliated upon white intruders. The army came in, and after bloodshed, a treaty was made. Part of the Northern Cheyennes agreed to go South. Part always hesitated. Reaching the Territory, they sickened, as is always the case. Dull Knife's Band numbering about 300 men, women and children, decided to return. They were followed by a military force and attacked. They retaliated by killing forty white settlers. One part reached the Sioux; the rest were taken prisoners, but refused to return to the Indian Territory. An effort was made by the officer in command to reduce them to submission by cold and starvation, and in desperate efforts to escape, they were nearly all killed; the last group of them having been surrounded, and while huddled together in a hollow space to which they fled for safety, shot. God looks down and holds the Nation responsible for the greed of its citizens, and the blood of the natives which cries from the ground.

The Little Chief Band seemed for a time determined to run off North also, but have been pacified by a trip to Washington. With the above exception the affairs of the Agency have been most prosperous.

The Boarding School at the Agency has had 150 pupils. None of the pupils have advanced beyond the first four rules in arithmetic. But they have done admirably in work, which is more important. The boys have planted 145 acres in maize, sorghum and vegetables. The product of the garden of 20 acres, goes to the school. The boys have two thirds of the corn, the remainder goes to the Government for teams and implements furnished. The girls do all kinds of housework. The scholars have a large herd of stock cattle owned and cared for by themselves.

The interest of the Indians in farming is increasing; 175 locations have been chosen, and from 2 to 100 acres ploughed. Forty of these have been fenced, and are cultivated. The Indians put up 400 tons of hay, which was sold chiefly to the Government; and have cut 855 cords of wood, receiving for both, $2178.84. They have made repeated trips to Wichita to bring thence the Agency supplies, for which the Government pays them in wagons and harness. "Little Robe's" Band carry a tri-weekly U. S. Mail from the Agency to the western line of the Indian Territory, on the route for Fort Elliott, Texas, a distance of 165 miles. They have six stations for relays of horses, and receive $135 per month for the service; the mail runs with great exactitude and is satisfactory to the Government.

The Indian police here and at the Osage Agency does admirably. The Cheyenne Indians tried a member of the tribe on a charge of murder, the Agent acting as magistrate. After careful examination, the defendant was acquitted, the Agent concurring.

In looking back over nine years of public service, no instance of intentional fraud by any of the Agents nominated by Friends, appears to have occurred. Charges of this kind, when investigated, have not been sustained. The Indians under our supervision have made much progress in many ways. The statistics appended are referred to for illustration.

The Progress of Civilization among the Indian Tribes in the West under the Care of Friends.

The following table contains the condensed statistics of the Indian tribes, committed by President Grant to the care of the Society of Friends, and covers the period from 1868 to 1875 (both inclusive). From "The British Friend."

Too great a distinction may be drawn between these meetings [for discipline] and those "for worship." We as Friends make no essential distinction here, since we teach that we are ever to be depending upon the Lord, and that there is no time or place in which his presence may not be known. Meetings for business, then, were not intended to differ in spirit from those for the worship of God—worship may be known everywhere, and therefore also in these; nay, more or less, it should be (as above shown), if they are to be good and profitable times. Like the meetings for worship they are held for God's glory, and for the spread of truth. It would be a grave error to think that, as worship has taken place in the first meeting, it is not needed in the second. Yet, by the different frame in which some appear, it would seem as though such an idea was insensibly entertained.

Thomas Chalkley had a deep concern that church meetings should not degenerate, as he no doubt saw them doing from the right standard. "When in your meetings get into a religious exercise and lively concern for God's glory, and your soul's peace and prosperity" (1724). Speaking once at Newgarden, he showed that those who meddled with our discipline in the will, nature, spirit, and wisdom of man only, could do but little service; and that our discipline, as also our worship and ministry, ought to be performed in the wisdom and power of God, through the grace and spirit of Christ. "Wherefore, dear Friends," he further says, "keep close to the Spirit, power, light, and divine life of Christ Jesus, in your Monthly and Quarterly Meetings for the government of the Church, as well as in your meetings for the worship of God."

For "The Friend."

In the piece published in the 4th number of "The Friend," with the heading "Line upon Line," the portion which follows the reference to the journal of Joseph Pike was not intended to be marked as a quotation, as though he had written it with reference to his day; but was meant to apply to the present times, and the quotation therein contained was in reference to those peculiar trials which our Society is now passing through. How encouraging and strong the language, "It is not the will of the Almighty that this people should ever cease to be a people." In connection with this I am inclined to copy a portion of the remarks of James Usher, as mentioned in the preface to Sewel's history: "Look ye be not found in the outward court, but a worshipper in the temple before the altar; for Christ will measure all those that profess his name, and call themselves his people; and the outward worshippers he will leave out, to be trodden down by the Gentiles. The outward court is the formal Christian, whose religion lies in performing the outside duties of Christianity without having an inward life and power of faith and love, uniting them to Christ; and these God will leave to be trodden down and swept away by the Gentiles. But the worshippers within the temple and before the altar, are those who do indeed worship God in Spirit and in truth; whose souls are made his temples, and he is honored and adored in the most inward thoughts of their hearts; and they sacrifice their lusts and vile affections, yea, and their own wills to Him; and these God will hide in the hollow of his hand, and under the shadow of his wings."

So says the eminently gifted and pious Usher; and may it not be queried, what other hope can we have for the renovation and restoration of the back-slidden Protestant churches, than that Almighty goodness will, when the set time to favor Zion is come, "take unto Himself his great power and reign." The declaration is very positive that "The knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea;" but let us remember the reply to those who said "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." Rather let us strive to be "worshippers within the temple and before the altar," and to be of those "whose souls are made his temples, and He is honored and adored in the most inward thoughts of their hearts," and thereby be accounted worthy to partake of the glory which shall follow.

"For The Friend"

Although E. W. officially relinquished his oversight of the Indians in the autumn of 1849, he continued to feel a deep interest in both their spiritual and temporal welfare. He was appointed a member of the Committee for the civilization and improvement of the Indians, by the Yearly Meeting in 1850, and as a member of this committee he frequently visited the Allegheny Reservation. During such visits he not infrequently communicated his views to his friend Joseph Elkinton, by letter. From some of these it is proposed to offer a few extracts:

6th mo. 5th, 1855.

Thou hast reason to think strange of my not writing sooner. I was mercifully favored to get here in safety, and comforted in hearing the Indians had met with but a small loss in their stock, and were suffering but little themselves from the scarcity and high price of provisions. * * * On the 17th I was informed Jos. Pierce and Moses Yellowblanket were sick at Moses Snow's, one of the nearest Indian houses to this place. I went to see them towards evening; Rachel (Whitson) went with me; before I went in I made inquiry in relation to the disease: they thought it was something like inflammation of the lungs. Yellowblanket, they said, was broken out with something like measles or chicken-pox. Joseph had not spoken for twelve hours, and did not appear sensible of what was passing around him. Having heard of the small pox being down the river, and that these two men had been down with lumber, I felt afraid the disease was small pox. I went in but did not go near Yellowblanket; Rachel went nearer to him, looked at his face, and said she thought it might be measles or chicken-pox, but not small pox. Before I went in I endeavored to feel after the propriety of so doing. Thought of how I was exposing myself; from my feelings I was afraid to omit it. I felt concerned on account of the children at the school as well as myself. Thinking it would be a serious matter if the small pox should spread among the Indians, and knowing that a number had been exposed, we thought best to send to Randolph for Dr. Parsons to come and see them. We went on the 18th, he got there on the 19th; said Yellowblanket was a strongly marked case of small pox, and that the other also had it; that he had congestion of the brain, and that he thought he would die; gave directions how Yellowblanket was to be treated, that he was getting along pretty well. Several Indians who lived near, having seen the doctor coming came within a few hundred yards of the house to hear what he called the disease. We told them of their danger, advised all who were not needed to take care of the sick to keep away from the house, and those who attended on them not to go out amongst others to expose them; that those who had been exposed had better be vaccinated again, and the children and others who had not been vaccinated, should be vaccinated soon to prevent the disease from spreading. I promised those who brought victuals for the sick and those who attended on them; they were to leave pans at a certain place, about 150 yards from the house, where I took victuals, and they would come and take it away. They appeared a ood deal alarmed; I also felt distressed. Three families who lived near, moved a quarter of half a mile up the river that evening; the next morning when I went down with one (food), I saw smoke rising from the chimney where the sick people were, called out to no one answered or came in sight; went own near the river and saw an Indian on Vatt's Island; inquired if he knew where Moses Snow was? he said he had gone off up the river; I was also informed that Yellowblanck's wife had provided wood and water, &c., for the night, and with his consent had left the evening before. I was much distressed and tried with such conduct. I followed after Moses and met him and some others; told them it would never do to run off and leave those sick men to die for want of proper care; that Moses and Yellowblanck's wife had been sufficiently exposed to take the disease if they would take it at all; that they could not run away from it, that they were among the Indians. Yellowblanck's wife only exposing others. Yellowblanck's wife returned before I got back, and Moses also got home; they did not afterwards desert them. I felt much for poor Moses and the woman. Jos. Pierce died; Moses and Jane buried him; we had a coffin made of pine boards, carried it near to the house and opened a grave. It was a pretty serious time for a few days. I did not know what my own lot might be or how much it might spread among the Indians. Yellowblanck had been vaccinated, and his case was a light one. There has not been any new case, and I hope will not be. I have felt a secret hope it might all work together for our good. James and Jos. Watt's house was burned down on the 26th, and all they had in it consumed. In addition to their beds and bedding, their best wearing clothes, &c., they lost some corn and potatoes; James said there was $3 in money burned. Some of the Indians say they will assist them, as provisions are very high. Peter Crouse told me they were going to write on to Onondaga for some assistance from them (the Watt family are Onondagas.) I told them I approved of what they proposed doing. They wished to know if we would be willing to give something. I told them I would write to the Committee on the subject, and encouraged them to do all they could to help themselves; to get in logs and have them sawed and put themselves up a good frame house, not to spend their time and money in building shanties. James at first seemed cast down and discouraged, but he has since become more encouraged, and said he would try to get some logs to the mill as soon as they got done planting. I think the Indians will assist them in cutting and getting the logs to the mill. Perhaps it would not be improper for me to say, I do not know any way the committee or individuals could assist them better than to pay the expense of sawing a few thousand feet of lumber and buying them some nails. This might encourage them to persevere in putting up a good frame house, and serve as an example to others. I do not like this thing of begging to make up every little loss, or in any way to encourage habits of idleness, but where persons have met with pretty heavy losses, a little assistance may serve as an encouragement to them. * * The sickness, assisting some in the school, and helping on the farm, have prevented me from getting out much amongst the Indians. I have embraced opportunities when presented of encouraging them to attend to their business, and get in as much seed as they could. They say they have got in about as much as usual. I think there is an improvement in some; they are as friendly and willing to hear advice as I have seen them for a long time. * * *

Sincerely thy friend,

Six Months in Ascension.

The first view of Ascension is thus described: "A few scattered buildings lay among reddish-brown cinders near the shore—a sugar-loaf hill of the same color rose up behind and bounded the view. We looked about in a sort of hopeless way for 'Green Mountain,' but it was nowhere to be seen, and we set it down as a fable—a mere myth. 'Nothing green,' we said, 'exists, or could exist here.' Stones, stones, everywhere stones, that have been tried in the fire and are now heaped about in dire confusion, or beaten into dust which we see dancing in pillars before the wind. Dust, sunshine, and cinders, and low yellow houses frizzling in it all!

"Is that Ascension?"

"Well, not quite; its coast presented a livelier scene, though one that we would gladly have dispensed with. A black perpendicular wall of rock jutted out into the bay, and on either side of it a stretch of white glistening sand swept to north and south. It is on this rock that the 'Tartar Stairs' are cut, and here we must land. But how? For this morning beautiful waves are dashing and crashing and splashing against the landing-place, or rubbing past it in sportive fury to break into leathery foam on the pretty beach, which looks like a dainty white ribbon trampled under foot of these mad sea-monsters.

"The rollers are in! 'What lovely waves!"

"What a hideous place! were the ejaculatory remarks we heard drop from the ladies leaning over the ship's side. My heart grew heavy. But seeing H.M.S.S. Cygnet and Industry in the harbor, I took courage, knowing that we should at least find refuge on board one of these vessels, and that we should not have to be carried on to Madeira,—a misfortune which has more than once happened to passengers roller-stayed at Ascension.

"There were besides several little heaving boats in the bay, and one could not but wonder at their audacity in playing so unconcernedly with the mighty giants that tossed them about, each in turn, as one after one rushed headlong to the shore. While watching this scene, we saw a gig put off from the Cygnet, and pull towards us. 'An offer of hospitality,' we thought, as we recognised the blue-jackets, our oarsmen and their commander, whose acquaintance we had made at St. Helena.

"Can we land?" was our greeting to Capt. Hammick, as he came on board. "Well, the flags denoting "Double-rollers and Dangerous" are up on the pier-head, but the sea is going down, and I have permission for you to try it, if you don't mind wet feet." We didn't; so it was decided that I and the heavy baggage should be sent on shore at once, while the chronometers and more precious goods! should wait for quieter times on board the Industry, where the captain, in the kindest manner, had prepared his cabin for us in anticipation of our not being able to land.

"I don't know how the heavy baggage liked it, but I certainly wished myself [with the] chronometers more than once, when I saw, rising up behind us, a long wall of threatening water, and before us, the steep, dark rock, wet with spray. This feeling increased when we were within a few yards of the shore, and I found that we must get out of the strong trustworthily-looking gig, manned by its stout crew of English sailors, and trust ourselves to a little rocky cackle-shell, which was at that moment being baled out by two ebony-colored boatmen. I thought, just then, they looked fiendish, and that I could see the baleful eye of a shark, certain of his prey, gleaming triumphantly through the green waves. But since then I have come to the conclusion that our boatmen were very benign, gentle-faced Africans, and my shark—a jelly-fish!

"You may trust yourself with every confidence to these men, Capt. Hammick said to me; 'they understand the rollers better than anybody else; they will not take you into danger, only you must be careful not to attempt landing until they give you the word.'

"For some minutes we kept lodging about, and once or twice were close under the steps; but we got no sign to stir, and were again and again driven back.

"At last, there came suddenly a perfectly calm moment, immediately after an unusually heavy roller had tossed our little boat over its head, and we were again sculled under the rock in the twinkling of an eye. A rope was let down from above; David at once laid hold of it, and at the word 'Now!' he jumped from the boat. I instantly followed his example, and thus gained a slippery footing on Ascension, with a somewhat palpitating heart and eyes smarting with salt spray."

To these rollers frequent references are made, and our author copies the following account of them given by another observer:

"One of the most interesting phenomena that the island affords is that of the rollers, in other words a heavy swell, producing a high surf on the leeward shore of the island, occurring without any apparent cause. All is tranquil in the distance, the sea breeze scarcely ruffles the surface of the water, when a high swelling wave is suddenly observed rolling towards the island. At first it appears to move slowly forward, till at length it breaks on the outer reefs. The swell then increases, wave urges on wave until it reaches the beach, where it bursts with tremendous fury. The rollers now set in and augment in violence until they attain a terrific and awful grandeur, affording a magnificent sight to the spectator, and one which I have witnessed with mingled emotions of terror and delight—a towering sea rolls forward on the island like a vast range of waters, threatening, as it were, to envelope it, pile on pile succeeds with resistless force, until, meeting with the rushing offset from the shore beneath, they rise like a wall and are dashed with impetuous fury on the long line of the coast, producing a stunning noise. Amid the tranquillity which prevails around, it is a matter of speculation to account for this commotion of the waters, as great as if the most awful tempest or the wildest hurricane had swept the bosom of the deep. It occurs in situations where no such swell would be expected, in sheltered bays, and where the wind never reaches the shore. The strong and well-built jetty of the town has once been washed away by the rollers, which sometimes make a complete breach over it, although it is twenty feet above high water-mark."

A Pennsylvania Geyser.—The Kane Geyser Well is located in McKean County, Pa., four miles southeast of the "Summit Summer Resort," at Kane, Pa. This well was drilled for petroleum in the spring of 1878 to a total depth of 2000 feet. No oil was found in paying quantities, and the well was abandoned, since which time it has been throwing periodically—ten to fifteen minutes—a column of water and gas to a height varying from 100 to 150 feet. Charles A. Ashburner, assistant in charge of the survey of McKean County for the geological survey, has made study of the "Geyser Well," and has furnished the following facts: During the operations of drilling, a number of fresh "water veins" were encountered down to a depth of 364 feet. All of this water was shut off by a cast-iron casing 5½ inches in diameter, which was inserted in the six-inch hole to the requisite depth. Thus the hole was kept free from water during the after drilling. At a depth of 1415 feet a very heavy "gas vein" was struck. After the well was deserted from failure to find oil, the iron casing was withdrawn from the hole and the fresh water permitted to flow in on top of the gas. Here the conflict between nature's elements commenced, which has made this well one of the most interesting natural phenomena in Pennsylvania. The water flows into the well on top of the gas until the pressure of the confined gas becomes greater than the weight of the superincumbent water, when an expulsion takes place and a column of water and gas is thrown out of the well. This occurs at present every thirteen minutes, and the spouting continues one and a half minutes. On the evening of July 31st, A. W. Steafer measured two columns which went to a height respectively 120 and 125 feet. Last Saturday night C. A. Ashburner measured four columns in succession and the water was thrown to the following heights: 108, 132 and 138 feet. During the time that the columns are thrown out of the well the gas is thoroughly mixed up with the water and is readily ignited. The sight after nightfall is grand beyond description. The antagonistic elements of water and fire are so promiscuously blended that each seems to be fighting for the mastery. At one moment the flame is almost entirely extinguished only to burst forth at the next instant with increased energy and greater brilliancy. In winter the columns become encased in ice and form a huge translucent chimney.—Public Ledger.

Source of True Unity.—9th mo. 1st, 1775. This evening my heart was filled with the love of God, under the influence whereof ardent desires were begotten in my soul, that the little handful of Friends heretofore might draw nearer and nearer, and how in holy awfulness and reverential fear before the great Shepherd of Israel; undoubtedly believing, that were this enough the case, we should witness in a much greater degree, the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; which would cement us together in that divine harmony, wherein we should become as an army with banners, and as a royal diadem in the hand of our God.—J. Scott.

WHAT THE SPARROW CHIRPS.

William Cullen Bryant.

I am only a little sparrow,
A bird of low degree;
My life is of little value,
But the dear Lord careth for me.

He gave me a coat of feathers
It is very plain, I know,
With never a speck of crimson,
For it was not made for show.

But it keeps me warm in winter,
And it shields me from the rain;
Were it bordered with gold or purple,
Perhaps it would make me vain.

By and by when the spring-time cometh,
I will build me a little nest,
With many a chirp of pleasure,
In the spot I like the best.

And He will give me wisdom
To build it of leaves most brown;
Warm and soft it must be for my birdsie,
And so I will line it with down.

I have no barn or storehouse,
I neither sow nor reap;
God gives me a sparrow's portion,
But never a seed to keep.

If my nest is sometimes scanty,
Close pecking makes it sweet;
I have always enough to feed me,
And "life is more than meat."

I know there are many sparrows,
All over the world we are found,
But our Heavenly Father knoweth
When one of us falls to the ground.

Though small, we are never forgotten;
Though weak, we are never afraid;
For we know that the dear Lord keepeth
The life of the creatures He made.

I fly through the thickest forests,
I light on many a spray;
I have no chart nor compass,
But I never lose my way.

And I fold my wings at twilight,
Wherever I happen to be;
For the Father is always watching,
And no harm will come to me.

I am only a little sparrow,
A bird of low degree;
But I know the Father loves me,
And have you less faith than I see?

UNDER THE SHADOW OF THE ALMIGHTY.

Under the shadow of his wings;

Oh sweetest rest!
Thou canst not find in any, an hiding-place
So safe as in the Father's arms of grace;

He calls them blest
Who find in the joy his promise brings.

There is no other resting place,
My soul, so dear;
The shadow of his wings is great and wide,
And yet so near it draws thee to his side,

So very near,
'Tis like a glimpse of his loved face.

Under the shadow of his wings;

Oh who may stay?
They who find rest within his secret place,
They who find joy but in his own rich grace,

And only they
May know the joy the shadow brings.

For joy, not born of earthly things,
Fills all the place;
Come near, my soul, come closer, closer still,
See! thou art shielded now from every ill,—
Rest in God's grace,

Under the shadow of his wings.

If you imitate not the life of Christ, you cannot be saved by his death.—Wm. Penn.

In 1832, he published a volume of his poems, which were favorably received in Great Britain, where Bryant has since been regarded by high authorities as the sweetest of American singers, though not so widely read as several of his countrymen. "Others," said a critic of that day, "have sung the beauties of creation, and the greatness of God; but no one ever observed external things more closely, or transferred his impressions to paper in more vivid colors."

A large part of the life of the poet's time was spent in the daily routine of editorial duties, and as a traveller in every part of the globe. But "the most beautiful part of his life is that quiet homo-enjoyment of books and nature that opened a perennial fountain of youth in his mind and heart. A few hours in the office of The Post each day brought him in contact with the business of his profession, but his cares were easily laid aside when he took his departure from the scene of labor.

In 1845, before his second European tour, Bryant purchased an estate lying along Hempstead Harbor, on Long Island, far enough from the metropolis to be a secluded country residence, yet not so far as to make access to his business difficult. The building upon it was an old-time square structure, built in 1787 by a plain Quaker, and contained large old-fashioned rooms. In 1846, after his second return from Europe, Bryant remodelled the house to suit his own tastes, adding lattices to the porches for clambering vines, and building bay-windows for the sake of the landscape. Outbuildings of a picturesque form and grouping were erected, and choice shade and fruit trees were planted in the grounds. The hamlet near by he named 'Roslyn.' But the estate itself he called 'Cedar-mere,' and by this name it is now known.

"His library was choice, though large for a private collection. It embraced standard authorities in every branch of general knowledge, and was especially rich in works on theology and economic science. In polite literature, particularly poetry, it was even more complete. The ancient classics in the best editions stood on the shelves, with the masterpieces of French, German, Spanish, and Italian letters. In all these languages Bryant read much, and some of his translations show how well.

"Elegance, however, never took the place of comfort in the poet's household. The large, well-ventilated rooms, and the open grates, are suggestive of the same regard for hygienic laws in the household economy that was displayed in his own personal dress and habits.

"After the marriage of his daughter to Parke Godwin, his family consisted of his wife and his daughter Julia, who continued to brighten his home during his entire lifetime.

"Although he also had a New York residence, and finally came into possession of the homestead at Cummington, the rural retreat at Roslyn was for the remainder of his life his favorite home; and there he spent most of the time, except during the months of winter. These were passed in the city. Cedar-mere, however, will always be known as Bryant's home. There he found the retirement, and fellowship with Nature, that were his chief pleasures; there he kept the most valuable of his books; there he continued to write his poems to the last years of life.

"The coming of spring, when he might leave the crowded city and visit the country-side, was always a glad season for him. His joy at its return finds expression more than once, but especially in those lines to his daughter, entitled 'An Invitation to the Country':—

"Already, close by our summer dwelling,
The Easter sparrow repeats her song;
A merry warbler, she chides the blossoms,—
The little blossoms that sleep so long.

The bluebird chants from the elms long branches
A hymn to welcome the budding year;
The south wind wanders from field to forest,
And softly whispers, "The Spring is here!"

Come, daughter mine, from the gloomy city,
Before these joys from the stars have ceased;
The violet breathes by our door as sweetly
As in the air of her native East.

* * * * *
There is no glory in star or blossom
Till looked upon by a loving eye;
And there is no fragrance in April breezes
Till breathed with joy as they wander by.

Come, Julia dear; for the sprouting willows,
The opening flowers, and the gleaming brooks,
And hollows, green in the sun, are waiting
Their dower of beauty from thy glad looks!"

The winter of 1858 was passed in Italy; and while there Bryant suffered a severe trial in the protracted illness of his wife, whose life was threatened by a low fever. Her final restoration to health was celebrated in a song of gladness and triumph, dated at Castellamare, 5th mo. 1858, under the title "The Life That Is":—

"Thou who so long hast pressed the couch of pain,
Oh, welcome welcome back to life's free breath,—
To life's free breath and day's sweet light again,
From the chill shadows of the gate of death!

For thou hadst reached the twilight found between
The world of spirits and this grosser sphere:
Dinly by thee the things of earth were seen,
And faintly fell earth's voices on thine ear.

And now how gladly we behold, at last,
The wonted smile returning to thy brow!
The very wind a low whisper, breathing past
In the light leaves, is music to thee now."

Twice wert thou given me: once in thy fair prime,
Fresh from the fields of youth, when first we met,
And all the blossoms of that hopeful time
Clustered and glowed where'er thy steps were set.

And now, in thy ripe autumn, once again
Given back to fervent prayers and yearnings strong,
From the drear realm of sickness and of pain,
Where we had watched and feared and trembled long.

Now may we keep thee from the balmy air
And radiant waves of heaven a little space,
Where He who went before thee to prepare
For his meek followers shall assign thy place."

Early in the summer Bryant and his family passed through the cities of Northern Italy to England, and in the 8th month returned to their home at Roslyn, after an absence of more than a year. The letters written to The Post during this period were collected in a volume, and published in the following year under the title of "Letters from Spau and other countries."

"In the summer of 1866 the great shadow of Bryant's life fell upon him. His devoted wife, whose benign presence had for forty-five years illuminated his home, whose prudence had laid the foundation of his fortune, whose piety had filled him with spiritual aspirations, whose companionship had cheered him in foreign lands, was called to "the radiant walks of heaven." The bereaved poet could not think of her as absent; and when the calm, sweet sunshine fell upon the grassy mound where she was laid, he wrote,—

"May we not think that near us thou dost stand
With loving ministrations? for we know
Thy heart was never happy when thy hand
Was forced its tasks of mercy to forego.
Marry thou not prompt with every coming day
The generous aim and act, and gently win
Our restless, wandering thoughts to turn away
From every treacherous path that ends in sin?
"But the bright illusion could not satisfy his longing. A better faith drew his thoughts and desires to a higher sphere, and he later he wrote the sweet sad verses, in the poem called 'A Lifetime':—

"And well I know that a brightness
From his life has passed away,
And a smile from the green earth's beauty,
And a glory from the day.

But I behold above him,
In the far blue depths of air,
Din battlements shining faintly,
And a throng of faces there;
See over crystal barrier
The airy figures bend
Like those who are watching and waiting
The coming of a friend.
And one there is among them,
With a star upon her brow,
In her life a lovely woman,
A sinless seraph now.

I know the sweet calm features,
The peerless smile I know;
And I stretch my arms with transport
From where I stand below.

And the quick tears down my eyelids;
But the airy figures fade,
And the shining battlements darken,
And blend with the evening shade.

I am gazing into the twilight,
Where the dim-seen meadows lie;
And the wind of night is swaying
The trees with a heavy sigh."

"Though crushed in spirit by the heavy blow, the venerable man indulged in no bitter misanthropy or childish lamentations. With a brave and resolute heart he strove to live the strong, manly life that has held up to the world as an ideal in the last paragraph of "Thanatopsis":—

"Sustained and soothed by an unflinching trust."

"It is Written."—It is said the late Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, was strongly opposed to total abstinence, and his side-board was loaded with brandy, wine, &c. On one occasion, Perkins, of the Sons of Temperance, dined with the bishop, who, pouring out a glass of wine, desired him to drink with him.

"Can't do it, bishop." "Wine is a mocker."
"Take a glass of brandy, then."
"Can't do it, bishop." "Strong drink is raging."

By this time the bishop, becoming somewhat excited, remarked to Perkins, "You'll pass the deacon to the gentleman next to you!"

"No, bishop, I can't do that. 'Woe unto him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips!'"

"I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me," said a little boy, looking thoughtfully at his shaggy friend; he always looks so pleased to mind, and I don't.

Going into Mourning.

(To the Editor of The Friend.)

Dear Friend,—The Society of Friends was, I believe, the first religious body to enter its protest against the practice of "wearing finery" for the dead. It has been observed with regret by those who still act up to the belief of our early members that now, when the public are beginning to see more and more the uselessness and inconsistency of wearing mourning, our own Society is gradually falling into the very thing which the early Friends condemned as being not only unnecessary, but at variance with all right feelings at a time of death.

"He mourns the dead
Who lives as they desire," and the buying of new wearing apparel is not the best way of showing respect for a deceased relative or friend, but is too often the means of turning the thoughts of those who mourn from the right direction.

Some may think I have expressed myself too strongly; but, while respecting the opinions of those who differ, I have simply put the case before my fellow-readers as it appears to me. I sincerely hope that our Society will take up this question in earnest.

HENRY A. DELL.

Have we the appearance of Christians?—I asked a man who, when I last met him, ten years ago, was alive in religion, how he was getting along. Said he, in surprise, "Do you not see? I am getting along about as I look." His face had a bloated, sensual expression, that he well knew a Christian's does not have. Has your face the spiritual, healthy, fresh appearance of one whose appetites and passions are governed by reason and the word of God? Is your dress modest, your bearing humble, your aspect serene, your conversation chaste and kind? Or does the show of your countenance witness against you? Does it tell of late hours, of sensual indulgence? Does your breath stink with tobacco, and are you seen in public places, smoking and joking, and entering with evident zest into the enjoyment of worldly pleasures? Does your conversation spontaneously run off into discussions about horses, politics, and the popular amusements of the day? Are you conformed to the world in your dress, and do you seek display? If your general appearance and life is of the latter kind, we will inquire no farther. It is not necessary. If you were ever converted, you are evidently backslidden from God.—B. T. Roberts.

It is a blessed thing for a man to know within himself, and from a living experience to be able to say, as one of old did, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Such are witnesses of the truth of those sayings of Christ Jesus, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my Father's hand." It is as this voice is heard, obeyed and followed, that a leading out of that state, where the wants are, is witnessed, into the green pastures, where the true and safe feeding is; where the lying down in the valley is; where none can make afraid; where the bread is sure and the water never fails. And this I testify, all that do not hear and obey this heavenly voice of the true Shepherd, are goats and swine, and not sheep; let them profess what they will, they feed upon husks, and are wandering in the dry places, and upon the barren mountains where the wants are; and the green pastures of life and salvation they are strangers to.—William Sheeuen.

Religious Items, &c.

Religious Itinerary.—In a recent number of the Christian Standard [Methodist] the editor states his intention, in company with a few others, to start on a religious journey round the world, setting out early in the summer of next year. He clearly states the governing motive of the trip to be a belief that he is making of the Lord to undertake it, and that it does not originate from any desire to travel or to enjoy the pleasures of sight-seeing. While acknowledging that he has no means at command to defray his own travelling expenses, he says: "Our business is to make what preparations we can, and be ready at the proper time to start on our journey, leaving the question of 'scrip and purse' to be provided for by Him at whose bidding we deem it our duty to go."

He proposes to spend some three months in England, Ireland and Scotland, then proceed to Rome and thence to India, where three more months will be required. Six weeks are to be allotted to Australia; and the homeward route will be via California, Salt Lake City, &c. The whole tour will probably occupy about one year. As to a plan of operations, he states, "we must frankly answer we have none except the general one, to go where, when and as the Lord may direct, and his people may open our way."

Behavior at time of worship.—The Primitive Christian (German Baptist) condemns the practice of those who find themselves early at places for worship, entering into general conversation. It says "if they feel the spirit of devotion and worship already kindled in their hearts, they will not be likely to want to talk about worldly things. And if they do not feel the spirit of worship, they should labor to feel it, and to converse about worldly subjects is by no means a good way to obtain it."

"All Christians should seek to cultivate the spirit of secret devotion, and of holy meditation and musing. Then in the stillness of their hearts they may worship God greatly to their edification."

A correspondent in the same paper asks whether any feel called upon to be thankful to the Lord "for the privilege of smoking the poisonous weed," when they put a cigar in their mouths. The tenor of his remarks evidently indicates that he regards the use of tobacco as one of the things that no blessing rests upon.

The Primitive Christian says: "Where are we drifting?" is the question now being discussed among the Friends. Of late there is being manifested among them a great looseness in order and discipline, and as a result they are drifting away from their long cherished and very commendable principles of plainness. If this disposition is encouraged and continued, they will soon lose their identity as a people.

A Christian place of worship has lately been built on a hill near Jabra, India, by native Christian masons, carpenters, and other artisans, and these workmen were originally thieves by profession. In consequence of having become Christians, they have not only forsaken their evil ways, but learned their various trades.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Strud-Fields and Shell-Heaps.—The aboriginal relics found in Monmouth and Middlesex counties in New Jersey, the scene of my explorations for the past two years, are most abundant in the places locally known as "blown sand-fields." Most of these fields have been under cultivation but are now, for the greater part, entirely abandoned. These spots are peculiar and invariably attract the observer's eye, being totally different in appearance from the surrounding surface; the sand or top soil having been blown away leaves a bare, barren spot nearly destitute of vegetation, strewn with broken pebbles, generally of small size, many showing the former action of fire, and frequently in regular piles or heaps. Amid these heaps or in their immediate vicinity, the soil frequently presents a carbonized appearance, much darker in color than that adjacent to it.

Scattered over these areas are found the various kinds of implements, clippings and fragments frequently interspersed with clam and oyster shells, when the locality is upon a stream flowing into the coast bays or inlets. These sites of aboriginal villages or camping grounds are numerous in the two counties mentioned and, having explored more than forty of them where the "finds" were most abundant, scattered over areas of from one to six hundred acres, I have made a large collection, and many interesting observations. Nearly all the chipped and polished stone implements known to archaeologists of this section are found in these sand fields; also, some of shell and many made of the whorl of the Pyrala, but those implements and ornaments of copper, found in other parts of the United States, are rare here, though occasionally found, while as far as I am aware, those of bone are entirely wanting. Fragments of pottery, some of which show profuse ornamentation, are very numerous and indicate, in some instances, vessels of a large size, as much as twelve inches in diameter. The chipped implements are, for the greater part, made of Jasper and a Basaltic stone, neither of which are found in situ anywhere in this part of the State. It may be of interest to note here that I have in my cabinet a lozenge-shaped stone of Cathine (red Pipe-stone), neatly perforated, found near the village of English-town in Monmouth county, 1100 miles from its quarry!

In comparing the specimens gathered from different places great differences are to be noted; a finely made arrowhead as hard and sharp as when it left its maker's hand, will be found lying upon the surface in company with a rude one of the consistency of chalk, one that needs to be handled with the greatest care for its preservation, literally a decayed stone. Again, some places will furnish the majority of its arrowheads and spear points of a particular pattern. Generally the simple stemmed variety is the most common, though in one sand field the predominating style of arrow points is bifurcated base, barbed and beautifully serrated.

Near Old Bridge, Middlesex Co., along the line of the Old Camden & Amboy R. R., near the South River, is one field strewn with fragments and flakes and a fair representation of the usual "finds," but not one arrowhead less than a half-mile away in another sand field they were numerous. In the field characterized by the absence of arrowheads, gathered on an area of 900 square feet, fifty six broken spear heads of large size and good workmanship; ten of them were the pointed ends and forty-two the stemmed, thirty-four were of one mineral. No perfect spear heads were found among the broken ones. One of the most prolific spots in New Jersey is Spotswood, ten miles from Old Bridge, and also near Freehold, Monmouth Co. More than 400 perfect implements have been collected from an area of about an acre. Along the head waters of the Manogwag River are three sites or camping grounds of the Delaware Indians, all on the border of the extensive forest region known as the "Southern Pines"; they are not more than two miles apart.

Implements are frequently found en masse. Most of these caches are rude looking flakes but one instance that came under my observation is a marked exception. These were unearthed at 18 inches from the surface, and when made acquainted with the fact, more than two years after, I found there 64 of them in perfect condition, averaging 5 inches in length by 3 in breadth, well executed, and evidently completed; there were originally many more.

There are many shell-heaps of aboriginal origin along our coast, but few of them reward the seeker with anything except a few shippings, and in many even they are wanting. The shell heap near Keyport, described by Prof. Ran, Smithsonian Report, 1864, p. 370, is an exception, and is the only one in this vicinity, as far as I am aware, that can be called a genuine Kjöckkenmønde; the material having been made by the Indians in casting away the valves of the shell fish after stringing or otherwise preparing them to carry back to their more permanent habitations in the interior; for our State was traversed by well defined trails leading from the Delaware to oyster producing inlets of the Shrewsbury, Squam and other streams. One of these heaps near Tackerton, known as the "Hummock," has its base upon the Salt Meadows, a half-mile from the firm land, and is very conspicuous as it can be seen from out at sea; it is a solid mass of clam shells (Venus Mercenaria). 11 feet high, 25 feet long and an average width of 6 feet; upon the top are growing several red cedars six inches in diameter, no whole shells could be found and but a few entire valves; they all showing the marks of having been opened with a rude instrument. This has been opened several times, and tons of shells carted away, but not a chipping or fragment of pottery has been seen, though it is of undoubted aboriginal origin, and upon the main land opposite and a half mile away, ground axes, celts, and other implements have been found.—C. F. Woolley in The American Antiquarian.

Chickadee, Downy Woodpecker and Goldfinch.—A part of the interest that attaches to the Chickadee, the most noted and familiar of our winter birds, is proof that song is not necessary to make the voice of a bird agreeable. All his notes are pleasant, and there is a great variety of them, but they are not measured or continuous. Their principal charm is derived from their association with the cheerful habits and sylvan habitats of this bird, his lively motions and interesting ways.

The call note, from which he derives his name, is one of the most animated sounds that can be imagined. Chickadee-dee-dee is sure to be uttered, at irregular intervals of two or three minutes, by each individual of any small scattered flock that may be assembled near our windows.

Chickadees do not forage in compact flocks, like the sparrows and other granivorous birds, whose food, consisting of the seeds of grasses and other herbs, is distributed profusely over almost every open field. The food of Chickadees being almost wholly of insects and their eggs and chrysalids, which are lodged upon the wood and bark of trees, is not abundant in any place and can be obtained only by diligent search. Chickadees are therefore obliged to scatter like woodpeckers, because their food is scattered. We very rarely see more than two or three of them on a tree at the same time. Their dispersion, however, is not the result of any concerted arrangement among the birds. They naturally pursue that course that is attended with the most success.

Yet, though never associated in large companies, they do not like to be alone. While busy in their search for insects, they frequently utter the cry of chickadee, as boys will halloo, when a party of them are scattered over a whortleberry pasture. This cry, if heard, is immediately answered by other birds of the scattered flock. These calls and responses serve to notify them of each other's presence. If there should be no answer, the bird immediately flies to another tree, and repeats his call, till he hears a reply and is assured of the nearness of his comrades. Woodpeckers are much less noisy. They do not need so many notes of greeting and assurance, because their frequent hammering upon the trees answers a similar purpose. Nature bestows on birds and other animals only just such an amount of language as their wants and circumstances require.

It is said we hear the notes of the Chickadee any where near the woods without discovering the Downy Woodpecker somewhere in the vicinity, distinguishing him by his speckled plumage, his scarlet crown, and his sudden and rapid movements. In the lonely season of winter, birds of similar habits have a general inclination to associate for mutual protection; they are cheered by hearing the voices of others around them. But there seems to be a sort of affinity between the small Woodpeckers, the Creepers and the Chickadees. They do not join company, but they keep in hearing of one another from a sociable feeling, of which they probably have not less than the gregarious species.

A singular habit of the Downy Woodpecker, and one with which all are familiar, is that which has gained him the name of "Sapsucker." He bores little round holes just round the bark of the tree, usually an apple tree, not penetrating into the wood of the branch. These holes form a complete circle round the branch of the tree, about half an inch apart. Our farmers were formerly very cautious of these little Sapsuckers, considering their practice injurious to the health of the trees. A long series of observations has proved to be harmless.

The gregarious habits of certain species of birds, and the more solitary habits of others are the necessary consequence of their different ways of feeding. The insect-eaters among land birds are seldom associated in flocks; but they are fond of company, and do not like to be alone. The granivorous birds on the other hand with a few exceptions are gregarious. Such are the English Sparrows and our Snow-buntings; and it is remarkable that the Bob-links, which feed on insects during their breeding season at the North, are never seen in flocks till the autumn, when they are changed into Rice-birds, and feed exclusively on seeds.

It is not every species of seed-eaters that assemble in compact flocks. The American Gold-finch, or Thistle-bird, and nearly all the Finches are examples. In grass fields that have not been gleaned, a large flock of Buntings would find ample materials for any single repast. But Gold-finches must scatter, because the hemp, thistles and other compound plants that afford them subsistence are distributed unequally, and seldom cover a whole field.

The Gold-finch stays as late as he can obtain a good supply of food. His song is very melodious. They have a singular habit of singing as it were in concert. This takes place only in the spring, before the birds have built their nests—probably before they have mated. While chattering together upon a tree, where a company of them have assembled, as soon as they perceive the approach of a new comer, especially if it be a female, they raise a simultaneous shout of song.

The cries of all birds, as well as of other animals, serve undoubtedly a definite purpose in their economy. There is a purpose in all their notes and cries. Birds in general utter very similar cries when they are captured; and it is remarkable that courageous animals make a louder noise, when they are seized, than those of a timid species. There is no quadruped more courageous than the hog in its wild state. The instinct of this animal causes the whole herd to run to the protection of any one of its species when it is in danger, and the instinct of self preservation causes the victim, when captured, to yell and make the loudest outcries. Birds in general are more resolute in defending any of their number, when attacked, than quadrupeds, and are consequently more vociferous when they fall into the clutches of a foe.—W. Pliny in Atlantic Monthly.

Thomas Story's Visit to Boston Common, in 1699.—The next day, accompanied by some Friends—we went to Boston: near which, on a green, we observed a pair of gallows; and being told that was the place where several of our Friends had suffered death for the Truth, and had been there thrown into a hole, we rode a little out of the way to see it; which was a kind of pit near the gallows, and full of water; but two posts at each end, which had been set there by means of Edward Shippen of Philadelphia, a reputable Friend, formerly of Boston; who would have erected some more lasting monument there, with leave of the magistrates, but they were not willing; since it would too frequently and long bring to remembrance that great error of their ancestors, which could not now be repaired; so that he had only leave to put down those posts, to keep the place in remembrance, till something further might be done, at a time when it might be less obnoxious.

While we sat on horseback by the pit, we were drawn into right silence, by the awful, yet life-giving presence of the Lord; which there graciously and unexpectedly visited us together and tendered us; which so raised our minds, though in deep humility before the Lord, over that evil spirit which murdered our friends, (yet too much alive in Boston), that, for my own part, the inhabitants were no more than as the dust in the streets as we rode through among them. And though they gazed upon us with looks denoting the old Apollyon yet alive in them; yet we could see them as far below that Divine Truth we faced them in, as the earth is the heavens; remembering that where Truth hath suffered, Truth will triumph in all the faithful, and will arise one day in glory, to the utter condemnation, shame and confusion of all his enemies.

But though I, for one, rode into the town, in this inward and holy triumph; yet, in a short time, I felt myself so inwardly weak and cast down, that I was as the dirt under the feet of all; so that I could not look even their children in the face for a time. But being raised again by the Truth into my former condition, I then perceived that the state of triumph I had been in, represented to me the state of glory which the Lord Jesus and his saints, with those our Friends and others, are now in; and that low state represented the condition of the Seed of life in that people, still suffering under all.—T. Story.

TENTH MONTH 4, 1879.

Samuel Bowmas relates that when he was a young man, he was accustomed to attend meetings for worship, but derived little benefit therefrom, except being kept out of bad company. He says, "One First day being at meeting, a young woman named Anne Wilson was there and preached. She was very zealous, and I fixing my eye upon her, she, with a great zeal, pointed her finger at me, uttering these words with much power: 'A traditional Quaker, thou comest to meeting as thou went from it the last time, and goest from it as thou came to it, but art no better for thy coming; what wilt thou do in the end?' This was so suited to my condition, that, like Saul, I was smitten to the ground, but turning my thoughts inward, in secret, I cried, 'Lord, what shall I do to help it?' And a voice as it were spoke in my heart, saying, 'Look unto me, and I will help thee.'

Alas! how many among us in this day, are like Samuel Bowmas, only traditional Quakers. Some of us live moral, reputable lives, attend our meetings, are even interested in the concerns of our religious Society, and listen with satisfaction to the lively preaching of the Gospel by qualified instruments; but we are not brought under deep religions concern for our own salvation, we know not what it is to wrestle earnestly with the Lord for his blessing, as if our very lives were at stake, we feel little of that spiritual travail for the souls of our fellow-mortals, of which our Holy Redeemer has set us such a glorious example, and we are not sufficiently in the practice of bringing ourselves often during every day in feeling into the Divine presence, and there having all within us hushed into holy reverence before Him who is the Author of our existence, and who alone can prepare us for the enjoyment of Heavenly pleasures.

Each succeeding day finds those no better than we were before, and apparently not much worse, and we are led that they are becoming more and more settled in a state of ease and security, having the form of godliness but destitute of the vital power. Oh that that language might be sounded with awakening force in the heart of every one of this class, "What wilt thou do in the end?" and that like Samuel Bownas, they might be "snitten to the ground," and made to cry in earnestness and sincerity, "Lord, what shall I do to help it?"

He who raises in the heart of the repentant sinner the imploring cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner," is ever ready to listen to the petition which He has inspired. As these continue in this humble, fervent, and wrestling condition, the gracious language will be extended to them, as it was to S. Bownas, "Look unto me, and I will help thee."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—One of the Vice-Presidents of the Pennsylvania Railroad recently stated, thirty years ago 7,000,000 tons per year, was considered the maximum capacity of a double track railway between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. In 1878 the tonnage of the Pennsylvania Railroad was 11,000,000, and the extent of its capacity is not considered reached. The cost of moving one ton per mile a few years since was one cent, which is now reduced to half-a-cent. The most important element in the reduction of expense has been the iron rails, which are now furnished at two-thirds the cost of iron rails thirty years ago.

The United States Corps of Engineers have recently accomplished the sounding of the Niagara River, the result of which gives the depth of the river, at the point near the foot of the falls, as being 100 feet in the open shore, to be 83 feet the next east of the lead gave 100 feet, deepening to 192 feet at the inclined railway. The average depth to the swift drift, where the river sudden narrows, with a velocity too great to be measured, was 70 feet. Close to their low banks, and in the whirlpool rapids set in, the computed depth is 210 feet.

A statement collected from the reports of U. States consuls, on the condition of labor in the countries of Europe, is to the effect that "More misery results from strikes, drinking, socialism and communism in England and Germany, than from all other causes, hard times included. The French working men and women, though obtaining less wages, are more prosperous than the working people of Great Britain. This is owing to the greater fragility and providence of the former, as compared with the strikes, drinking habits, and consequent recklessness of the latter. In the United States the business of an agitator should find no favor. It might be forgiven if the peasant of southern Germany, whose daily wages are less than twenty-five cents of our money, should utter their low, hard say; but it is a pitiful commentary on human nature, that any one of all these United States should be suffering from the specious pleas and unsound logic, of those who hope to ride into political power by deceiving the people into thinking thereby oppressed."

The number of immigrants who arrived at New York during the two months ending 8th mo, 31st, was 108,507, against 75,935 for corresponding period last year.

One hundred and fifty colored emigrants from Nashville, arrived at St. Louis recently, on their way to Kansas. They stated they were able to pay their way, and take up land on reaching their destination.

The report of the last cotton crop shows that 4,451,368 bales were received at Southern ports, 439,842 bales were shipped overland to Northern ports, and 181,915 bales were consumed in the South; 23,465,565 bales were exported, of which 2,052,555 went to England, 122,918 to France, and 938,201 elsewhere on the continent.

The heaviest producer of cotton was Louisiana, which raised more than any other State. The average weight of a bale was nearly 471 pounds.

The budding product of the United States, for the half year ending 6th mo, 30th, is given at $21,778,809. Of this total the value of gold was $15,900,000; silver, $27,000,000; and copper, $778,809.

The recent fall of the precious metals toward the United States is the more remarkable view of the fact that during every year since 1861, there has been an excess of exports of specie from the United States, over the imports into the United States. So late as the year 1875, there was an excess of exports of specie amounting to $6,000,000.

A fire in Deadwood, Dakota Territory, on the 26th ult., destroyed about 175 buildings, mostly stores, and rendered two thousand people homeless. The loss is estimated at $1,500,000.

The immigration into Eastern Oregon and Washington Territory has been larger this season than at any time since the original settlement of the country. One effect of this, is the increased development of the agricultural resources of the country. It has been estimated that 50,000 tons of wheat will be shipped this year from the two sections through Walla Walla and Astoria. Another result of the growth of the country, is the impetus given to railroad enterprise; the State Legislature has offered inducements to Eastern capitalists to build roads.

The total number of deaths from yellow fever in Memphis during the 27th ult., is given as 382.

The deaths in this city the past week were 253. Of these 177 were natives of the United States; 147 adults, and 100 children, 61 being under one year of age.

Markets. 4c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 105½; do. 5's, 103½; 4½ per cent, 1881, 103½; 4's, registered, 101½; do. common, 102½.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings were reported at 11 1/16 cts. per lb.

Petroleum.—Crude 6 cts. in barrels; and refined 61 cts. for export, and 71 7/8 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues in demand. Minnesota extra, $5.75 a $6.25; Penna., $5.50 a $6.25; Patent and other high grades, $6.25 a $6.75. Rye flour, $4.12½ a $4.25. Corn meal, $2.75 a $2.80.

Grain.—Wheat—amber, $1.29 a $1.30. Rye, 74 1/8 cts. to 76 cts. Oats, mixed, 35 cts., and white, 35 a 38 cts.

Seeds.—Flaxseed, $1.35 a $1.40; Timothy, $2.60 a $2.70 per bushel.

Hay and Straw.—Prime timothy, 85 a 90 cts. per 1000 lbs. mixed, 65 a 75 cts.; straw, 85 cts. a $1.00.

Beef cattle were dull and prices favored buyers. Extra, 5½ cts.; good, 4 1/4 a 5 cts., and common, 3 a 4 cts. per pound. Hogs, extra, 6 cts.; good, 5½ cts.; common, 5½ cts. per pound. Sheep, 3½ a 4½ cts., as to quality.

Lands, 4 a 5 cts.

FOREIGN.—In London on the 27th ult., U. S. bonds were quoted at 100½ for the 5's, 108½ for the 4½'s, and 104½ for the 4's.

The Agricultural Reports for Great Britain, issued a few days ago, show that the acreage of wheat for 1879 was estimated at 65,375,735 acres, and that the acreage of oats was also less; while that of barley and potatoes had considerably increased.

The official report of the keeper of Mining Records for 1878, shows a decrease in the production of coal of 1,555,748 tons. In 1878, 17,229,731 tons of iron ore were smelted, against 18,110,137 tons in 1877. The decline in prices was even greater. The total value of coal produced in 1878, was $232,003,765; and of pig iron from ores of the United Kingdom alone, $80,785,000.

Gold passes from fire in Russia during the 8th month is stated to be 20,000,000 rubles.

Late advices by mail from the west coast of Africa, say that Henry M. Stanley and his companions had arrived at Sierra Leone from Zanzibar, in the steamer Albatross.

The International Exhibition at Sydney, New South Wales, is spoken of as a success. Great Britain has 800 industrial exhibits, and 513 of fine arts; Germany has 691 entries; Austria, 170; France has 250 industrial exhibits, and 148 of fine arts; Belgium 236 industrial, and 100 of fine arts; America 120 industrial exhibits.

Some idea of the magnitude of the business of raising sweet scented flowers, may be gathered from the fact that Europe and British India alone consume about 150,000 gallons of hothouse perfume yearly; the Paris revenue from the American Horticultural Exhibition, in 1867, was $1,000,000, and the total revenue of England from other imported perfumes is estimated at $20,000,000 each year. The London Journal of Horticulture gives the value of an acre of jasmine plants at $1250; an acre of rose trees $75; orange trees, $250; violets, $800; geranium plants, $1000; an acre of lavender will yield a value of $1500.

A private telegram from Havana states that three slaveholders, owners of 100, 1200, and 800 slaves respectively, have emancipated them, and contracted with them for their services for five years, and that other slaveholders intend following their example. The Spanish Government has decided to send five hundred troops to Cuba forthwith. Several Deputies are resolved to move in the Cortes the immediate abolition of slavery, without indemnity to the slave-owners.

A person writing from the province of San Paulo, Brazil, states that severe frosts occurred there in the 8th month, which had so seriously damaged the coffee trees, as to reduce the crop for 1880 one half.

Silent Meetings. Ministerial Offerings.

On the subject of silent meetings, Robert Barclay writes: "God causes the inward life the more to abound, when his children assemble themselves diligently together to wait upon Him; so that, as iron sharpeneth iron, the seeing of the faces of one another, when both are inwardly gathered unto the Life, giveth occasion for the Life speedily to rise, and to pass from vessel to vessel. And as many candles lighted, and put in one place, do greatly augment the light, and make it more to shine forth; so, when many are gathered together into the same Life, there is more of the glory of God, and his power appears to the refreshment of each individual; for that he partakes not only of the Light and Life raised in himself, but in all the rest. And therefore Christ hath particularly promised a blessing to such as assemble in his name, seeing He will be in the midst of them." And again, in the language of R. B., "When I came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart; and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up; and so I became knit and united unto them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed." It is recorded of Daniel Wheeler, that "The little meeting which he attended in the early part of his religious course, that of Handsworth Woodhouse, was usually held in silence; and he has often been known to refer to some of those solemn seasons, as times of peculiar instruction to his mind; in which the power of the Lord was sensibly felt, and his Truth revealed." And again D. W. testifies: "It is indispensable, in order to the performance of true spiritual worship, to wait in reverential silence for the renewal of that strength, which is mighty through God to the casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God,—to the bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ," even to the obedience of the Spirit of Truth in our hearts, without which none can worship God in Spirit and in Truth." Stephen Grellet in his memoirs sets forth: "I continued diligently to attend meetings, which were held in silence. Very few persons assembled there, and I had no communication with them at all for some time. I have frequently considered since, that it was a favor that my lot was cast in a place where I had no outward dependence to lean upon. In religious meetings, as well as out of them, my single concern was to feel after the 'influences of the Holy Spirit in my own heart.' Another anonymous writer on this subject says: "Our meetings were primarily meetings for worship—of which silence was the most fitting basis—in which each soul present might enjoy communion with its Creator, and receive from his hand the supplies which He was pleased to impart—waiting till the Holy Spirit constrained to vocal utterance."

John Griffith, who, as a writer, is so full and clear in relation to ministry, declares: "It became indubitably clear to my understanding, that it is impossible to administer, in a feeling, effectual manner, to people's several states, unless we are baptized thereto. Well adapted words, and sound doctrine, as to the external appearance, may, without much difficulty be attained; seeing we have the Holy Scriptures, and many other good books containing the principles of Truth, and the Christian experience of the Lord's people; yet all this, delivered with the tongue of men or angels, will prove an empty fruitless sound without the power and demonstration of the Spirit of Christ, who enables his upright-hearted ministers to search all things, yea, the hidden mystery of iniquity, as well as the deep things of God, even as he led his prophet Ezekiel to look through the hole in the wall, that the most secret abomination may be brought to light and testified against." Bearing on the same subject are the following testimonies:—"It is very important that ministers should be strengthened to refuse the demand of the itching ears for words, when nothing is committed to them to deliver, and equally so, that they deliver faithfully what is given them, even though it may be disagreeable truths, to those to whom it is addressed." "Friends in general are fearful of having much said, unless it be under a good deal of religious feeling, lest it should be more in the regard than in the power of the Lord." "With regard to the nature of the religious discourses in our meetings, I would observe that even a powerful and living address, whether longer or shorter, requires a listening and teachable spirit, on the part of the hearers, to be of any profit."

Until a comparatively recent period it has not been an unusual thing for ministers in our Society to have their mouths closed for a longer or shorter period. Thus Job Scott writes: "The eleven first meetings I was at, after I left this city (Philadelphia), I was shut up in profound silence, except a few words at the close of the first. Trying was this dispensation; but in it I learned much patience. I thought I knew before what it was to suffer and want, and also something of true patience, but I find we have much to learn, even after we think we have learned much." And again: "What will come next is beyond my short-sighted ken; for I thought my eleven days' captivity, mentioned in a former letter, was near the utmost I had to expect. But, alas! I was not many days liberated from that till I was plunged again, so as not to be able to open my mouth, in a meeting for worship, from the 9th of 11th month till yesterday the 30th [of the same], being quite shut up in fifteen public meetings and divers meetings for church affairs." He adds, "I suppose I am a wonder to many, but my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. I could no more utter words with peace in these meetings than I can at other times keep silence with peace." It is stated that Sarah Harrison, throughout her visit to America, felt a great care not to minister to itching ears, but would rather travel on in silence and sorrow, than speak unless under the clear requiring of duty." We have the statement, that Nicholas Wain, while in England, was for a long time under a silent, suffering travail of spirit, and for perhaps months, did not open his mouth in the ministry. Richard Jordan thus wrote to his wife from Falmouth, Great Britain, in 1802:—"I arrived here yesterday, after having attended sundry exercising meetings, some in course, and some appointed; but in most of them I have had to wade through wholly in silence. * * This is sometimes mortifying to the creature, especially in appointed meetings; but alas! what can we do; when He who hath the keys of David is pleased to shut, who can dare attempt to open? This would not be ministering in the ability which He only giveth;" and, he subjoins, "I fully believe that attempts of this sort, is the reason of so much lifeless ministry prevailing in the world (even amongst us as well as other people), which I believe, seldom (rightly) either opens the understanding or convinces the judgment. * * It is only by the breath of life from God, that man becomes a living soul, and it is only by the renewing of it in our souls that we are enabled to offer acceptable offerings unto Him." Joseph Whittall, in early life a student of law and afterwards a worthy and valuable minister (for an account of him, see Book of Memorials, 1879 edition, pp. 286, 296) was quite infrequent in his religious communications: so much so that the late Samuel Bettle, of Philadelphia, once said familiarly to him, that "if he would let him know when he was going to preach, he would ride down to Woodbury to hear him." Our late beloved friend, William Evans, under date of Ninth month 8th, 1846, writes: "I have passed most of our meetings for months in silence; and not unfrequently without much evidence of the stirrings of Divine life, and the mantle of sorrow and mourning has been the covering of my spirit." And again, Eleventh mo. 7th, 1853: "For many days I have been shut up, and all ability to preach the gospel has been with drawn, as though I should never again be called into the work. I have been almost destitute of any sense of the quickening power; and I saw that no former openings or favors would give the least ability or authority to put forth a hand in this solemn and weighty work." Lastly, in the recently published "Letters and Memoranda of Mary M. Sheppard" is the note, that her cousin, John Miller, who was an acknowledged minister of the meeting to which she belonged, "spoke to us to-day, after perhaps two years' silence."

These humiliating experiences of the gifted and the good might be greatly multiplied; but enough has been given to show that servants and handmaidens have, in pure dependence for the exercise of their gifts, not unfrequently been brought to the acknowledgment of David: "All my springs are in Thee." That at times the Beloved of their souls, for the trial of their faith, has so withdrawn himself, so become to them as "a spring shut up, a fountain sealed," that like the spouse in the canticles, they had oft to mourn his absence, and to wait "until the day break and the shadows flee away," before He returned unto them, whose "name" ever was and is to all his faithful ones, "as ointment poured forth."

Ascension was discovered by Juan de Nova, a Portuguese navigator in 1501, and was so called because it was first sighted on Ascension Day. It is one of the peaks of a sub-marine volcanic ridge which separates the northern and southern basins of the Atlantic, and is situated 8° S. of the equator, and about midway between the coasts of Africa and South America. It is one of the most isolated islands in the world, and has no land nearer than St. Helena, which lies 800 miles to the south-east.

It is doubtless the apex of a great volcanic upheaval, though there is no record of recent disturbance on it. Its general form is a triangle, each side of which is about seven miles in length. Round the shores are black and rugged streams of basaltic lava, many of which can be traced to points of eruption at the base of Green Mountain—a great mass of trachyte 2,570 feet high, near the centre of the island—or to numerous little red colored hills that seem to be piles of cinders. Everything is of volcanic origin except the accumulations of coral and shell sand in the small bays.

Portuguese and French alike passed the untempting isle. No nation coveted its barren shores, until the British lion stretched out a paw in 1815 and gathered it into his heap of treasures. Napoleon had then been sent to St. Helena, and we dared not leave such a vantage point open to the enemy; so the British flag was planted on yet another spot of the globe, and Ascension became, to all intents and purposes, a man of war guarding Napoleon at St. Helena. Though there is now no Napoleon to guard, we still keep possession of Ascension, for no other reason, that I can see, than that we do not wish any body else to have it.

"The government of Ascension is unique. No other land in the world is ruled by the same laws, and my husband and I are the only civilians that have ever been subject to them. When David decided on this island as the most favorable spot on which to observe the Opposition of Mars, the first step was to obtain permission from the Lords of the Admiralty to go there. This permission was readily granted, through the kind intervention of the Astronomer Royal; and not only that, but, what was of immense importance to me, the accommodation usually accorded to a married officer was provided for us. Our official letter also contained the promise of assistance in erecting the Observatory, a blue-jacket for night-watch, and a gracious permission to buy meat. Without this letter, we could no more have landed on Ascension than we could have boarded a line-of-battle ship."

"Indeed, in the Naval Gazette, the population of Ascension will be found under the heading 'Crew of the Flora Tender;' and service here does not mean half-pay to the naval officer, but counts for active service afloat. Ascension acquired the name of the 'Flora Tender,' I believe, at the time that H.M.S. Flora was anchored there, and when the island of course provided her supplies. Now the Flora is stationed at the Cape for better anchorage, but her 'Tender' still stands firm in mid Atlantic, and never drags her anchors as the Flora once did alongside of her."

"It was late in life for us to go to sea, but we very soon dropped into sailor-like ways, and by-and-by we adopted even the language of Jack. A kitchen was not a kitchen here, but a 'galley'; the pantry became a 'locker'; our floors and tables were no longer scrubbed, but 'swabbed out'; and dinner had not to be cooked but to be got 'under weigh.'"

"One gallon of water a day for all purposes was all that was allowed, and this scarcity, our author says, "was at first very difficult to take into account in household expenditure; and my surprise was great when, on the first morning I sent some linen to be washed, 'Sam,' our handsome Krooman, returned to say that I had forgotten to send the water. This was truly an extra thought to the house wife; and in many ways the first days of housekeeping on Ascension were rather bewildering. But by-and-by light appeared through the wood, and I found that once started on the proper routine, the road was not so rough after all."

"By careful management and a plentiful use of salt-water whenever it was practicable, we could eke out our scant allowance of fresh water to a sufficiency; and this novel poverty enabled me to make two valuable discoveries in culinary art, viz, that fish and potatoes are better when boiled in salt water than in fresh. We soon got accustomed to tinned milk and vegetables; and when the rollers disappeared, we found ourselves by no means dependent on the scanty meat rations, for the fish here was as good and plentiful as it had been at St. Helena. And then there was the turtle!"

"A turtle was killed once a week, and our share of the booty generally provided us with sufficient to make a turtle steak pie, besides a slice of fin for soup. The steaks were excellent, stewed or baked, but they could not stand the ordeal of a gridiron. Cooked over the fire, the meat became hard and juicyless, almost as bad as an Ascension beef-steak. With the fin, and taking care not to omit the 'calpash,' and 'calpee' we made delicious soup, when we could spare water for it; but some weeks we had to pay the price of a little extra extravagance in the precious fluid, by being deprived of our soup. Then, with sad hearts, we stewed the fin, and it made a palatable if not a pretty dish.

"Verily, all one's pre-conceived ideas of the relative values of things were here turned upside down. Water carefully measured and treasured, potatoes 4*l.* per lb., occasionally cabbages from St. Helena knocked down by action at 1*s.* 6*d.* each, milk priceless, and turtle soup for nothing. It was very difficult to comprehend at first, and I suffered much from alternate feelings of stinginess and prodigality before being able to master this new domestic economy; but after the first feelings of bewilderment were over, the novelty was delightful."

"These turtles are kept in "two large stone built enclosures, into which the sea flows freely through narrow sluices. Here I saw more than a hundred huge creatures, looking like monsters of a bygone age. At first sight these dark masses, just showing above water, might be mistaken for slimy, seaweed-covered rocks, till one of them slowly moves—places a finny foot on the top of the "black thing" next to it, and rear aloft an ungainly head, showing a breast of leathery, shagreened skin speckled and streaked with a motley of yellow green, brown and red. Those we saw were certainly of ample size, each animal weighing from five to six hundred weight; but they take a long time to acquire this weight, and the full-grown ones are said to be a hundred years old."

"I do not know how this conclusion is arrived at, for the young turtle are seldom, if ever, seen from the time that they make their way into the water, straight from the egg, until they return again to land, at full growth and maturity, to deposit their eggs; but they are certainly slow-moving, slow-living, slow-growing animals."

"One of the many curious facts connected with the turtle is, that no males are ever seen. The females are captured when they come to lay their eggs on the little sandy beaches that run here and there into the rocky coast of Ascension. At North east Bay, South-west Bay, Deal Man's Beach, &c., there are men stationed during the turtle season, from Christmas to midsummer, to watch for the unwary turtle as she scrambles up, about a hundred yards above high-water mark, to deposit her eggs. Here she digs three or four nests for herself, one after the other, eight to ten feet across by about two feet deep. In these she lays often three hundred eggs in a season; forty or fifty in each; and leaving them to incubate in the hot sand, a two months' process, she makes for the water again."

General Harrison and Total Abstinence.—When General Harrison was running for the Presidency, he stopped at the old Washington House in Chester for dinner. After dinner was served, it was noticed that the General pledged his toast in water, and one of the gentlemen from New York in offering another said, "General, will you not favor me by drinking a glass of wine." The General refused in a very gentlemanly manner. Again he was urged to join in a glass of wine. This was too much. He rose from the table, his tall form erect, and in the most dignified manner remarked: "Gentlemen, I have refused twice to partake of the wine-cup. That should have been sufficient. Though you press the cup to my lips, not a drop shall pass the portals,

I made a resolve when I started in life that I would avoid strong drink, and I have never broken it. I am one of a class of seventeen young men who graduated, and the other sixteen fill drunkards' graves—all through the pernicious habit of wine drinking. I owe all my health, happiness and prosperity to that resolution. Will you urge me now?"—Christian Statesman.

"For The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

Tunnessassa, 12th mo. 24th, 1855.
Dear friend Joseph Elkinton,—Thou hast written to think it strange that I have not written more frequently; it has not been caused by any change of feeling towards thee. * * * I have felt some hesitation in writing, feeling cautious of expressing anything in regard to my remaining here for a time or leaving. I desire to know what is right in this matter, and be enabled to do it, not having a will of my own in it. I think it necessary to attend to the right time for returning, as well as leaving home. It is safest and best to submit this to Him, whose right it is to direct us in all our movements. * * * I have been out some amongst the Indians, but not quite so much as I wished to be. The Indians have been kind, and the time for the most part, pleasantly spent: my way seems to be made easy, and I have cause to be thankful for it. I know of no particular cause for discouragement, except the careless, idle habits they are indulging in; I have spoken freely to them on the subject, and they seemed to accept it as an act of kindness. I think the way for further labor amongst the Indians is not shut against "Friends." I would be glad to hear of your getting some suitable Friend to come out and assist in carrying out the concern of our Yearly Meeting. * * * That we may be preserved from doing any thing that would bring reproach upon the Society, or obstruct or close up the way of carrying out this religious concern, is my sincere desire, and that our lives and conversation may be a savor of the sweet and precious spirit of the Great Head of the Church.

Thy friend,

EBENEZER WORTH.

Under date of 2d mo. 4th, 1857, our friend wrote as follows, viz.: "I think I feel a liberty to note down some little account of the dealings of a kind and merciful Providence with me, a poor unworthy sinner. Oh! that these favors may always be remembered with feelings of gratitude to the Giver of all good."

(On the) 10th of 7th mo. 1856, I left home to accompany J. W. on a (religious) visit to Friends at Tunnessassa and the Indians residing on the Allegheny and Conplamter's reservation. Brother P. took me to West Chester; on my way as we rode along, he seemed to be in a kind, favored frame of mind. J. W. and I got to Tunnessassa on the 12th (and) visited one family in the afternoon. 13th. Visited a number of Indians. 14th. Went up the river as far as Tuncannungant, visited some on the upper end of the reservation; staid at Great Valley that night. 15th. Went up the river to Horseshoe Bend, attended a council, and called to see some Indians on our way. 16th. This morning had a comfortable and I think favored opportunity with James Jacobs and two young men by the name of Killbuck; then travelled down towards Tunnessassa, called at John Snider's, had an opportunity with his sick daughter, N. E.'s wife; made two other calls and got to Tunnessassa that night. 17th. Fifth day. Sat meeting with the family and some Indian children, and in the afternoon visited some Indians in the neighborhood of Cold Spring. I think the opportunities were favored ones. Returned to Tunnessassa about sunset, and after supper received a telegraph requesting me to return home on account of the indisposition of brother Paschal; left about half past one, and took the morning train at Little Valley for home. I experienced a good deal of anxiety in the forepart of the night, afterwards became more calm and easy. 18th. Got to Philadelphia about half past 11 that night; was met by J. E., Jr., who informed me my brother was more comfortable; very pleasant news to me; staid in Philadelphia over night. 19th. Was met by brother J. at West Chester, who brought me home. I was glad to find Paschal much improved; he continued to grow better (until) the 27th, (became) able to walk some in his room. (The disease) began to have the appearance of erysipelas. On the 1st of 8th mo. he was quite drowsy, rational when awake. On the 2d less drowsy, and I think enjoyed the company of the family—father and mother, his brothers and sister being with him. To me it was a favored time, not soon to be forgotten, for which I felt thankful. I think he was much favored on his sick bed; at one time he expressed there was none but the Great Physician could help him. At another, his only hope was in Heaven; that he had passed through a hard struggle, but then felt pretty comfortable. He died the evening of the 4th of 8th month, 1856, about which time there was a solemn, quiet, comfortable feeling in his room.

(1857.) 2d mo. 17th. I have often thought of my deceased brother (since he has been taken from us). When I have looked at the seat where he used to sit in our meetings left vacant, it has been productive of solemn feelings. It ought to serve as a warning to myself and others to endeavor to be prepared for the change. I have been favored the past winter with many sweet and precious seasons, often in the night when lying on my bed. These unmerited favors ought to be cause for love, gratitude and humility. Oh! my short comings, may there be an improvement in time to come. May I remember, if I should be spared to read this, the great favors that have in unmerited mercy been bestowed upon me. May the solemn enquiry be made, how is it with thee, oh! my soul! art thou living a life of obedience to thy Divine Master, or art thou living as thou lists in the world, and thy situation comparable to the unfruitful fig tree? Oh it is a solemn thing to trifle with the mercies of a kind and merciful Creator.

19th. 5th of the week. We had a solid refreshing meeting. I think it may be numbered among the unmerited favors, and might serve as encouragement in our low or discouraged seasons.

2d mo. 25th. Went with H. R. to West Chester, attended their Monthly Meeting. I was comforted in being enabled to feel my mind gathered to that which was a comfort and support. I feel glad I was there, and much reason to be thankful for the favors of the day.

2d mo. 26th. Our Preparative Meeting held to day; a pretty comfortable meeting; a merciful continuation of unmerited favor and cause for gratitude—may I not be like the unfruitful fig tree.

3d mo. 2d. Visited a member on account of a difference between him and another. Although very unworthy, I think I was favored with help to labor. May the praise be to Him who is the strength of his people.

3d mo. 4th. Got liberty of the Monthly Meeting to accompany Samuel Cope on a visit to the members and attenders of Robeson Monthly Meeting. * * * Returned home (from the family visits) on the 9th, with peaceful, comfortable feelings.

19th. Went to Philadelphia to attend the meeting of the Indian Committee; attended the meeting for worship held in the Arch St. meeting-house—a comfortable one to me. Great are the favors and long-sufferings of a kind and merciful Providence to me, a poor unworthy creature.

For "The Friend"

To the Junior Members of the Society of Friends.

I suppose there are not a few of the younger members of this Yearly Meeting, who are sincerely attached to the doctrines of Friends, and who recognize in them as close an approximation to real, practical Christianity, as can be found in any religious body. I also suppose that many, while acknowledging this, and respecting those who uphold the principles of the Society, are at the same time unfaithful in the performance of the duties which devolve upon them individually as members thereof. This condition among the young is probably in many cases the result of indifference; in others it is caused by education, or possibly by diffidence; while in many the love of quietude and youthful pleasures, directly leads them from a life dedicated to the service of Him to whom they owe all their many blessings.

It is a very noticeable fact, that some of our young Friends attend only the First-day morning meetings; that their conduct and conversation are not consistent with the principles of Friends; and that they manifest a lukewarmness in religion which cannot fail to produce concern in the minds of those truly interested in their welfare. On looking around, I see many of my own youthful age, who do not give evidence that they love the truths handed down to them by their ancestors. Very soon the fathers and mothers who have contended most earnestly for the faith in their day, will be called upon to exchange their earthly crosses for heavenly crowns; and the burdens that they relinquish will then have to be borne by the rising generation. Are the latter willing, and are they becoming qualified to take their burdens up?

Friends have ever accepted the cardinal doctrines of the Christian religion in common with many other professors; but as regards the practice of their faith, they have always had peculiar testimonies to bear, which have marked them as a distinct body of believers. A few of these testimonies have, after 200 years, been adopted by most of Christendom; some are now partially so; while many of the remainder are still deemed superfluous by others. If, therefore, some of these views are acknowledged to be correct, and if sincere inquirers after the truth are beginning to recognize the importance of others, is there not great encouragement that the Society hold steadfastly to the principles it has ever maintained before the world? Certainly no one can suppose that it has had its day, and now can rest on its past record, for it still has many excellent testimonies to bear, among which may be mentioned those in favor of plainness and against war, oaths, ritualism and a paid ministry. Each one of these are founded upon scriptural commands, and they are of such importance that we must acknowledge the necessity of their being handed down to succeeding generations.

Some assume to say that Quakerism can be changed, and that the restraints of the cross which our early Friends experienced, are not obligatory upon us of the present day. Such opinions as these very naturally are received favorably by the young; but the very substance of religion consists in the denial of self, and the surrender of our own will to the Divine will. Those who avow such libertine views, very generally live and act in a manner which shows that they do not faithfully obey our Saviour's rule, that whosoever would be his disciple must deny himself, take up his daily cross, and follow Him; nor he'd the exhortation of the apostle, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." Neither will it do for us as a people to imagine that by ignoring the cross, we shall be able to extend our usefulness, and bring many into the fold. We would thereby present the inconsistent example of a religious body partially renouncing the very doctrine which it professes to press upon the world.

I am fearful that too many of us who are young, and who are surrounded by various temptations, find the cross to be our principal difficulty; yet without bearing it there can be no vital growth in Christian knowledge. If we are convinced that we ought to pursue a certain course, or give up something that may be presented to our view, and are willing to yield to these convictions, we will never regret having done so; on the contrary we will be strengthened to perform other duties that may be made clear from time to time. We will find the cross that this giving up involves, to be far easier than we had anticipated; and by steadily endeavoring to follow the Divine Light thus given, shall eventually become a strength to the Society, and exert a beneficial influence in the circles in which we move. This is the only really happy course in this life; and thousands have declared, that after long years of wilful disobedience, when they were once induced to take up the cross for their Saviour's sake, they have been more abundantly rewarded than they previously had imagined could ever be the case.

It is my desire that all of us be careful not to attempt more in a religious way than our strength will warrant; and on the other hand, not to be too easily held back by diffidence, or by the opinions and criticisms of those with whom we mingle. Neither let us be discouraged because others seem to think lightly of crosses that we believe it right for us to take up. May the large number of young men and women now in our midst, seriously consider the responsible position in which they are placed; and may they not endeavor in any way to evade their responsibility. May they as individuals so be filled with desires to live useful lives, and so be willing to learn of the Heavenly Teacher, that before many years shall have past away this Society may number among its most concerned members, those who are in the ranks of the young.

Philada, 9th month, 1879.

MORNING.

O, beautiful golden Morning,
Set in the crown of Day,
Like a jewel whose living lustre
Must gladden the heart alway;
I sat with pulsing bounding,
The gleam of thy early light,
And the cares that life o'ershadow,
Fall back with the veil of Night;
Or, like you mist of the valley,
That over the streamlets stand,
Their gray is changed to amber
By the touch of thy magic hand.

The leaves of the willows tremble
With thy soft air passing through,
The grass on th' lawn and meadow
Is starred with quivering dew.
The breath of the woodbine floateth
In at the open door,
The twitter of wren and sparrow
Sounds cheery and blithe before:
From far and near re-echo
The tones of nature's lyre,
The voices of earth's awakening
Swell to a mighty choir.

Sink, O beautiful Morning,
Deep in the hearts of all,
Let the plummet-line of thy brightness
Run down thro' our mortal shell,
Let the laborer feel the purest
Influence thou canst wield,
As he passes the woodland covert,
And hies o'er the spangled field.
Deeper than sign or symbol,
Let his vision of God be full,
Turning to course unceasing
His thoughts' unwonted flow.

Let us learn of thee, O Morning,
A lesson of hope and truth,
Drinking with thee the water
From th' Fount of eternal youth!
Bearing life's early freshness
On thine' the morning dew fall,
Finishing the path still golden,
When sunset and twilight meet;
And, shed in the calm and quiet,
May the dew of peace be ours,
To nourish for bloom hereafter
The heart's immortal flowers.

GROWING OLD.

Do ye think of the days that are gone, Jennie,
As ye sit by your fire at night?
Do ye wish that the morn would bring back the time
When your heart and your step were so light?
I think of the days that are gone, Robin,
And of all that I joyed in them;
But the brightest that ever arose in me,
I have never wished back again!

Do ye think of the hopes that are gone, Jennie,
As ye sit by your fire at night?
Do ye gather them up as they faded fast
Like buds with an early blight?
I think of the hopes that are gone, Robin,
And I mourn at their stay and fall,
For they fell as the leaves of the red rose fall,
And were even in falling sweet.

Do ye think of the friends that are gone, Jennie,
As ye sit by your fire at night?
Do ye wish they were round you again once more
By the hearth that they made so bright?
I think of the friends that are gone, Robin,
They are dear to my heart as thou,
But the best and the dearest among them all,
I have never wished back again.

Though men can't bring their means to their minds, yet ought they to bring their minds to their means, and learn content in every state.

The Rescue.—One stormy evening, in the North of Scotland, a farmer had gathered home his flock of sheep, and enclosed them for protection. He had just entered his own comfortable apartment, when his dog Oscar—who had been missing for some time—was observed to enter in an excited state, rush round the room, and disappear. After a prolonged absence, which had not awakened suspicion, he again entered in a still more excited manner, jumping upon his master, and endeavoring to arrest his attention. Again he left the house, and again he returned with wailing importunities.

The farmer was impressed with the thought that something was wrong, and followed his dog out into the fields and through the snow drifts for more than a mile, the dog leading the way, and anxiously watching the steps of his master. Near a bridge which crossed a small stream on the farm, Oscar stood still and leaping over the parapet, began to tear away the snow with all his might. After a diligent search, it was found that one of the sheep had gone over, sunk in the snow which covered the stream, and then in its vain efforts to escape, had forced its way under the bridge. It was found also that during the hours that had passed, Oscar had not been idle; he had been industriously clearing away the snow from the opposite side of the bridge in order to let the sheep pass through, and escape an untimely end. The sufferer was delivered, and the dog and his master went home rejoicing with the lost one.

And here is beautifully embodied one of the most tender and suggestive of divine parables—"If a man have a hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth into the mountains and seeketh that which is gone astray? And if so be that he find it, verily I say unto you, he rejoiceth more over that sheep than over the ninety and nine which went not astray."—Hand and Heart.

At the meeting of the American Social Science Association, Prof. S. Wells Williams, of Yale College, read a long and carefully prepared paper on "Chinese Immigration." He showed that the total number of arrivals in this country between 1825 and 1877 was 191,118, and at this rate it will take a century before half a million can find footing here. The number of arrivals from Europe in thirty years was 3,200,000, or more than one sixth of our population. The Government of the United States has covenanted that Chinese subjects here shall be exempt from all disability or persecution on account of their religious faith. The Chinese here are under the strongest National sanction of any race, and ought to be protected. They came here at the invitation of our own people, and brought with them industrious and quiet habits, and have added largely to the resources and wealth of this country. It is impossible to estimate the money value of their industry, but evidence taken by the Morton Committee shows that without their help many enterprises now in full operation would not have been attempted when they were much needed. One of the leading managers of the Pacific Railroad testified that Chinese labor had given more employment to white laborers than they could otherwise have had, and that the road could not have been completed for many years if the Chinese had not been available. Over a million acres of tithelands have been reclaimed by them. Irrigating canals for farms with dams and sluices for mines all owe their existence to this source. One witness said, without the Chinese the population of California could not be maintained at more than half its present number, and that grain could not be raised at all with profit if the cost of production was increased by banishing the Chinese.—Christian Statesman.

* For "The Friend." *

The following very remarkable paper was found among the effects of Abigail Robinson, a valuable minister of Newport, R. I., who was then deceased more than forty years. It was in her handwriting, and is believed to be her production. She was a woman of strong and clear understanding.

Thoughts on the Unity of the Divine Being.

I do not find where or how to distinguish between, or to separate God from Christ any more than to disunite God from the power of God or the wisdom of God, his mercy, precision, &c.

Christ was the effective Power and Wisdom and Goodness of God, operating in the stupendous work of creation; "the Word by which all things were made" and the Word was God. Christ was the preserving, directing, sustaining power of God which conducted the Israelites in their wilderness travail, "for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was Christ"—though "in the cloud and in the sea" they were baptized unto Moses."

Christ was God spiritually manifested through all ages, as a teacher, director and saviour to all who would and do receive his instructions and obey his directions.

And when in the fullness of time, God was pleased to "manifest Himself in the flesh" by visible display of his wisdom, power and redeeming love, and to exhibit a perfect pattern or all to imitate of the practical virtues which

He requires of intelligent beings "created a title lower than the angels," that the twofold purpose of his own glory and that they should enjoy eternal life—"the Word was made flesh." But to answer the purpose of an example to man, it was necessary that He should not be a human body only, but human nature entire—its passions and its weaknesses. Accordingly He took not on Him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham. He was liable to temptation, was in all points tempted like us as we are, yet without sin; He was susceptible of hunger and weariness—and "Jesus wept." In the total redemption of all the propensities that flesh is heir to, his human nature was made perfect through sufferings—"He died to sin." His humanity was then a fit bode for all the fulness of the Godhead to well in bodily.

The beginning and progress of the work of regeneration having been displayed in the conception, birth and life of Christ, the sacrifice of his body on the cross clearly explained to those who had "eyes to see" the indispensable necessity of the crucifixion of the carnal propensities and will; that we also "must die to sin," thereby opening a door of access to the Father, or showing by this plain illustration that the way to acceptance with Him is to be as the apostle asserted he was, crucified with Christ." Surely to elucidate and to establish a doctrine of prime importance but which had previously been obscure and doubtful, was not a light benefit to that and to all succeeding generations; and I believe his teaching in his spiritual appearance, does not and never will instruct any one to consider it. If there are some things relating to the atoning efficacy of that sacrifice, which are less obviously explained, it certainly does not become us to cavil at what is placed beyond our present comprehension, but which is asserted by the divinely inspired writers of the New Testament, but to bow submissive to Him, who has reserved the "secret things" to himself, and thankfully to acknowledge his goodness in giving so much "to us and to our children." Probably if we did his will we should for ourselves "know of the doctrine whether it be of God."

But it does not suit the pride of man to confess that he sees through a glass darkly. He aspires to be thought to "know even as he is also known;" and what marvel if through this presumption "his feet stumble upon the dark mountains," and while he seeks to appropriate to himself light beyond his measure, "he turns it into the shadow of death, and make it gross darkness."

Oh! the safety and blessedness of being willing to feel thankful that we do feel our utter impotence and blindness; and meekly and patiently to wait on Him, who alone can help our infirmities and enlighten our darkness—aye, and continually to wait, not expecting to be sustained to-day by the manna that we were favoured to gather yesterday.

It is a very blessed thing for people to know how to worship God aright, and to be found in this worship not only at set times and appointed places, but at all times, and in all places. This is the spiritual worship, or the worship in spirit and in truth; and these are the spiritual worshippers which God seeks and accepts.

As people are found in this worship, they differ from and excel all others upon the face of the earth. These worshippers know what it is to bow at the name of Jesus; what it is to know every thought brought into the obedience of Christ; what his rule, government, and great authority is; and how all honor in heaven and earth is given unto Him; and how all are to worship Him as they worship the Father, whether things in heaven, or things on earth, or things under the earth. These can confess with their tongues that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father, truly and experimentally being witnesses of his heavenly power and rule in their hearts, minds, and understandings; giving victory over all vain thoughts, self-will, carnal desires, and wanderings of the mind. These are the worshippers that know the old man put off with his deeds; and the new man put on; the old things cast away, and all things become new; and what it is to enjoy the sabbath of rest, where the end is put to the thinking of their own thoughts, and speaking their own words, and doing their own works; and what it is to bear no burden upon the sabbath-day; and what it is to enjoy the comfort of the Scriptures, and to enjoy the good things they testify of. What the righteous in all ages did enjoy, such are partakers of, and are in unity with just men's spirits, being come to God, the Judge of all, who is blessed for ever.—William Shewen.

"To the end of his life Bryant was appealed to as a critic by persons who had no acquaintance with him, or any right to expect his attention, pressed as he was with his own cares. An editorial associate gives the following account of this kind of annoyance, and of the way in which the poet was affected by it:—

"There is a large class of hopeless versifiers who have been in the habit of sending their poetic wares to Bryant, and asking his judgment upon them; and between his tender conscience, which would not permit him to trifle with the truth, and his keen reluctance to give pain, he was sometimes sorely perplexed. These things imposed upon him, too, an amount of labor for others which was an unfair burden; and on one occasion he came into my room with a parcel of letters and papers in his hand, and in a tone of dejection asked me, "Do people send you their manuscripts to read in this way?" I replied that a good many of them did, and showed him the manuscript of a novel or an epic poem which a Pennsylvania youth had modestly requested me to revise for the press.

"What do you write to them?" he asked. Then he sat down, and told me how sorely he suffered from the perplexity already mentioned; and I ventured to suggest that a letter of even seeming commendation from him to an ambitious incapable might spoil a good blacksmith, and make a ridiculously poor poet; that perhaps a good many of his correspondents sought his approval in this way as a bolster to their vanity; and that the greatest kindness, in very many cases, that he could do to his correspondents, would be frankly to tell them that they could not write poetry."

"Some of his principles of style are set forth in the following extract from a letter once sent to a young applicant for his opinions and advice:—

"My young friend, I observe that you have used several French expressions in your letter. I think, if you will study the English language, that you will find it capable of expressing all the ideas that you may have. I have always found it so; and in all that I have written I do not recall an instance where I was tempted to use a foreign word, but that, on searching, I have found a better one in my own language.

"Be simple, unaffected; be honest in your speaking and writing. Never use a long word when a short one will do as well.

"Call a spade by its name, not a well-known oblong instrument of manual labor; let a home be a home, and not a residence; a place, not a locality; and so on of the rest. When a short word will do, you will always lose by a long one; you lose in clearness; you lose in honest expression of meaning; and, in the estimation of all men who are capable of judging, you lose in reputation for ability.

"The only true way to shine, even in this false world, is to be modest and unassuming. Falsehood may be a thick crust; but, in the course of time, truth will find a place to break through. Elegance of language may not be in the power of us all; but simplicity and straightforwardness are."

"In 1869 he finished the translation of 'The Iliad,' after five years' labor; and the following year it was published in Boston by

J. R. Osgood & Co. It met with a hearty welcome, not only from the lovers of the Greek epics, but from English readers, who felt for the first time that Homer's spirit could be caught in their mother-tongue.

"The success of 'The Iliad' encouraged him to attempt the translation of its companion, 'The Odyssey'; and this was ready for publication in 1871, having occupied only two years.

"His vigor of mind had been preserved by a strict observance of the laws of health as regards diet, sleep, and exercise,—the tripod of physical well-being. In a letter to a friend he has given us a detailed account of his mode of life at this period:—

"I rise early,—at this time of the year, about half past five; in summer, half an hour, or even an hour, earlier. Immediately, with very little encumbrance of clothing, I begin a series of exercises, for the most part designed to expand the chest, and, at the same time, call into action all the muscles and articulations of the body. These are performed with dumb bells, the very lightest, covered with flannel, with a pole, a horizontal bar, and a light chair swung around my head. After a full hour, and sometimes more, passed in this manner, I bathe from head to foot. When at my place in the country I sometimes shorten my exercises in the chamber, and, going out, occupy myself for half an hour or more in some work which requires brisk exercise. After my bath, if breakfast be not ready, I sit down to my studies till I am called.

"My breakfast is a simple one,—honey and milk, or, in place of honey, brown bread or oatmeal or wheaten grits, and, in the season, baked sweet apples. Buckwheat cakes I do not decline, nor any other article of vegetable food; but animal food I never take at breakfast. Tea and coffee I never touch at any time. Sometimes I take a cup of chocolate, which has no narcotic effect, and agrees with me very well. At breakfast I often take fruit, either in its natural state or freshly stewed.

"After breakfast I occupy myself for a while with my studies; and then, when in town, I walk down to the office of 'The Evening Post,' nearly three miles distant, and after about three hours return, always walking, whatever be the weather or the state of the streets. In the country I am engaged in my literary tasks till a feeling of weariness drives me out into the open air; and I go upon my farm, or into the garden and prune the fruit-trees, or perform some other work about them which they need, and then go back to my books. I do not often drive out, preferring to walk.

"In the country I dine early; and it is only at that meal that I take either meat or fish, and of these but a moderate quantity, making my dinner mostly of vegetables. At the meal which is called tea I take only a little bread and butter, with fruit if it be on the table. In town, where I dine later, I make but two meals a day. Fruit makes a considerable part of my diet, and I eat it at almost any hour of the day without inconvenience. My drink is water; yet I sometimes, though rarely, take a glass of wine. I am a natural temperance man, finding myself rather confused than exhilarated by wine. I never meddle with tobacco, except to quarrel with its use.

"That I may rise early, I, of course, go to bed early,—in town, as early as ten; in the country, somewhat earlier.

"For many years I have avoided in the evening every kind of literary occupation which tasks the faculties, such as composition—even to the writing of letters,—for the reason that it excites the nervous system, and prevents sound sleep."

He died on the 12th day of the 6th month, 1878, in the 84th year of his age, at his home in New York, of paralysis, probably induced by the exertion of delivering a public address in the Central Park, two weeks before.

For "The Friend"

(Circular of the Bible Association of Friends in America.)

In again calling the attention of Auxiliaries to the Annual Queries to be answered previous to the general meeting of the Association on the 5th of Eleventh month, the Corresponding Committee would press upon Friends, who have been engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, the importance of furnishing full and accurate answers to all the Queries, and of forwarding their report seasonably to the Depository.

It may be recollected, that in making donations to Auxiliaries, the Board are guided in deciding what number of Bibles and Testaments shall be sent to each, by the information given in its report. Hence those Auxiliaries that do not report in time, are liable to be left out in the distribution.

Specific directions should be given in every case, how boxes should be marked and forwarded; and their receipt should always be promptly acknowledged.

QUERIES.

1. What number of families or individuals have been gratuitously furnished with the Holy Scriptures by the Auxiliary during the past year?
2. What number of Bibles and Testaments have been sold by the Auxiliary within the past year?
3. How many members, male and female, are there belonging to the Auxiliary?
4. What number of families of Friends reside within its limits?
5. Are there any families of Friends within your limits not supplied with a copy of the Holy Scriptures in good clear type, and on fair paper; if so, how many?
6. How many members of our Society, capable of reading the Bible, do not own such a copy of the Holy Scriptures?
7. How many Bibles and Testaments may probably be disposed of by sale within your limits?
8. Is the income of the Auxiliary sufficient to supply those within its limits who are not duly furnished with the Holy Scriptures?
9. What number of Bibles and Testaments would it be necessary for the Bible Association to furnish gratuitously, to enable the Auxiliary to supply each family?
10. What number would be required in order to furnish to each member of our religious Society, capable of reading, who is destitute of a copy, and unable to purchase it?
11. How many Bibles and Testaments are now on hand?

Among the many strange customs of savage nations, not the least curious are the ceremonies observances offered by them to the wild beasts which they hunt and kill. The boldest native hunters of British India would shudder at the thought of leaving the corpse of a slain tiger till they have singed off its whisker—to the very root, without which precaution they firmly believe that the ghost of the dead monster will haunt them into their graves. In many parts of Russia, the killing of a wolf is not thought complete without cutting off of the head and right fore-paw. The Lapps and Finns, whenever they kill a bear, surround the body with loud lamentations. One hunter then asks the dead bear, "Who killed thee?" and another answers "A Russian," when all the rest exclaim in chorus, "A cruel deed, a bloody deed;" hoping by this means to divert the bear's resentment from themselves to the imaginary Russian. Skulls of brown bears, nailed to the trees by the Indians, in compliance with some native superstition, are often found by Canadian camping parties in the woods around Lake Simcoe, and the tribes of Northern Siberia never kill a polar bear without extracting its two largest teeth, which, in their belief, is the only safeguard against its coming to life again.

Religious Items, &c.

Reactionary Influences.—The missionary enterprises in various parts of the world appear to have had the effect, which might have been anticipated, of stirring up the opposition of the advocates of those systems of religion from which converts have been made. In Japan a school has been founded "for educating priests" in the Buddhist faith, not only it is said to resist Christianity in their own land, but to send on proselyting missions to Europe and America. Mohammedanism has founded an immense university at Sierra Leon with similar motives; and is said to be receiving large accessions of numbers in some parts of Asia, Africa, and the Pacific Ocean Islands.

In the vicinity of Prague, in Austria, converts from the Roman Catholic Church have been fined and imprisoned; and at Vienna the Governor of the city has issued an order that adherents of religious communities not acknowledged by the State have no right to meet for religious purposes, except with members of their own families.

Simultaneously with the revision of the English Bible a similar work is going on in Germany. Luther's translation of the Scriptures is in the hands of a critical committee, which has been summoned to meet again this autumn. "This committee," says a German newspaper, "consisting partly of evangelical divines and partly of learned laymen, began its labors several years ago, but has not yet succeeded in getting beyond the book of Genesis."—Christian Advocate.

The Free Methodist Church was organized in the year 1860, in Niagara county, State of New York, by ministers and laymen who disagreed with the mother Church. In essential points of doctrine the Free Methodist Church does not differ from those taught in the Methodist Episcopal denomination. The principal matters of difference are in Church government. The ancient discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church forbade the wearing of gold or costly apparel, the plaiting of the hair or wearing flowers in the bonnet by the women. The discipline has been altered from time to time concerning these matters, until now one may look in vain for a greater display of richness and attractiveness in outward adornment than may be found within the walls of a fashionable M. E. church.

To be a member of the Free Methodist Church one must lay aside his golden adornents of every description, the women must search flowers from their hats, and all must dress after the plainest fashion. If a man or woman belong to any secret society he or she must first throw off all allegiance to the organization before being admitted into membership in the Free Methodist Church. No instrumental music of any kind or description is permitted to be used in their religious worship.

The present head of the most celebrated Mohammedan college, the University El-Zhar, at Cairo, is a Jewish convert, Abhassi—according to Ebers, a son of a prominent Israelite—whose conversion to Islam caused considerable excitement. Abhassi has held the position since 1871. He has 10,000 students and 300 professors under his control, and receives $10,000 yearly, and a palace for a residence.—Christian Advocate.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Honey-making Ants.—At a meeting of the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, C. C. McCook stated that he had during the last summer studied the habits of the honey-making and other species of the ants of the Rocky Mountain region. Dr. McCook had noted the formicaries near Colorado Springs, first within the entrance to the Garden of the Gods. The nests in the locality indicated are scattered haphazard, but seem to be located with a fixed idea of securing their permanence and safety along the tops of ridges of red sandstone, ninety per cent. of the formicaries being thus placed.

The exterior architecture of the nests was illustrated by a specimen which had been preserved intact by saturating it with cement. It was two inches wide across the top, tenches at the base, and about three inches high. A tubular opening, three-fourths of an inch in diameter descends to a depth of three inches into the chambers of the formicary. One of these chambers were exposed, and in each was found an average of thirty honey-makers hanging from the roofs, which were quite rough, thus enabling the insects to cling by means of their mandibles and feet. They rarely fall, except when disturbed, but when they do, they are carefully replaced by the workers, who carry them up the perpendicular walls of the cutting.

The species seems to have been first described in the Bulletin of the Academy of Sciences of Brussels, in 1838, by Wesmael, who was informed by the Baron de Noirmont, the French Envoy to Mexico, that after the honey was elaborated by the makers, it was stored up in a receptacle similar to the cells of bees. This, however, is not the case. The honey forming material is supplied by the workers to the honey makers, and is stored permanently in their abdomens until required for food, when it is gradually disgorged. To effect this the honey bearer starts erect, throws his head up, the worker starts erect, presses the muscles of the abdomen forces the honey up until a portion of it hangs as a little globe from the mandibles, where it is collected by the workers and supplied to those requiring food. The queen, the males, or drones, and the grubs are nourished in this way during the winter and times of scarcity, although during the summer season they are probably supplied directly with the substance from which the honey is formed.

Dr. McCook had at first been at a loss to determine how the supply of honey was obtained. There were no aphides or plant lice from which other ants receive their supply to be seen anywhere in the region. The difficulty of deciding this important point was increased by the fact that the insects are nocturnal in their habits, remaining quiet and secluded during the day. They were observed to swarm out of their nests about half-past seven every evening, and to return with swollen abdomens about half-past eleven o'clock at night. After several unsuccessful attempts to follow their movements, they were at last observed to gather upon the galls of a certain species of scrub oak, from the surface of which they gather a sweet exudation. This is supplied by the workers to the honey-makers, and is the material from which the honey is formed.

Dr. Leidy remarked that he had been informed that these insects were used in Mexico as dessert, the sweet contents of the abdomens being pressed into the mouth much in the same way that the pulp is pressed from the skin of the grape.

Dr. McCook remarked that he had tasted the honey elaborated by the ants and found it to be of a delightful flavor. The honey formed from sugar by individuals in captivity had not the same peculiar aromatic sharpness as that collected from the galls. He believed the dark color of some of the honey, together with the distinctive taste, came with age.—Public Ledger.

Rust on Grain.—Prof. DeBary, of Strasbourg, has shown that the spores of certain minute fungi, found in the little cluster-cups on the under surface of the leaves of the Barberry and other plants, when brought into contact with growing rye, immediately begin to germinate, and produce a destructive form of rust. This confirmed the assertion made by old farmers that the shrubs of Barberry were injurious to rye and oats. In the same way it has been shown that other rust diseases are originated from the cluster-cups growing on other plants in the neighborhood of the grain fields.

An Enemy to Young Fish.—Seth Green, the fish culturist, thus describes one of the difficult cutties in the way of raising trout: "There is a small worm which spins a web in the water to catch young fish, just as a spider does on land to catch flies. I have seen them make the web and take the fish. The web is as perfect as that of the spider, and as much mechanical ingenuity is displayed in its construction. It is made as quickly, and in the same way as the spider's, by fastening the threads at different points, and going back and forth until the web is finished. The threads are not strong enough to hold the young trout after the mandible has seized the web, but the web will stick to the fins and get around the head and gills, and soon kills the fish. I have often seen it on the young trout, and it has been a great mystery and caused me many hours, days and weeks of wonder to find out what was wound around the heads and fins of my young trout and killed them. I did not find out till lately, while watching recently-hatched white-fish. These are much smaller than the trout when they begin to swim, and they were caught and held by the web. I found ten small white-fish caught in one web in one night."

Wood set on fire by a steam pipe.—At the Crescent Steel Works, a steam pipe carrying 90 to 100 lbs. pressure was laid under ground about three years ago, encased in common pine boards. Recently, occasion was had to dig up the pipe, and the whole length of the wooden drain was found to be charred, and apparently burnt; with here and there spots of white ashes, showing that ignition had actually taken place. It seems probable that if the casing had not been excluded from air by the earth covering, it would have blazed and been entirely consumed. It is generally believed a steam pipe cannot set fire to wood, but this seems to prove the contrary.

Cold feet and sleeplessness are often connected. For sleep is difficult if a full supply of blood is sent to the brain, and the feet are cold if the circulation in them is languid. Women are often subject to both these evils. As a remedy, it is recommended, before going to bed to dip the feet in cold water for a brief period, and then rub them well with a towel till they glow.

Locusts.—These insects have been very destructive in some portions of Hungary. To prevent an extension of the disaster 3600 men were employed. About 100,000 fathoms of trenches were dug with a view of temporarily arresting the insects in their onward progress. As these were filled with them every few minutes, piles of straw ready at hand were heaped in them and set on fire. The trenches were then quickly cleared out to be ready for a fresh swarm. In this manner, the work of destruction was continued day and night.

Shipwreck averted by oil.—On the 1st of 4th month last, the British brigantine Gem, bound from Wilmington, N. C., took a heavy gale of wind about a degree to the eastward of Bermuda. The wind blew a hurricane for 36 hours, and the ship labored heavily in a cross-breaking sea. At 8 p. m., the sea getting worse, the master thought of resorting to the oil experiment which he had read of in Chambers' Journal; and had a canvas bag prepared holding about three quarts of kerosene oil, with a rope of six fathoms attached, and kept trailing to the windward. The oil leaking through the canvas greatly broke the sea and made matters much more favorable for the ship. This was kept up through the night, and at 3 a. m. on the 2nd the weather began to moderate. The mate, who had himself lashed to his rigging during the whole of his watch, believed with the captain that the resort to the oil saved the ship, as such fearful weather had never been witnessed by the captain during an experience of 14 years. A drop of the oil will smooth about four feet circumference of sea.

Devotion of a dog to a cat.—When staying near Lausanne this spring, I met some Swiss friends of my host's, who told us a remarkable instance of attachment on the part of their St. Bernard dog to a kitten. Their next door neighbors threw some newly-born kittens over the garden wall that the dog might make away with them. He caught and bit one kitten as intended, and one was killed by the kill. Bernard now seems to have undergone a revulsion of feeling, for the two remaining kittens became the objects of his attention and caring. Carrying them off in his mouth to his kennel he tried to revive them by licking and warming them. One soon died, but the other responded to the care bestowed on it by its huge nurse, which was supplemented by the kindness and feeding of Bernard's owners. It threw in its kennel home, where the pair were constantly to be seen together, the soft little black cat lying cuddled in Bernard's protecting arm, whence its bright eyes peeped out at passers-by. In the course of time passy became the proud mother of a family, and she was impatient to introduce her kittens to her adopted father. Mewling and skipping before him she conducted Bernard from his kennel to her cosy nest, rolling over and over with delight on the grass near, while he solemnly inspected his favorite's family; thus showing the strongest proof possible in an animal of confidence and affection. The regard which existed between the two friends lasted through life.—D. Hoskyns in Science Gossip.

General Jesse H. Drake, a venerable North Carolinian, has left his whole fortune, of comfortable size, to three of his former slaves, Calvin Drake, Aaron Drake and Judah Drake, for their lives, with reversal to their children. He leaves all his estate, real and personal, to them, and says: "They have been my faithful slaves, and have remained with me since their freedom, nursing and caring for me in my old age, and I desire them to share my gratitude."

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 11, 1879.

The summer which has just past has been a remarkably healthy one in this city. Its inhabitants have been spared a visitation of disease such as has carried sorrow and alarm to the hearts of multitudes in some of the cities in the Southern States; while plentiful supplies of the necessaries of life, and the means wherewith to purchase them, have been within the reach of the great mass of the population. For these blessings, feelings of thankfulness should arise in our hearts to the Author of all good, who is graciously pleased to accept the tribute of gratitude from them who are touched with a sense of his mercies; and who has promised to reward such with a further manifestation of his loving kindness.

In this day of activity and engrossing cares, too many are so occupied with the pursuit of pleasure or business, or so inconsiderate to their obligations as dependent beings, as to neglect the solemn duty of praising and giving thanks for the benefits received from the all-beneficial Hand; though this is a duty which is as expressly commanded as that of prayer; but which, to be acceptable to the Lord, must be offered under a sense of the qualifying influence of his own Holy Spirit.

Nor is this reverent gratitude called for from the residents of this city and neighborhood alone. From various parts of our widely extended country, we receive accounts of an abundant yield of the great agricultural products—the prospect of a larger crop of cotton than was ever before known, and a supply of grain sufficient for home consumption, and leaving an enormous surplus to meet the demand from foreign countries. The general revival of business which has manifested commenced, and in whose benefit the great laboring classes of the community most largely partake, is an additional cause for thankfulness to Him whose tender mercies are over all his works.

The Psalmist queries, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?" May the response in our hearts be, as it was with him, "I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature for 9th month, at Philadelphia, was 64.4 degrees. Highest temperature 86 deg. on the 1st; lowest 43 deg. on the 26th. Monthly range 43. Total rainfall 1.12 inches. Number of days on which rain fell, 9. Frosts occurred on the 26th and 27th. Prevailing direction of wind, south.

Secretary Sherman has decided that silver certificates mutilated to extent of one-tenth or more, must be presented for redemption to the Treasurer of the United States, in accordance with the regulation governing the redemption of the U. S. notes—that is, that silver certificates mutilated to the extent of one-tenth, are redeemable at nine-tenths of full face value, two-tenths at eight-tenths, three-tenths at seven-tenths of their full face value. Fragments of notes, each constituting clearly one-half, are redeemable at half the full face value of such whole notes.

Imports of goods from the Treasury during last month were, on account of civil and miscellaneous, $4,203,273.40; war, $4,131,876.37; navy, $1,840,154.57; Interior (Indians and pensions), $8,778,785.70—total, $18,914,040.10. This does not include payments made on account of interest or principal of the public debt of the United States.

During the past year, the American Bible Society has printed an average of 1,000 copies a day of its ten cent Testament, and still did not keep up with its orders. About 550 copies of twenty-five cent Bibles have been printed daily.

Serious trouble is apprehended with the Indians of Colorado. Information has been received by the Indian Bureau, that the agent and all the employees at the White River Agency, have been killed by the hostile Utes, and that there has been a fight with the troops, in which the officers in command have been killed. The troops were surrounded after water, and their trains captured.

Professor Wise, the aeronaut, accompanied by George Barr, left St. Louis in a balloon on the 29th ult., and, after a residence of five days in the air, they are lost. Of the 232 deaths in Philadelphia during last week, 45 were of consumption; 10 congestion of the lungs; 12 cancer; 5 typhoid fever; 11 inflammation of the lungs; chloera infantum 8; old age 15.

Large quantities of anthracite coal, from all the regions, for the week ending on the 27th ult., amounted to 195,191 tons, an increase of 324,540 tons over the corresponding week of last year. The price of coal has been advanced by several companies, but it is said to be fully one dollar per ton lower than it should be.

Long-timings for Government bonds: U. S. 1881, 105½; 5's, 1881, registered, 102½; do, coupon, 103½; 4½ per cents, 1891, 105½; 4's, 102½.

Cotton continues dull, and prices favor buyers. Sales of middlings at 10½ a 10½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude 6½ cts. in barrels; and refined 7½ cts. for export, and 7½ a 8 cts. per gallon for home use. Lined oil, 61 a 62 cts. for American, and 63 a 61 cts. for Calcutta. 1 lb. oil, 52 a 55 cts.; Sperm, 60 cts.; Bleached tallow, 30 a 33 cts.

Long-timings for fair demand: Minnesota extra, 56 a 56½¢; Penna., $5.75 a $6.25; and Ohio and other western, $6.10 a $6.50 per barrel. Rye flour, $4.75. Corn meal, $2.75.

Grain.—What is in better demand and prices are higher. Wheat, No. 1 under, $1.29 a $1.34; Corn, 37 a 38 cts. Oats, mixed, 35 a 36½ cts.; white, 37 a 40 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw.—Average price during the week: Prime timothy, 80 a 90 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 65 a 75 cts.; straw, 85 cts. a 95 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—The market during the past week has been rather better, and prices show some improvement for good cattle. Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts.; common, 3 a 4 cts. per pound. Hogs, 5½ a 6 cts. as to quality. Sheep, 3 a 4 cts.; Lambs, 4 a 5 cts.

Long-timings for the 1st ult. of draw-out Directors, convicted of uttering false abstracts of balance sheets, and sentenced to eight months' imprisonment, were released on the 1st inst., amid the howlings of a crowd. Three others convicted at the same time of the same offence, will have still ten months' imprisonment to serve.

Fifteen thousand people were present at a land meeting held at York on the 5th inst. A member of Parliament for the county, and one of the Home Ru leaders, extolled Gladstone's land act. A Home Ru member for Meath declared that the tenants require no acts of Parliament. They should rely on passive physical resistance to unjust demands.

According to the last census, the population of Greece, which in 1870, was 1,457,884, amounts now to 1,700,000. The population of Athens has increased the same period from 48,000 to 70,000, and that of Piræens from 11,000 to double. By counting the Greeks living abroad, a total of about 2,000,000 population would be arrived at. The number of depopulated towns is said to be increased to 294, as the electoral law gives one deputy to every 10,000 inhabitants.

The yearly statistics for 1877, published in India show 19,695 persons were killed by wild beasts—461 elephants, 819 by tigers, 200 by leopards, 85 by bears, 562 by hyenas, 1,181 by wolves, 1,087 by other carnivorous animals, and 16,777 by snakes. Fifty-three thousand cats are also reported to have been killed. Under estimate of a reward amounting to more than £10,000, 22,559 wild beasts, and 127,295 snakes have been killed; large total in itself, but small compared with the loss of human and domestic animals.

A telegraph station has lately been erected at the Ryffel Hotel, under the Ryffelhorn, in the Valais, is about 8,500 feet above the sea level, and is the highest telegraph station in Europe. A Swiss paper claims it is the highest in the world; but the station on Pike Peak is 11,000 feet above sea level.

On first landing on the island, an observatory was constructed and the instruments erected at the little settlement near the landing place, where most of the inhabitants of the island live. But an unexpected difficulty presented. Almost every night, streaks of local clouds were developed by the projecting peak of Green Mountain—which were swept by the trade-wind across the field of view of the telescopes anxiously turned towards the planet Mars. After patient watching night after night for two weary weeks, with but little success, it was determined to examine whether another locality could not be found where the clouds would not interfere with the astronomer. So David was left in charge of the observatory, and at 10 p. m., his wife with two attendants set forth in the darkness. It was arranged that each should make simultaneous observations of the clouds every half-hour till 3 a. m., when the exploring party were to return. On comparing their notes it was evident that the clouds were only partial, that they formed over Green Mountain and floated westward towards the sea; so that all that was necessary was to find a location further south.

Near the south point of the island a little bay was discovered, with a small strip of sandy beach. On the rocks above this, it was determined to place the observatory. At day-break on the 1st of the Eighth month, the work of dismantling commenced, and is thus described: "Again the sound of tools were heard outside Commodore's Cottage, but not, it seemed to me, with the same pleasant ring, and I longed to run away somewhere beyond the noise. However, I had fortunately little time to indulge in fancies. Camp gear, stores, earthenware, glass, kitchen utensils, everything must be packed before 3 p. m., and stowed on board the steam-launch in readiness to sail at 6 o'clock the following morning.

"I often wonder how we got it done. I think it must have been, not only by the zealous assistance of officers and men, but by the stimulus we ourselves received from the inspiring atmosphere of sympathy and good will which surrounded us. At all events, before sunset, Commodore's Cottage was ruthlessly plundered of such of its contents as would fit our camp, and the croquet ground again stood empty as we had found it. I felt 'rooted up' and miserable; but without a doubt that we were on the right way. So, to cover my nervousness and restlessness, I went to bed.

"Next morning, as the sun rose, a rare procession passed down the coast. A steam-launch, with Captain Phillimore and David on board, towed along two well-laden lighters and a sailing pinnace, and carried, moreover, quite a tail of little surf-boats, or 'dingeys.' The busy trade-wind had sunk almost into a dead calm, the sea seemed still asleep, everything was in favor of an easy landing, and I felt hopeful, though anxiety made the hours seem long while I waited for news. I could neither read nor write, nor did idle musing soothe me, so I made believe to mend a pair of gloves, and ever after, when I wore them, I was wont to trace the anxious thoughts sewn in with every stitch. I take some pride in glove mending, but this pair shows many weak stitches, and sad botching, just where I threw them down in disgust, and bidding patience good-bye, put on my hat and walked into the noon-day sun.

"'Sister Anne! Sister Anne! do you see anybody coming?' 'No!' That movement far off among the clinker is only the rising of the heated air, trembling over the burning stones. That grating sound is not of wheels, nor is it the crack of a distant whip. It is only the morning gossip among these chattering grasshoppers. But at last, and sooner than I had any right to expect it, there was really the sound of wheels, and good news was brought to me. Everything had been landed without a scratch, the foundation of the Heliometer House was already laid, and the new harbor thus established, had been christened by Captain Phillimore 'Mars Bay.'

"On the following morning another procession wended its way from Garrison to Mars Bay—this time by land. It consisted of sixteen Kroomen, bearing the Heliometer-tube, Transit and other instruments. The Heliometer box was lashed to a mast and set out on its perilous journey, borne on the shoulders of eight Kroomen—four in front and four behind. The other eight carried the lighter boxes and acted as a reserve. Strong stalyward follows they were, looking like so many pillars sculptured in black marble; and we saw them start with something like confidence.

"Soon my husband followed in the vehicle (which by this time I had discovered it was legitimate to call a cart), but what was his horror, on overtaking the procession, to find that these faithless bearers had unsung the box, and were coolly carrying it on their heads. This mode of transport looked most unsafe, and he remonstrated, but to no purpose. 'Krooboy must carry thing on his head—he no can carry with pole—get tired.' And so the trembling astronomer was fain to be content for the first part of the way, but when the plain was past and the clinker appeared, his patience gave way; he could bear it no longer. The box was accordingly lashed to the mast again, amid some grumbling at first, but it soon passed off, and a few kind words made the shining black faces as genial as ever. Then, with slow and careful steps, and with much laughing and chattering, the precious thing was borne over the rocks in safety, and when at last Mars Bay was reached, its tired guardian sighed out in his relief, 'All's well that ends well.'

Our author says, "I am at a loss how to convey to any one who has not seen it, an idea of what sort of flooring clinker makes. Imagine the neighborhood of a great iron foundry strewn with the accumulated slag of years—some of it in rough compact masses of various sizes—some reduced by the action of time into a fine powder, ready to be stirred into a cloud with every breath of wind."

Here they pitched their tents, arranged their goods, and made their observations. The faithful wife shared in her husband's labors; and found that watchful nights made weary days. She says: "My husband had the first watch each night, then I took his place in the morning, to call him on the least appearance of blue sky; and in this way I do not think that a single opportunity of observation was lost. It was really no hardship to be abroad during these lovely nights. The stillness of the earth charmed the soul into a priceless peace, while 'From the door of a tent the only splendor came from the mysterious, inaccessible stars.' The cool air was delightful in its freshness, and I used to feel less sleepy here by night than when the fierce sun of noonday shone upon us with all its stupefying power."

One morning, "David was busy with hammer and saw, making me a work-table out of some odds and ends of undressed planks, and I was toiling, hot and awkward, 'getting up' the first week's wash, when Hill interrupted our labors with the welcome news, 'Please, sir, the mail!' Down went hammer and saw; down went the flat-iron and burned a hole in my pet collar.

"Those unhappy people, who have the misfortune to hear the postman's daily knock, will not be able to realize the intense excitement and delight of mail-day after a newsless lapse of two months. It was really worth waiting for; every little item had gathered interest from every salt wave it had crossed, and each home-name had won a sweeter tone from each hour of silence. How often I read these letters I know not, nor should I like to tell how much time I devoted to the perusal of the newspapers.

"All the male population was aglow for war news, and I tried to be interested, but could feel little sympathy with Turk or Russian, while the tales told of both were so horrible, that I sickened as I read, and felt thankful that the din of battle came across the sea to us with a muffled sound.

"After the excitement of mail-day was over, I set about putting my house in order in right good earnest, having been able hitherto to do so only by snatches. Outside, great improvement had already been made by our servants and a party of Kroomen. The difficulty of getting from one tent to another over loose clinker stones was at first very great, and my shoes were sadly cut and torn in the process. But now, Hill and Graydon had removed many of these stones and established a branch system of little paths running from door to door, which the Kroomen filled up with beautiful white sand from the beach. The benefits of this work were manifold. It saved shoes and feet, showed a safe path at night, and, best of all, laid the dust to some extent; for what I have called sand is not really so, but minute fragments of shells and other disintegrated marine matter, worn very fine by the action of the waves, and too heavy to be stirred by the wind; hence the advantage of burying our dust in it."

Has Preaching Lost its Power?

A late Monthly Periodical, published in one of our northern cities, contains the sentiment that, "Preaching has lost its power," &c. If this be so, it must, methinks, proceed from one of two causes, viz: either that the preacher has not duly tarried for, and sought the anointing Power from on high; or that the want of longing, hungry and thirsty hearers causes the words spoken to fall from the hearer's ears as dead and unobtainable.

The ever-present, all-subduing, regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit of God, diminishes not where it is submitted to, neither waxeth old. "His hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither is his ear heavy, that it cannot hear." But, on the contrary, his almighty power, and all-sufficient grace are no less effectual now for the need of those who call upon Him, be it either preacher or hearer, than ever they were.

If then "preaching has lost its power," must it not be from the lack of vitality or prayerful application of soul unto and before Him who ruleth over all in heaven and in earth? in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; who is able to subdue all things unto himself; and who, when rightly sought unto for guidance and wisdom, "giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not."

We have often feared that a deficiency of quickening, living, all conquering faith in the Lord Jesus, "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, and a sincere, childlike dependence upon the inexhaustible Fountain of perennial grace that flows from Him, lies very much at the bottom of this loss of power, this want of a resurrection unto life and light, and fruitfulness in a day that so obviously calls for weeping as before the porch and the altar, that the Lord's cause or people be not given to reproach, nor that the hearer be not given to them.

We are taught by Him who cannot err, that if the branch abide in the Vine it must and will bring forth fruit to the praise of Him who, by the manifestation of his Spirit given to every man to profit withal, is still pleading in the heart, and calling all, in the obedience which is of faith in his almighty power, unto glory and virtue. Again it is written of the dear Son and Sent of the Father in the fulfilment of his benign mission of love and mercy upon earth, that in one place "He did not many mighty works because of their unbelief." Hence to make the word preached effectual, there must be practical faith in the listener as well as in the minister. For even living addresses require an attentive audience in order that good may be effected. Oh! the efficacy of a faith which is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen;" a "faith which works by love to the purifying of the heart;" a faith which overcomes the world; and wherewith, again testifies an apostle, "Ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."

When the Great Minister of ministers himself was upon earth, there were many up and down in Jewry who would not receive his doctrine; saying, on one occasion, "We will not have this man to reign over us." And, on another, it is recorded, that though a whole city went out to meet Jesus, "when they saw Him, they besought Him that he would depart out of their coasts." May it not be inferred from this and similar testimonies that there has ever been a strong repugnance in the unrenewed heart of man to the reign and government of the Prince of Peace, and to the establishment of his kingdom, consisting, when faithfully received, "in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," within them.

If those of that day could not receive or would not bear the dear Master himself, can we expect that those of this will appreciate the ministerial labors of the poor servant? Has not truth, to the carnal mind of man, well nigh always been a despised and neglected thing? Moreover it was declared that "The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears," &c. This being the case, will it be for those who profess to minister of holy things, so to let their Urim and Thummim be with the Holy One, that they humor not this longing desire for words, but rather may declare that and that only which is of and from Him; and thus, as was said to Jonah, "Preach the preaching that I bid thee." May these, as King David did, place the Lord alone before them. May they beware of outwardness in their ministrations. May they, in a measure of his own authority and power, direct the people to Christ the one great Teacher; to his anointing that abideth within and teacheth all things; and to his kingdom as a little seed, when first sown, in the depository of the heart. A pious author remarks to the effect, that the Lord will have no clipping and paring down of his message to suit the religious taste of the times. True it is in those days, that "many ran to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased;" but is there not cause for apprehension lest amid the great show of a profession of Christ, there is too little of a digging deep, that the foundation of the spiritual house may be permanently based on Him, the Rock. What is needed is, a watchfulness unto prayer, with a reverent waiting upon the All wise, the Ever-present, the inward infallible Teacher, who will then mediately through his servant or handmaid, communicate to the people, as He sees meet, of the gospel of the grace of God.

He will not withhold the neededunction neither fail to be mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance; the sling and the stone, the armor on the right hand and on the left sufficient unto all He calls for at the hands of these anointed messengers of mercy, be it either to weary and heavy laden, or to disobedient, unrepentant and guilty souls.

May then the earnest concern with preacher and hearer be, to wait diligently upon the Lord, for the renewing of their spiritual strength. May they both alike in emptiness and uningenuity of self tarry as at the city of Jerusalem until "endued with power from on high." May they all reverently abide the day of the Lord's coming, that, purged by his refining fire as gold and silver are purged, they may be enabled, from hearts purified and from affections and talents sanctified, to offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. "Then," as is written, "shall the offerings of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in former years;" and the complaint that "preaching has lost its power" because of the absence of vitality, in wordliness, and strength in the minister, or of worldly-mindedness, unbelief or indifference in the hearer, will no more plaintively be heard among us.

1857. 31 mo. 29th. A comfortable meeting—how encouraging. I feel the care of business to bear unpleasantly heavy upon me, yet I believe there is a Power that can preserve; may the Great Head be looked unto, reverenced and obeyed; He is forever worthy.

6th mo. 8th. I attended our last Yearly Meeting. Part of the time was a humbling, trying [season] to those who are livingly concerned that the will of the Great Head of the Church may be done, that He may rule and reign in his church, and that we may be enabled to bear our testimony faithfully, as He is pleased to require of us, to the precious doctrines and testimonies of the Christian religion, in the support of which our early Friends, in that wisdom and strength which alone come from the Great Head of the Church, were so wonderfully enabled to suffer for. We have been mercifully favored to transact the business of the Yearly Meeting, without a separation; parting with the comfortable hope of meeting again in a Yearly Meeting capacity. May those who may be favored again to meet to transact the business of our Yearly Meeting, experience a being brought unto a humble, child-like frame of mind, having no will of their own, but sincerely desiring that in all things, the will of the Great Head of the Church may be done. It seems to me that those who act in these important matters in their own will, wisdom and strength, take upon them a great and fearful responsibility.

6th mo. 9th. It ought to be in deep humility and feelings of gratitude, that I attempt to record the unmerited mercies of a kind and merciful Master to me a poor, and very unworthy sinner, unworthy of the unspeakable favor. I have for some time past, at times, been favored to feel love to my Divine Master, which has been comforting, precious and strengthening. May it, through unmerited mercy, be continued, and may I be more given up to serve Him, the Great Giver of all our blessings. I believe He is a rich rewarder of all who diligently serve Him. What encouragement to all to persevere in well doing. The time will soon come when our labors and the trials which may be permitted to come upon us on earth, will end.

6th mo. 10th. This has been a day of great awe, worthy to be long remembered with feelings of deep gratitude to the Great Giver of all good. There is none like unto Him, worthy to be loved and served; loved with the whole heart by all the human family, and served in all things as would be pleasing unto Him.

7th mo. 8th. I have passed through some anxiety on account of the hurry and difficulty of collecting the harvest. Have been much favored in getting help, (also with) spiritual refreshment, although very unworthy; may these blessings be highly valued.

7th mo. 15th. I feel bound to acknowledge the continuation of the unmerited favors and blessings of my kind and merciful Master, both spiritually and temporally. I have been favored with precious refreshing seasons, and with sufficient help to collect our harvest, which came without my going to hunt them, and relieved me of much anxiety of mind in getting along with business. These favors seem to call for gratitude from me.

7th mo. 18th. I think something like this is the language of Holy Writ, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God." May my whole dependence be upon Him who made me, and may I improve by the dispensation of his mercies.

8th mo. 6th. I have passed through much anxiety of mind, some on account of business and a good deal on account of father's indisposition. I have no doubt that these trials have been permitted in mercy for my good, as I have been much favored in seasons of trial.

9th mo. 25th. Though very unworthy, I have in unmerited mercy been much favored at seasons to approach Him from whom every blessing comes; may there be more faithfulness and humility in time to come.

10th mo. 18th. A humbling trying meeting; what a poor creature I am; our poverty is often, I think, caused by our not living near enough to the Great Head of the Church. How great is his mercy! Praised be His great and excellent name, worthy to be honored and obeyed by all the human family.

11th mo. 4th. Our Monthly Meeting held at Caln; a pretty comfortable meeting; what a favor we are not forsaken, and that the Great Head of the Church, in unmerited mercy, is pleased to enable us to feel his good presence in our little meeting; may the blessings be gratefully received, and our time and talents used in serving Him, as He may please to require of us. Oh! the sweet reward He is pleased to give to those who serve Him.

11th mo. 22d. Our meeting, I think, was a quite comfortable one; — of Philadelphia, appeared in supplication. May thanksgiving and praise be given to Him, from whom every blessing comes, who is forever worthy of more than language can express. May gratitude flow from the bottom of our hearts unto Him.

12th mo. 1st. Great are the mercies of our Divine Master to me a poor sinner. I have, in mercy, at seasons been favored to feel a little lossed from the world, the fear of death in some measure taken away. May I live near to Him from whom every blessing comes, and be a fruit-bearing branch, to the praise of his great and excellent name.

12th mo. 13th. First-day, we have in unmerited mercy been favored with, I think an unusually solemn quiet meeting, held in silence; but I think the Great Head of the Church ministered to the comfort and help of some. Great are the mercies of our dear and Divine Master; oh, for myself and all others, that we may endeavor to live near to Him, love and serve Him in the way He is pleased to require.

The "Travelling Rocks."

[The observations made by our correspondent on the effects of the ice on the lake near which he lived, are so interesting, that we cheerfully insert his communication. But the theory which he advances to explain the facts observed, it is probable, will not carry a conviction of its soundness to the minds of all his readers. As water always expands in freezing, and with almost irresistible force, the sudden conversion of the surface of so extensive a body of it into ice, furnishes a source of power and motion, that to some persons seems sufficient to produce all the "travelling" of the rocks.—Eds.]

This, so-called "strange scene," copied from the Nineteenth Century, on page 38 of the present volume of "The Friend," describes a similar phenomenon to that mentioned in the latter Journal not very long since, with equal surprise and curiosity, but is one not unfamiliar to persons living near shallow lakes in cold latitudes.

My younger years were passed in a locality of that nature, and after considerable examination and study, I arrived at a solution—satisfactory to myself at least—of the action and forces concerned, though there was some discrepancy—or as I then thought—perplexity, of sentiment in the neighborhood in regard to it, such as the action of the wind on the ice, &c., but evidently of little or no weight.

Observing that this action, or "shoving" of the ice, occurred only after severe and protracted cold terms of several weeks duration, and generally, too, on a full condition of the lake, and then not until after some days and nights of "volcanic rumblings," or loud and almost continuous reports from the "cracking" of the hard, thick ice, caused doubtless by the gradual settling of the water beneath through the earth and the other natural outflows; when the immense weight of millions of tons of ice on the surface, with of necessity follow it down for its normal support, and thus of course producing a concavity of surface, as the ice near the shores rested on the bottom and could not fall. Therefore as it went down in the deeper water, it must break or "crack," and these numerous cracks, opening on the under-side to admit of this concavity, inevitably required additional space, and the ice consequently would be forced shorewards with great power, carrying with it whatever happened to be firmly embedded in it, such as large boulders, and the accumulated earth and stones pushed up before them.

The lake for which my observations were made, was some 3 to 4 miles in diameter, and from 1 or 2 to 6 feet deep. These occasional shoaler places, or long sandy ridges, where the ice would rest on the bottom, greatly added to the sum total of the concavities, and consequently shoreward expansion of the solid body of ice. If now, in these 3 miles of ice, one hundred cracks, or seams, were required to fully accommodate the unevenness of the surface, and—the ice being 18 to 24 inches thick—each seam should open one inch at the bottom, or half an-inch at the centre of the thickness, it would make a total expansion of 50 inches, and so on for a greater number, and I have seen a somewhat greater movement than this, say from 1 or 2 to 3 or 6 feet in a winter; but the action was exceedingly irregular, being dependent upon so many conditions, that it was most often absent altogether. All of these conditions, however, went to support this theory. One was, that unless the cold came on sudden and severe, the whole surface of the lake would not be closed up, but a long open central space be left in the direction of the outlet, in which case no degree of cold there occurring, after it had been left open a few days, was ever sufficient to close it, and consequently however long and severe the cold, there would be no movement of the ice; and even when the conditions were favorable, if the water was low, or beyond the obstructions, the ice would merely shore up a few feet on the flat shores, and attract the attention only of the close observer.

But when the lake was full up to the frozen banks, and bold or rocky fronts were offered, there would at times be a grand display of the mighty forces at work. The frozen earth, with the standing brush and trees, would be broken into, and forced up and back, or the thick ice be shoved under it, and if cold rocks interposed, the ice would break up in long triangular ridges of several feet high. I have also noticed boulders which happened to lie in right positions, with bold fronts to the offing, and weighing perhaps 3 to 4 tons, where deep ditches could be traced for a number of rods out, with a small mound of earth in their rear, or inshore side, and with the last year's or winter's movement plainly distinguishable from those previously made; and for which singular and powerful action I was able to discover no other sufficient source than that named, viz., the superincumbent weight of the whole mass of ice on the lake, exerted in the manner described.

David, and the Psalms.

In recurring to the history of David, as recorded in the Old Testament, we find that he was chosen of God in his youth, from among the eight sons of Jesse, and anointed to be king in the place of Saul, who had been disobedient to the Lord's commands, and whom He rejected from being king over Israel. It was written of him: "The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward."

He passed through many sore trials; and deep provings and distresses were experienced ere he ascended to the throne; and not the least among these were, perhaps, the threatenings of Saul, and his determined efforts to seek his life to destroy it.

Many of the Psalms of David were no doubt elicited by his distresses; and have been handed down for the instruction and comfort of mankind; pointing to the alone Source of strength to whom all may apply in times of trouble.

It was whilst in the caves of Engedi and Adullam, where David at times sought refuge from Saul, that some of the most pathetic of his Psalms were uttered; for it was at such times, when encompassed about by his enemies, and feeling he had no might nor strength of his own, that he turned in his distress unto the Lord, who only could deliver him from the hand of his pursuer. He says, in the one hundred and forty-second Psalm, fourth verse: "I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me; refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul." It was then he cried unto the Lord, saying, "Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living." And in the sixty-fourth; first, second and third verses, he puts up the petition: "Hear my voice, O God, in my prayer; preserve my life from fear of the enemy. Hide me from the secret council of the wicked; for the insurrection of the workers of iniquity; who whet their tongue like a sword, and bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words."

It was not only with outward enemies that David had to contend, for he no doubt knew full well the meaning of the language uttered by the Redeemer himself: "And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." Which language, though at the particular time put forth, may have had a direct outward application, yet it has also its spiritual significance; for there are many who can testify that their inward and spiritual enemies are numerous, far exceeding any of an outward nature; and they are ready to exclaim as David did; "I have mine enemies, I triumph over me;" as well as to acknowledge with him: "Mine enemies are lively, and they are strong."

The songs or Psalms of thanksgiving which were uttered by David, were penned not only in times of joy and rejoicing of spirit, and when deliverance from outward or inward enemies was vouchsafed him; but also in seasons of great distress. When he felt himself to be in the very midst of afflictions and provings, he was enabled to give praise unto the Lord; saying, at a time when he felt all the waves and the billows were passing over him; "Yet the Lord will command his loving kindness in the day time, and in the night his song shall be in my mouth, and my prayer unto the God of my life." And in the fifty-seventh Psalm, fourth verse: "My soul is among lions, and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword;"—his praise was unto the Most High; for he says,— "I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people; I will sing unto thee among the nations. For thy mercy is great unto the heavens, and thy truth unto the clouds; be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; let thy glory be above all the earth."

We find the book of Psalms replete with the many precious promises of the Most High, as transmitted through the medium of some of his servants formerly. But these promises, as well as the very many others recorded in Holy Writ, are not to be laid hold of, or accepted as fulfilled promises to the individual, until they become sealed upon the heart of the recipient, as it may please the gracious Promiser himself in his abundant love and mercy to bestow them.

The promises of the Lord are sure promises, they never fail; but he who would have them applied to himself, must first know a desire to be begotten in his heart to please the great Giver; and by yielding unto Him true obedience in all things, seek diligently to serve Him with the whole heart; then, when the need is felt for the application of the promise, and the fervent petition is raised for help, with a willingness to wait the Lord's time for the bestowal thereof, he may, with an humble confidence, trust the Lord for its fulfilment.

AUTUMN.

Bright spring has gone, and "summer past"
The "harvest" nearly "ended"
Their dying beauty, wisdom hath
In Autumn richly bended.

The "melancholy days" are here,
With falling leaves around us;
The songs which fill the spirit's ear,
The changes which surround us—

Are only harbingers of what
Has been for countless ages;
While care for coming want and cold,
The thoughtful mind engages.

I never saw the Autumn flowers
With bloom more bright and fair;
I never heard the song of bird
More sweetly fill the air.

And yet, amid it all, there is
A tone that none can tell,
A something that the heart can feel
Is in the word—farewell.

Not hopeless—for they will return
In all their former beauty,
To bless the children who remain,
And lighten earthly duty.

But oh! between this time and then,
Is cold, stern winter lying;
And "death the wall of wind and storm"
We see the Old Year dying.

To feel how little we have done,
How much has been neglected;
To know amid our gathered sheaves,
Few golden grains perfected.

No wonder that the old man's locks
Are thinned by grief and care;
No wonder that his garb is such
As worn-out pilgrims wear.

Darkened by frowns of frost and shade,
Shake by doubts and fears;
While the verdant spots on his sunburnt cheek
Are watered by patient tears.

And yet sometimes his shroud is bright,
His raiment white as snow,
And we would say his faltering steps,
And sigh to have him go.

Not that we love this world so well,
With all its changeful joy;
But we would struggle to possess
What time cannot destroy;

Would know the garden of the heart,
Where goodly seeds are sown,
To yield sweet flowers, and bear such fruit
As Heaven would gladly own.

Receive our blessings day by day,
With thankfulness for each;
And from the trials when they come
Learn lessons they should teach.

Of patient thought and tender care,
For those who pass our way,
A kind and sympathetic word
To greet the sad or gay.

To watch our own enfeebled steps
To see their heavenward end;
And then with loving anxious eye,
Watch over foe and friend.

Remembering most the need of prayer,
That clouds are for all ill,
And aid us in our weak resolves
To do "Our Father's will."

Thus could we live, life's autumn hour
Would come in quiet gladness,
And we could view the solemn scene
With scarce a shade of sadness.

For know we not there is a land
Where hope and trust may centre;
A changeless joy, of rest and peace
Where souls redeemed shall enter.

"HE KNOWETH THE WAY THAT I TAKE.

I know not—the way is so misty—
The joys or the griefs it shall bring,
What clouds are of changing the future,
What flowers by the roadside shall spring;
But there's One who will journey beside me,
Nor in wear nor in woe will forsake;
And this is my solace and comfort—
"He knoweth the way that I take."

I stand where the cross roads are meeting,
And know not the right from the wrong;
No beckoning fingers direct me,
No welcome floats to me in song;
But my guide will soon give me a token
By wilderness, mountain or lake—
Whatever the darkness about me—
"He knoweth the way that I take."

And I know that the way leadeth homeward
To the land of the pure and the best,
To the country of ever-fair summer,
To the city of peace and of rest;
And there shall be healing for sickness,
And fountains, life's fever to slake,
What matters beside? I go heavenward—
"He knoweth the way that I take."

Cast a Line for Yourself.—A young man stood listlessly watching some anglers on a bridge. He was poor and dejected. As he approached a basket filled with wholesome looking fish, he sighed:

"If now I had these, I would be happy. I could sell them at a fair price and buy me food and lodgings."

"I will give you just as many, and just as good fish," said the owner, who had chanced to overhear his words, "if you will do me a trifling favor."

"And what is that?" asked the other.

"Only to tend this line till I come back, I wish to go on a short errand."

The proposal was gladly accepted. The old man was gone so long that the young man began to get impatient. Meanwhile the fish snapped greedily at the baited hook, and the young man lost all his depression in the excitement of pulling them in; and when the owner returned, he had caught a large number. Counting out from them as many as were in the basket, and presenting them to the young man, the old fisherman said:

"I fulfil my promise from the fish you have caught to teach you whenever you see others earning what you need, to waste no time in foolish fishing, but cast a line for yourself!"

"For The Friend."

William Cullen Bryant.

"It is sometimes remarked that Bryant wrote little; and, if we have in mind only what he has published in books, this is true. If, however, we take into the account his editorial contributions during the fifty-two years of his connection with The Post, he is one of the most voluminous writers that ever lived. At a moderate average, his editorials alone would fill more than a hundred duodecimo volumes of five hundred pages each,—a mass of literature that no American writer has exceeded. And, what is more important, most of these writings are fairly worthy of the name literature, whether we consider the topics, ranging through the whole realm of public questions for half a century; the originality of treatment, often disclosing the widest scholarship and the most profound reflection; or the style, always pure, clear, and forcible, and often chastely elegant. Behind this editor's desk there sat a master of many languages, a traveller in foreign lands, a student of various sciences, a poet of unquestioned genius, a moralist of high principles, a critic of keen penetration. The man in whom all these were united made it a special object of endeavor always to write the best thoughts in the best manner."

"His attitude on the subject of slavery was for a time ambiguous. During the discussion of this momentous problem, he paid several visits to the Southern States; but there is in his letters no protest against the 'great wrong' of human bondage. He describes Southern manners, paints pictures of Southern life, and refers to the condition of the slaves, without criticism upon the institution against which he agitators of Boston were declaiming in ones of thunder. He seemed to them cold and heartless, as did also the majority of men at that time. But, as we view him now, his silence and statue-like impassiveness seem like those of Nemesis, mutely contemplating the atrocities of men before the falling of her avenging sword. He was willing to await the 'appointed time'; but, when at length it came, he sang the dirge of Slavery in words that were gathering force during a long period of silence:—

"O thou great Wrong, that, through the slow-paced years,

Didst hold thy millions fettered, and didst wield
The scourge that drove the laborer to the field,
And turn a sony gear on human tears!

Thy cruel reign is o'er:
Thy bondmen crouch no more
In terror at the menace of thy eye;

For He who marks the bonds of guilty power,
Long-suffering, hath heard the captive's cry,

And touched his shackles at the appointed hour,
And, lo! they fall, and he whose limbs they galled Stands in his native manhood, disenthralled."

"Bryant looked to journalism for his bread, and pursued it for the greater part of his life as diligently as he would have followed any other vocation. His poetry was never a considerable source of pecuniary profit to him, and he held his gift of song too sacred to mortgage his inspirations. His associate, J. Bigelow, informs us that he never engaged in any other business than journalism, never embarked in any financial speculations, and was never an officer of any other financial or industrial corporation than The Evening Post. Speaking of his industry, he adds, 'He was as loyal to his profession as it was to him. I think it quite safe to say that for five days out of every week, during at least forty-two of his fifty-two years of editorial service, W. C. Bryant was at his editorial desk before eight o'clock in the morning, and left the daily impress of his character and genius in some form upon the columns of his journal."

As illustrating his kindly feelings, one of his associate editors says "that he was requested by the editor-in-chief to 'deal very gently with the poets, especially the weaker ones.' On one occasion the reviewer fell upon a sad case of 'poetic idioey,' and expressed his embarrassment to Bryant, saying that the book was so poor that there was nothing in it 'to praise, or even lightly to condemn.'—'No,' he replied; 'you can't praise it, of course, it won't do to lie about it; but' turning the volume over in his hand, and inspecting it—'you might say that the binding is securely put on, and that—well, the binder has planed the edges pretty smooth.'

"In all details he was a strict economist, and made economy the rule of the establishment, by his example rather than by precepts. Nearly all his editorials were written upon the backs of old letters, which a less conscientious man would have been ashamed to use. His time was 'carefully economized; and though he had his hours of relaxation and literary diversion, no fragment of time was wasted. Even his amusements were parts of a comprehensive system.

"Absolute truthfulness was a law of his life. Whatever he said he believed to be true, and even 'his silence was truthful.' He never flattered, and seldom praised. His virtue led him almost to rudeness, in the judgment of many; and he has been charged with being more frigid than gentility permits. His friends, however, found him cordial, and attribute his apparent insensibility to an unwillingness to express an interest which he did not feel.

"As we look back over the half century of Bryant's life as an editor, we learn two important lessons. The first, that the highest literary character can be maintained by one who is daily engaged in the practical discussions of his time; the second is, that personal nobility of mind, and integrity of life, may be preserved in the midst of political controversy. To have taught these lessons alone is a sufficient reason for a lifetime of toil and sacrifice. Whoever henceforth doubts that a man may be at once a serene scholar, a pure moralist, a faithful citizen, and an active politician, may be directed with republican pride to the career of William Cullen Bryant."

With regard to his Thanatopsis, the author of the Life, from which these sketches have been drawn, admits the charge of materialism which has been advanced against it. He says, it "is truly a Pagan poem; and no one can read it, remembering the possibilities of a Christian poem on the same theme, without feeling that it is. It is without deity, soul, immortality, or conscience. There can be little doubt, that, when Bryant wrote this poem, he contemplated death for the moment, from a Pagan point of view. He laid the poem aside; it was discovered by his father, admired, and published. But it did not accord with Bryant's real views on the subject. This is evident from the added paragraph, in which he strove to divest the poem of some of its harshness. It was impossible for Bryant to express his true views in this poem without marring its consistency; but turn to the lines entitled 'Blessed are They that Mourn,' and see how Christian faith lifts the veil for a moment:—

"For God hath marked each sorrowing day,
And numbered every secret tear,
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all his children suffer here."

These were the sentiments of his young manhood, and time only rendered them more precious to him.

"For 'The Friend.'"

Circular of the Bible Association of Friends in America.

In again calling the attention of Auxiliaries to the Annual Queries to be answered previous to the general meeting of the Association on the 5th of Eleventh month, the Corresponding Committee would press upon Friends, who have been engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, the importance of furnishing full and accurate answers to all the Queries, and of forwarding their report seasonably to the Depository.

It may be recollected, that in making donations to Auxiliaries, the Board are guided in deciding what number of Bibles and Testaments shall be sent to each, by the information given in its report. Hence those Auxiliaries that do not report in time, are liable to be left out in the distribution.

Specific directions should be given in every case, how boxes should be marked and forwarded; and their receipt should always be promptly acknowledged.

QUERIES.

1. What number of families or individuals have been gratuitously furnished with the Holy Scriptures by the Auxiliary during the past year?
2. What number of Bibles and Testaments have been sold by the Auxiliary within the past year?
3. How many members, male and female, are there belonging to the Auxiliary?
4. What number of families of Friends reside within its limits?
5. Are there any families of Friends within your limits not supplied with a copy of the Holy Scriptures in good clear type, and on fair paper; if so, how many? In how many members of our Society, capable of reading the Bible, do not own such a copy of the Holy Scriptures?
6. How many Bibles and Testaments may probably be disposed of by sale within your limits?
7. Is the income of the Auxiliary sufficient to supply those within its limits who are not duly furnished with the Holy Scriptures?
8. What number of Bibles and Testaments would it be necessary for the Bible Association to furnish gratuitously, to enable the Auxiliary to supply each family?
9. What number would be required in order to furnish each member of our religious Society, capable of reading, who is destitute of a copy, and unable to purchase it?
10. How many Bibles and Testaments are now on hand?

"I like to help people; or, what a bit of string may do.—A woman was walking along a street one windy day, when the rain began to come down. She had an umbrella, but her hands were full of parcels, and it was difficult for her to raise it in the wind.

"Let me, ma'am; let me, please," said a bright-faced boy, taking the umbrella in his hands.

The astonished woman looked on with satisfaction, while he managed to raise the rather obstinate umbrella. Then, taking out one of those ever-handy strings which boys carry, he tied all the parcels snugly into one bundle, and politely handed it back to her.

"Thank you very much," she said. "You are very polite to do so much for a stranger." "Oh, it is no trouble, ma'am," he said, with a smile; "I like to help people."

Both went their ways with a happy feeling in the heart, for such little deeds of kindness are like fragrant roses blossoming along the path of life.

We all have our chances day by day, and shall one day be asked how we have improved them. Almost anyone likes to be helped in any difficulty. Are we all as fond of helping others over the hard places? If we take the golden rule for our guide, we shall not only make a great many people glad they have ever known us, but we shall ourselves be glad in heart.

You May Never Forget It.

"I shall never forget that poor body. Long years have passed away since I saw her. I have had children born, and they have grown up and gone forth into the world, and have married, and their children are growing up; but that poor woman, with her half-starved babe—again and again has it passed before my mental vision, and up to the present hour it always brings with it a feeling of sorrow. Yes; God has forgiven that hasty word; but he who uttered it can never forgive himself. 'As far as the east is from the west, so far have I removed thy transgressions from thee.' So the Lord speaks; and the transgressions may be removed and the sins may be covered; but there the mother was, and I seem to see her still. She had broken some sticks out of the hedge, had made a fire by the road-side, and was sitting down thereat, warming herself and her little babe."

We speak in our friend's own words. "Yes, I have made every excuse for myself, but all will not do. I lived near the high road, and my fields adjoined it; and again and again were my hedges torn and burned by tramps as they passed along the road—one party first, and then another, and another, kindling a fire on a small piece of waste ground adjoining. I was young then, and was often vexed, and sometimes angry—very angry—but vexation and anger only made the matter more unbearable. The remembrance of anger cleaves to one, as it has to me, for many long years; and, now that the cares of business are laid aside, memory goes back, and the paths of former days are traversed over again. There were hasty words then as well as angry feelings; and that morning, from a distance, I saw the going up of the smoke, and I rode quickly to the spot, and I saw the hedge torn and the wood burning, and I spoke to the poor woman, who was sitting by the fire. I mentioned the policeman and the prison, and I threatened the one and the other. In a moment she sprang to her feet. She was a miserable object to look upon. She stood before me, trembling from head to foot. She had not time, nor did she care, to adjust her dress. The babe was hanging on her bosom, which was browned by exposure and want. There stood the trembling mother, and there I sat on my horse, and the thought rushed over me of my own home and my babe, and its fond and loving and ailing mother. Yes, she had been sick, and the poor woman before me had evidently been sick; but one had every comfort that love could provide, and the other, from sheer want, had broken my hedge to gain a little warmth for herself and babe. The contrast was very great. There were two mothers and their two babes, and who made the difference? That thought crossed my mind, and perhaps the verse from Dr. Watts did, but I cannot remember:—

"How many, helpless in the street,
Half-naked I behold!
While I am clothed from head to foot,
And sheltered from the cold."

"Who made one to differ from the other? In a moment these feelings had passed through my mind. There stood the woman trembling before me. My anger was gone, but I could not easily pacify the poor creature. I gave her some kind words: I gave her something more substantial than words; but she went on her way trembling as an aspen leaf, and methinks I see her now. God taught me a lesson on that day which I shall never forget. A spark of pity for sorrowing ones fell upon my heart, and burnt its way into my soul."

"I have sometimes thought, 'Perhaps that poor woman was in the covenant of grace, and I was a professor. Were we a son and a daughter of the Lord God Almighty? Was she a sister of Jesus? Was she my sister in Him of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named?'"

So spoke my friend; and may God bless these remarks to whom He will. May He use them to stir up others to avoid hasty words, and never let us forget that we have all one Father, and that one God hath created us.—The Epitaphal Recorder.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Intelligence of Ants.—In Nature we find the following article contributed by Edward W. Cox.

"I have just been watching with care the action of a party of ants, exhibiting an intelligence nearly allied to reason.

Cleaning the shelf in a hot-house, two large cockroaches were caught, killed and left lying on the small gravel with which the shelf is covered. The shelf is four feet from the floor, and the nest of ants is behind a slab at the end of the house. When the cockroaches were killed very few ants were upon the slab, but they must have communicated to others the discovery of the treasure, for in about twenty minutes a swarm of ants emerged from the nest, climbed the wall, gained the shelf, and there, dividing into two parties, proceeded to take possession of the dead bodies.

The ant was the smallest of its kind; the body of its prey was nearly two inches long, and half an inch in width. Their purpose was to carry these two huge carcasses to the nest; and to accomplish this it was necessary, first, to draw them for a space of ten inches over rough gravel, then along a smooth board for two feet, then to drop them to the floor beneath, then to drag them over some very rough rubble for one foot four inches, and finally to pass them between two slabs of wood into the nest. This extraordinary feat they performed successfully. It was accomplished thus: They surrounded the corpse of the dead cockroach and seizing it with their mandibles, moved it toward a little way. It was lying inclined on its side. When moved, the projecting edges of the side hitched into the stones and prevented progress.

I observed that on some larger stones near the spot, half a dozen ants stood, looking at the work, but taking no part in it. When the hitch occurred, and always afterward, when there was an obstacle, these 'surveillers' left their stations, went to the workers and then returned to their place of observation. They were manifestly directing the operation and instructing the laborers; and they as manifestly made some communication to the laborers, for forthwith these changed their plan. They now turned the cockroach on its back, and in this position they moved onward triumphantly for three or four inches. How? They stood round the corpse at precisely equal distances apart and by a common effort dragged it forward. They pulled together, apparently in obedience to a signal from the 'surveillers'; just as men shout when they want to pull together.

Another obstacle. Three pieces of grave bigger than the rest lay in their path. What to do now? They crept under the carcass and lifted it by planting the hind feet on the floor and standing upright, sustaining the load with their heads, while a party mounted the opposing stone, seized the tail and tried to drag the burden up. But in vain. It was too much for their strength and the load was dropped.

Then the ants that had been directing again moved from their places and ran rapidly about in all directions, as if seeking some more easy passage. Having found one they remounted their post of observation and it may be assumed that they gave some intelligent orders to the laborers, for immediately these resumed their hold on the carcass and moved it forward in the direction indicated.

Similar obstacles occurred four times in their journey over the gravel, and on each occasion the same proceedings were observed. Their patience was inexhaustible. At length the body was successfully brought to the smooth edge of the wooden shelf, whence it could be dropped to the floor beneath. But it was necessary to select a fit spot for this purpose, inasmuch as the floor was strewn with bricks and plants. In fact there was but one open space of about four inches square into which the body could be sent so as to be carried securely to its destination. To reach this spot they had to drag the burden along the ledge for a space of 17 inches. In this journey balance was repeatedly lost and the carcass would have fallen, but that it was seized, held and dragged back by their united efforts. At length, having arrived at the place where its fall would be upon the open floor, it was dropped by all at once losing their hold of it. But previously to their doing so, the 'surveillers' ran down the wall to the floor and posted themselves directly under the ledge on which the body lay (four feet above them). There they waited its fall. I think their business there was to see if all was safe, and the place really fit for the purpose, and that they made some communication as to the precise spot to be chosen for the fall, for the ants who bore the corpse shifted it two or three times before they let it down. Then all followed, running down the wall, seized their prey again, and in half an hour carried it a distance of nearly three feet to the entrance of the nest.

But here another difficulty occurred. I could not pass between the boards when lying its back. They turned it on its side and fled again. Again they were baffled; the ants hatched. So they turned it on its back once more, bit off the legs, which were carried to the nest by other ants, and then the body as turned on its side and taken through the narrow way into the nest. To me, looking at it with the eyes of a psychologist, all this seemed to indicate the exercise of a reasoning faculty. They devised new methods of meeting new circumstances. It satisfied me also, ants at least have means of inter-communication. The fact of the find was obviously communicated by the discoverers. The workers manifestly acted under instructions and obeyed commands."

Chlorine.—Some recent investigations of Prof. Meyer, of Zurich, render it probable that Chlorine may ultimately prove to be a compound body containing oxygen, instead of an elementary substance, as it has been heretofore regarded.

Ants.—In Burmah there is found a species of small black ant, of which there occur gigantic specimens differing from the others only in size. They seem to act as the elephants of the community, carrying loads that the smaller ones cannot lift. Sometimes one of these "elephants" may be seen returning to the nest with several of the ordinary size clinging on its back.—Nature.

Japanese Naturalists.—As an illustration of the advance of Japan in civilization, we refer to the report of the proceedings of a Biological Society in the Tokio Times of 5th month last. It noted communications on the Botany and Zoology of the Bonin Islands. I. Ijima exhibited a living specimen of one of the large ants called Flying Foxes, from the Bonin Islands. It feeds on fruits, especially the banana. It constantly hangs from the roof downward; and when about to sleep hangs one leg, spreads its wings, and then wraps them closely about the breast, hiding its head beneath the membranous folds.

Ancient Cave-Men.—The exploration of the Beaumes-Chaudes caverns in France has brought to light the remains of 300 individuals, besides a mass of more than 200,000 fragmentary pieces. These human bones were white, showing no trace of the action of fire, though charred animal bones and fragments of pottery were found near them, the whole being imbedded in stalactite and stalagmite as hard as marble. The shape of the skulls, the protruding jaws and other peculiarities of the skeletons showed that they belonged to a race differing materially from those who are occupied France in modern times.

Advance of the Desert.—In MacGregor's travels in Khorassan, it is stated that the barren sands are visibly gaining on the arable land. "The country is, in fact, in the process of changing from a series of rocky ridges, to one of undulating sandy waste. Yesterday's march showed the sand triumphant; to-day the rocks are still fighting on. This process of burying is most peculiar, and may be witnessed on a small scale in almost any valley between the Caspian and the Yezd. You see the sand blowing against the wall, gradually getting higher and higher till it blows over and then forms a mound in the field beyond, which gradually increases its height till all trace of wall and field is lost, and you have before you a sand-heap. I can quite believe now the stories of towns being buried, having myself seen the thing on a small scale."

Don't, Boys.—Don't be impatient, no matter if things do go wrong some-times. Don't give the ball a kick and send it into a mud-puddle, because it would not go straight when you throw it. Do not send the marbles against the fence, and thus break your best glass ball, because your clumsy fingers could not hit the centre. Do not break your kite string all to pieces, because it will not come down from the tree at the first jerk. It will take you three times as long to get it down afterward. Do not give your little brother an angry push and a sharp word if he cannot see into the mysteries of marble playing or hoop rolling at the first lesson. You were once as stupid as he is, although you have forgotten it.

What in the world would become of you if your mother had no more patience than you? if, every time that you came near her when she was busy, she thrust you off with a cross word? Dear, kind, loving mother, who never ceases to think of you, to care for you, who keeps you so nicely clothed, and makes such nice things for you to eat. What if she were to be so impatient that you would be half the time afraid to speak to her, to tell her of your own troubles at school or at play? Ah, do not grieve your mother by your impatience and your crossness.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 18, 1879.

OHIIO YEARLY MEETING

Convened at Stillwater, near Barnesville, on the 25th of last month—the meeting of Ministers and Elders having met the previous day. The public meetings for worship were very largely attended, especially that held in the afternoon. Such occasions, when many are gathered together, are often times of much exercise to the deeply concerned members of the church; and there is evidence that such was the case at this time, and that earnest cries were raised to Him who is strength in weakness, that the honor of his great name might be magnified and exalted over all.

A letter from one in attendance, says, "Quite early the people began to gather about, and when we got to the meeting-house it was already pretty full, and was soon quite crowded, every available seat being occupied, while some two or three hundred remained outside, unable to get seats. The meeting proved a comfortable one. [Several Friends] spoke, and the people were very quiet—remarkably so it seemed to me for so great a multitude. [After meeting,] many having 'come from far,' and there being 'much grass in the place,' I saw a number in groups here and there seated on the green grass, partaking of the refreshments they had brought with them. About 350 dined at the school."

Long before 3 o'clock, the meeting house yard was filled with the people waiting for the door to be unfastened; and as soon as this was done they poured in and in a very short time every available space seemed occupied, leaving, it was thought, about 500 outside. It was estimated that altogether there were about 2000 in and about the house and grounds. The Methodist and Presbyterian ministers [of Barnesville], both told their congregations that they would hold no meetings on that day, to allow their members to go to our meeting, which seemed to me an unusual circumstance. The meeting in the afternoon, it felt to me, was largely owned by the over-blowing of heavenly good, and I trust that many hearts truly rejoiced on account thereof."

Information received through other channels confirms the statement, that these meetings for worship were seasons of Divine favor. Among the subjects pressed on the attention of those assembled, were the unchangeable nature of true Christianity, to which nothing is added, and from which nothing is taken away by the lapse of years, but it remains as immutable as its Divine Author; the necessity of knowing the Grace of God to abound in us—even that grace by which the apostle declared "I am, what I am," the true position of the Bible as a divinely inspired record and way-mark to point us to its Author, to whom we must come for help and guidance; the abounding mercy of our Heavenly Father, who seeks to bring the wanderers from his fold to a sense of their wretched condition, and lead them to return, repent and live; and the danger of living in a careless, worldly spirit.

At the meeting for business on 2nd day morning, 29th ult., the minutes of the ministers in attendance from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, with certificates, were read. These were Morris Cope, Clarkson Sheppard and David Heston; with whose company and services much satisfaction was expressed.

The report from Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting (Iowa) requested that some steps be taken to provide the primary schools with reading books of a more satisfactory character, especially in relation to the subject of war. The matter was referred to a joint committee of men and women Friends.

Attention was called to the responsibility resting upon those who had children under their care, and the duty of such to be watchful in instilling into the minds of the children proper sentiments, whenever opportunity was afforded.

On 3rd day, Wilson Hall and Abel H. Blackburn were appointed as Clerk and Assistant.

The state of Society, as shown by the answers to the Queries, was brought under consideration. It was said to have been "a solid, good time throughout," in which "much weighty counsel was imparted," and many hearts were deeply contrited before the Lord."

The meeting for worship on 4th day morning, was also a profitable opportunity.

The report of the Committee appointed to build the house in which the Yearly Meeting is held, represented that their labors were nearly completed, and that the funds within their reach were sufficient to defray all the expenses.

The committee to build the Boarding School could not present so favorable a financial statement. They reported that owing to inability and other causes, about $2500 of the original subscriptions had never been paid; and that there still remained an indebtedness of about $5000. It was concluded to attempt to raise this amount by voluntary subscriptions among the members.

The report from the Boarding School Committee was satisfactory. The financial operations of the year showed a small surplus of receipts over expenditures.

At the last meeting on 5th day, a visit was paid to the Women's Meeting by one of the ministers from a distance.

This parting opportunity of those who had mingled together in mental exercise, and together partaken of the fresh flowings of the Father's love, was a solemn and touching season.

A large number of Friends were boarded at the school building during the time of the Yearly Meeting. It is the practice for these to gather together and listen to a portion of Scripture before retiring for the night. These occasions were seasons of much religious refreshment, and were marked with a deep covering of solemnity in the silence which followed the reading, though not always accompanied by any other vocal expression.

The tenderness of spirit manifested by many of those in attendance at the Yearly Meeting, the large number of the young and middle-aged who were attired in the simple costume of a consistent Friend, and the weighty manner in which its business was transacted, were encouraging evidences that Ohio Yearly Meeting, isolated as it has long been from many of the bodies claiming to belong to the Society of Friends, is yet under the care and protection of the Head of the Church; and that He is mercifully pleased to furnish it with ability to uphold, with a good degree of dignity and steadfastness, the principles, practices and testimonies of our religious Society.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Since 1st of 8th mo. to the present time, the fall of rain has only amounted to 1.13 inches, 12 of which were in 9th mo. During the last eight years the monthly average has been 3.67 inches; and it is frequently the case during three or four months the fall exceeds this average. The long drought is the most considerable in our history, and is not only our country. The Potomac river is said to be lower than for thirty years. The water in the canal is so low, boats can carry but two-thirds of a load. The creeks and wells in the vicinity of Petersburg are drying up. The water is so expensive that several New York manufacturers have been advised to purchase where they get a cheap supply of pure, cold water. A few hotels and manufactories in Philadelphia also have artesian wells. The Scientific American says, the water rates in New York are so heavy, that the cost of water for running a steam engine in that city, is about two-thirds the cost of fuel.

The production of crude petroleum in the Pennsylvania oil fields, for the first eight months of 1879, was 12,396,497 barrels, against 9,840,327 barrels for the same time in 1878. On the 31st of 8th month there were 11,285 producing wells, an increase of 1 per cent on the previous year. The production for 8th month was 1,669,052 barrels.

The Prison Labor Commissioners of the New Jersey Mechanics were ordered to meet on the 10th inst. in New Haven, to consider the best way of improving the system of labor in prisons so as not to compete with honest labor. It is stated that a uniform report on the subject will be presented to the Legislatures of the States next year.

A despatch from Washington says: The Indian problem promises to be one of the most important questions to be considered at the next Congress. Some time since Congress called upon the Treasury Department for information as to the amount of money that had been expended for the Indian service since the beginning of the Government. The result of the research shows the amount to 1st of 7th mo. 1879, to be $181,000,000. The estimated number of Indians now living is 800,000.

The saving stations on the New Jersey coast, 11 in number, were ordered to be equipped for winter service on the 15th inst. In addition to the usual life-saving apparatus, each is to be supplied with a new patrol lamp, invented by Superintendent Harens, which, he says, "will keep lighted in the heaviest gales, and will burn during a season of two miles."

Fredrick Douglass is reported to have reiterated his views against the negro exodus from the South. He says the negroes should stay where their labor is wanted, and the climate and habits of the people are congenial.

The true remedy for their grievances was an "intelligent use of the lawful means of protection."

The elevation above the level of the sea, of some of the chief railways of the world, is as follows: Argentine Central, 11,000 feet; the highest line above sea level; the Black Forest line, 850 metres; the Saumur, 800, and the railway over the Caucasus, 975 metres. The tunnel of the St. Gotthard line, attains an elevation of 11,134 metres; the Brenner line 1,307, and the highest line in America, the highest line are the North Pacific, which at its most elevated point is 1,652 metres above the level of the ocean; the Central Pacific, 2,140, and the Union Pacific, 2,513 metres. The highest point of the railway over the Andes is 4,769 metres above sea level.

There were 20 cases of yellow fever, and six deaths, were reported in Memphis on the 11th inst., making the total of cases to that date 1,421, and deaths 425.

The mortality in this city for the week ending on the 11th was 226. Of whom 146 were adults, and 80 children.

Markets, &c.—The following were the quotations for Government bonds, on the 11th. Sixes, 1881, 105½; 5's, registered, 102½; do, coupon, 103½; 4½ per cent, 105; 7's per cent, 102½.

Cotton.—Sales of millings were reported at 10½; 11's, 11½; 12's, 14; Middling and New Orleans, 18.

Petroleum.—Crude 7 cts, and standard white, 7½ cts, for export, and 8½ 81 cts, per gallon for home use. Lard oil, American, 62 a 63 cts.; Calcutta, 65 cts. Lard oil, 51½ a 52 cts.; Sperm, 46c; tallow, 75 cts.; winter, 60c; 50c per gallon.

Flour.—Minnesota family, 6.50 a $7; Penna. do., $6.50 a $6.75; western, do., $6.50 a $7.25; patent, $7.50 a $8.50. Rye flour, $8.25. Corn meal, $2.85 per bbl. Grain.—Wheat unsifted and higher. Sales of 18,000 bushels at $1.32 a $1.40. Rye, 80 a 82 cts. Corn, 50 a 59 cts. Oats, mixed, 35 a 38½ cts, and white, 39 a 42 cts, per bushel.

Hay and Straw.—Priae timothy, 80 a 90 cts; mixed, 65 a 75 cts, per 100 pounds. Straw, 85 a 95 cts, per 100 pounds.

The market for wool—The market during the week has been dull, and prices show no improvement. Extra, 51 a 53 cts; good, 44 a 45 cts; common, 3 a 4 cts. Sheep.—The market steady, and prices well maintained: sales at 3 a 4 1/4 cts, as to condition. Hogs, 51 a 6 cts, per 100 pounds.

FOREIGN.—The land troubles in Ireland are proving very serious, and Parnell's (M. P.) visit and speeches throughout that country have had the effect of fanning the flame. The Pall Mall Gazette of 9th mo. 30th, says: The complaints of the Irish tenant farmers are mostly groundless, and that they are not entitled to their land, their rent, and that they believe in their right to remain on the land in every event. They are fresh from the exhortations of the most popular politician in Ireland, to stick to their homesteads, whatever be the consequence.

If the general feeling is not in fact followed by a wholesale eviction, this again will almost certainly be followed by a series of agrarian murders; and unless the Irish executive is prepared to support the landlords by measures amounting to little less than military occupation of a large part of the country, the landlords will have to charge the responsibility of the blood upon their chains to fixity of tenure, or giving the signal for an outbreak of something hardly distinguishable from civil war. The anti-rent agitation is only one among other symptoms of the general misery of Ireland. For the most part, the distress which is the result of the present pinch of the distress were relieved by a general reduction of rent, there would still be much discontent as to the condition of the country. The Daily Standard of the 10th inst., says: Industry will be stationary throughout every part of the population of county Mayo, Ireland. The area of the English colonies in the world last year was $19,577,250. They instructed 3,151,973 children. The French elementary schools, during the same time, instructed 3,825,000, and cost $13,630,000.

The area of British India, exclusive of native States, is 892,311 square miles; the population of inhabited houses 37,043,521, and the population 191,093,063. The area of the native States is stated at 575,253 square miles, population 49,661,540.

Despatches on the 12th inst. from General Roberts, commanding the British force in Afghanistan, state they have taken possession of Cabul. On the 9th inst. he encountered the Agha army, and during the following three days, several engagements took place, but no hand fighting is reported.

On the 12th inst. 5,000 tons of iron have been shipped from the River Tees to the United States, and a further shipment is to be made. The shipment has hitherto consisted almost exclusively of Cleveland pig iron, but 500 tons of puddled bars are included. The orders now being executed amount to 45,000 tons of pig iron.

Paris despatch to the Times reports the embarkation of 2,200 emigrants from Genoa to the United States.

The North German Gazette says, Russia has intimated her willingness to permit the destruction of Cabul, but will not allow the annexation of Afghanistan.

The Times says, the first of the rail have recently been bought in Germany for the United States.

The Official Mercury states that 5,692 animals hay died of rinderpest in Southern Russia since the beginning of the year.

Japan.—In the reception of Gen. Grant, at Yokohama, a son of Dr. Knox, of Elmira, now a missionary in the Mikado's Empire, writes: "The streets were packed with people, and I heard it frequently remarked that there had never been such a crowd in Yokohama before. What a change a few years have made in the ideas of the people! Nineteen years ago a tattoo, or a moral and legal contest in Japanese society. Even his murder could claim no redress. Per contra, nineteen years ago the Mikado was a god and most pious, veiled from the eyes of the vulgar crowd. And yet last week the man whom nineteen years ago we regarded as a god, with the Mikado, was a man, and a nineteen years ago was a god—while the Japanese army marched by, paying them both equal honors."

Mexico.—The message of President Diaz to his Congress, on the 10th ult., says, that over sixty miles of telegraph have been built during the year. There has been a considerable augmentation of telegraphic communication, an increase of schools and number of pupils, and an improvement in the financial situation of the Government. Peace prevails over the entire Republic. The President declares himself against a reelection.

WESTWON BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION opens on Second-day, Eleventh month 3d. Parents and others intending to send pupil will please make early application to BENJAMIN W. PASSMORE, Sup't., Street Road P. O., Chester Co., Pa. or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch street Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.
Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia.
 Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.
 The Asylum is open to all who have been certified by a male to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at his residence, Crowell, N. J., 2d of Third mo. 1878, SOLOMON L. SANDREDS, in the 41st year of his age, WILLIAM LEVY Particular and Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting.

—, at her residence, Crowell, N. J., 2d of Sixth month, 1878, LYDIA SANDREDS, in the 97th year of her age, widow of Solomon L. Saunders, a member of Crowell Particular and Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting. She was faithful in the attendance of meeting ever to her advanced age, desiring the preservation of that love and unity which is the true bond of peace. Having borne many trials and much suffering, yet accepting all with patience and resignation, believing all things work together for good to those who love God, she felt that her day's work might keep pace with the day waiting for the change as a shock of corn fully ripe to be gathered into the Heavenly garner; we believe she is now reaping the reward of a well-spent life.

DIED, at her residence, Marlton, N. J., 25th of Second mo. 1879, ELIZABETH LEVENS, in the 67th year of her age, widow of the late Thomas Evens, a member and overseer of Crowell Particular and Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting. By the removal of this dear Friend a void has been made in the hearts of many to whom she was endeared by the attendance of meeting ever to their loss is her eternal gain. She was ever ready to assist the poor and afflicted in their distress. A short time previous to her death, being called upon for aid again, she remarked, "What have I to give to-day?" and she said, "I have the oil in the barrel." In the barrel neither has the oil in the cruise failed."

—, at his residence in this city, 9th mo. 7th, 1879, JACOB W. FRY, in the 71st year of his age; —, and on 9th mo. 26th, 1879, REBECCA W., widow of Jacob W. Fry, in the 90th year of her age, constant and esteemed members of Northern District Monthly Meeting.

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord—they rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

A Brief Memoir of the Late Joseph Henderson.

The subject of this Memoir was born on the 21st of Eighth month, 1826, in Comlaachie, a small village in the suburbs of Glasgow. His father was, by occupation, a cotton weaver, and having a considerable family, and not being steady in his habits, they were in very straightened circumstances, and often lacked the necessaries of life. Although thus situated in youth, surrounded by vice and misery, with little good example before him, yet, from the earliest years of his recollection, he felt that in himself which gave him a strong conviction of right and wrong. According, therefore, as he yielded to that influence and followed its dictates, it became his Preserver from many evils to which he was continually exposed in the midst of his youthful associates. As he grew older, he became more thoughtful at times, and in his quiet moments of reflection and meditation on his manner of life, he earnestly sought for a better way, but failed to find it, although he felt at times that it was for him.

At about the age of twelve years he began to attend a First-day School, from a desire for instruction, in which he received about all the education he had, and to which he became much attached. He was a very regular attendant, and endeavored as far as he was able to live up to the instructions he received; but in these endeavors he was shown the depravity of the human heart, and the utter helplessness of man to direct his own steps. Not as yet understanding any other means of help, he was brought at times into a feeling of deep concern on this account, that he might escape the just wrath of God, from which it seemed to him there was no way. But the Lord who is ever merciful, and pitieeth those who are out of the way, did, in his adorable providence, open the way for him.

In the 26th year of his age he was married to Isabella Crosbie, one who was brought up in the fear of the Lord, and who had come in a measure to the knowledge of the Truth, who became a great help to him, and as he believed was given to him from the Lord. He was thus brought in a short time, through her influence and his own sense of right, to give up his old associates and his former light amusements, and devote himself more to reading and to a diligent perusal of the Holy Scriptures, in search of a deeper and more perfect knowledge of the things pertaining to God. He also took great delight in the company of those who had tasted of the goodness of the Lord for themselves, and began to feel that hungering and thirsting after righteousness, which nothing but the True bread and water of Life can satisfy. He then joined a branch of the Methodist Church, of which his wife was a member, but yet did not see things clearly to his understanding, until in a meeting for public worship sometime after, that light which maketh manifest the things of God, and which is God, so illuminated his understanding that the way of salvation was opened plainly before him, and he accepted the offered means, rejoicing in his heart that God in his great mercy had so raised him out of darkness into the glorious and marvellous light of his blessed Truth. From that time he began to grow in grace and in a knowledge of the truth, always endeavoring to follow the leadings and guidings of the Spirit of Truth, which opened unto his mind more and more what the will of God was concerning him as he was able to bear it.

In this exercise he was brought to look for himself into the forms and customs of professing Christians, and the first that arrested his attention was that of congregational singing. The query arose in his mind, "What are the people singing about? Is it the experience of the Psalmist, or is it their own?" And further he felt that instead of this practice aiding the heart in that true worship of God, which is required, it had a great tendency to lighten it, and raise it out of that low, humble, and penit state, in which alone we can worship God in Spirit and in Truth. He was so convinced in regard to this that he had to give it up; and so also with other things, until he had no freedom to attend any of their meetings, but remained at home and in quiet retirement sought after the Lord, and committed his ways unto Him, that He might direct his paths. Having a copy of Barclay's Apology put into his hands about this time by a Friend, he began to read it, and as he read it he became convinced that these were the doctrines most in accordance with the teachings of the Holy Scriptures. Although he was thus convinced of the Truth as professed by Friends, yet he did not feel at liberty to go to any of their meetings without some further evidence that it was his duty to do so. This evidence was graciously granted him and he went. The first meeting he attended was held in silence, and, as he afterwards said, he learned more at that meeting than at any other he had ever attended, although he had heard great preaching, for there he felt that they were gathered together in the presence of God himself, that Great Teacher who teaches as man never taught. From that day he never felt free to go to any meetings of other denominations, but was a diligent attendant of Friends' meetings for worship ever afterwards.

His business, that of carpet weaving, not agreeing with him, being quite poorly in health, the thought of emigrating with his family to Canada, presented itself to his mind. It was a great exercise to him, for it seemed such a great undertaking for him with his wife and five small children, to leave all his earthly friends and go and sojourn in a strange land and among strangers. But he could not get clear of it, and willing to be in his allotted place wherever it might be cast, wishing only to feel the presence of Divine favor, and in this he heard the assurance, as with an audible voice, "If thou go I will be with thee, or if thou remain I will be with thee." Encouraged by this language he began to make preparations, but was very careful to observe whether any obstructions came in the way; but all seemed so clear that he finally concluded to go. It was a great trial of his faith, but he was supported through all, and realized in his experience the truth of the passage, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee." So on the 11th of Fifth month, 1863, he, with his wife and family, set sail for Canada, and was wonderfully preserved throughout the voyage, and landed safely at Toronto on the twenty-eighth day of the same month, for which they felt truly thankful. Although he felt very much alone in the world and knew not where to go, still he followed the same Guiding Star, and waited for its movements as it opened the way, and in a short time got settled in the township of Norwich, Oxford county, Ontario, where was a settlement of Friends.

His intentions were on his arrival in Canada to go to work at farming, but he found that his strength was not sufficient, and he was in much difficulty as to what employment to engage in. After serious consideration as to the right course, he concluded to begin custom weaving for the neighboring farmers. He had many severe trials at that time, endeavoring to provide for his family, not having means to last any length of time, especially settling in a strange place, with everything to buy; and it was a good while before his business became remunerative enough for their support; but as his entire trust was in the Lord, who, he believed, had called him hither, that He would provide; by a diligent use of the means thus within his reach, he was enabled to provide sufficient, and that honest in the sight of all men. Being chiefly concerned to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, knowing that with that all other things would be added, it might be said of him, that the main business of his life was to be found doing the will of the Lord.

It had been on his mind for some time to become a member of the Society of Friends, but did not give up to it until his wife felt that it would be right for her to do so, when they both sent in their request to Norwich Monthly Meeting, which was united with, and they were received into membership in the 5th month, 1866. He felt it a great privilege to be able to attend meetings regularly, both on First-days and in the middle of the week, and although he had six miles to walk for about seven years (unless he got an opportunity to ride,) he seldom was absent, leaving his work on Fourth-days, for he felt that the gain to him greatly overcame the loss. In all his transactions from the greatest to the most trivial, and in moving from one place to another, he was careful not to do anything hurriedly, but to wait for guidance, with which he was much favored, having his way opened up many times in a manner remarkable to himself.

He had a good many seasons of loneliness during the first few years of his residence in Canada, by letting a sense of his situation overcome him, and looking at the boisterous waves around him would begin to sink, when he remembered the Lord, and his cry ascended unto Him whose ear is ever open to the cry of the poor and needy, and He heard him, and many times could he truly quote the language of the Psalmist, "I waited patiently for the Lord and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my going. And He hath put a new song into my mouth even praise unto our God." On one such occasion when his soul had well nigh fainted within him so that he could not work, as he sat on his loom in deep trouble, the question was asked by a voice so clear and distinct, that he thought it was a person addressed him, "What hast thou lacked?" Nothing! was his immediate answer, as he started up, and seeing no one else in the room, he recognized the voice of his Heavenly Father, He who had carried him safely thus far without any lack, and by this question convinced him that He was still able and willing, and would keep him to the end if he trusted in Him. This circumstance so strengthened him that he never after yielded to a like temptation, but trusted all entirely to Him who doeth all things well, nor was he ever heard to pray or utter a wish, which he regarded as a prayer, for any temporal blessing for himself or his family.

(To be concluded.)

"For The Friend."

Six Months in Ascension.

The time of the opposition of Mars, was the 5th of 9th month, and as this drew near their anxiety increased, and is thus graphically described:—

"I could write no diary, and have not the slightest recollection of how I spent the day—unprofitably, I fear, in watching and waiting; finally bringing on a violent headache towards evening, which was less painful, however, than the excessive nervous excitement I was endeavoring to repress. To-night Mars will be nearer to us—his ruddy glare brighter than ever again for a hundred years, and what if we should not see him?

"The sun had shone all day in a cloudless sky, but before sunset some ugly clouds rolled up from windward, and made me feel quite feverish. I could not rest, but kept wandering about from tent to tent like an uneasy spirit; inwardly resenting David's exceeding calm, as a tacit reproach to my perturbation.

There he sat, quietly tying up photographs, softly whistling to himself, as if nothing were going to happen, and then he actually smoked a very long pipe, with even longer and slower whiffs than usual. Of course it was affectionate! But I wondered how he managed to keep up the deception, and for the first time fully believed what he had told me of having enjoyed his breakfast on the morning of the Transit of Venus, notwithstanding that it rained. Nominally, we dined to-day at half-past five, and I found the heavens look undecided; half-past six, and a heavy cloud is forming in the south. Slowly the cloud rises—very slowly; but by and by a streak of light rests on the top of the dark rocks—it widens and brightens, and at last we see Mars shining steadily in the pure blue horizon beneath. It was now seven o'clock, and David called quickly for lights. Graydon, who was almost as much excited as I was, answered with his ready 'Aye, aye, sir,' and in a few minutes I was left alone in a pitiful state of anxiety and unquiet.

"How slowly the minutes passed! How very long each little interruption appeared! The wind was blowing lazily, and light clouds glided at intervals across the sky, obscuring, for a few moments, the Planet as they crossed his path. But at last I heard the welcome note 'All right,' and then I went to bed, leaving David to add the pleasant postscript of 'Evening success' to his letters. When the letters were finished, he gave them in charge to Hill, with orders that they should be sent off at daybreak, and then he lay down to rest.

"I now took the watch for the morning. The first hours of my waiting promised well, but before 1 A. M. a tiny cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, arose in the south, and I called my husband to know what he thought of it. On this, the night of Opposition, the planet would be in the most favorable position for beginning morning observations about 2.30. Now it was but 12.50, and the question came to be—shall some value of position be lost, so as to give a greater chance of securing observations before the rising cloud reach the zenith, or shall we wait, in the hope that this cloud has 'no followers'?"

"Being a Scot, and fully appreciating the motto of the Kirkpatrick's, 'I mak siccar,' David began to work at once in a break-neck position, with the telescope pointed but a few degrees west of the zenith. How my heart beat, for I saw the cloud rise and swell, and yet no silver lining below. I dared not go inside the Observatory, lest my uncontrolled fidgets might worry the observer, but sat without on a heap of clinker, and kept an eye on the enemy. Five, ten, fifteen minutes! Then David called out, 'Half set finished—splendid definition—go to bed!' Just in time, I thought, and crept off to my tent, thankful for little, and not expecting more, for one arm of the black cloud was already grasping Mars.

"My husband would, of course, remain in the Observatory for the rest of the night to watch for clear intervals, while I was expected to go to sleep. But how could I? I took up a book and tried to read by the light of my lantern for a few minutes; then I thought to myself, 'Just a peep to see whether the cloud promises to clear off.' I looked forth, and lo! no cloud! I rubbed my eyes, thinking I must be dreaming, and pulled out my watch, to make sure I had not been asleep so sudden was the change. No! truly it obnoxious cloud had mysteriously vanished and the whole moonless heavens were of the inky blueness so dear to astronomers.

"Mars now outrivalled Jupiter in ruddiness; Orion had flung abroad his jeweled like bear-frost; the Pleiades glittered in such bewildering multitude, that it seemed as the lost Pleiad had returned with a train of shining followers from some other system! Like fire-dies tangled in a silver braid, they shone with a soft beauty; and everywhere above and around, myriads of stars dazzle the night.

"While my eyes drank in this beautiful scene, my ears were filled with sweet sound issuing from the Observatory, 'A, seven, and one, point two seven one; B, seventy seven, one, point three six eight,' &c. Let no one smile that I call these sweet sounds Sweet they were indeed to me, for they told of success after bitter disappointment; cherished hopes realized; of care and anxiety passing away. They told too of honest work honestly done—of work that would live and tell its tale, when we and the instrument were no more; and, as I thought of this, there came upon me with all their force the glowing words of Herschel—

"When once a place has been thoroughly ascertained, and carefully recorded, the brazen circle with which that useful work was done may moulder, the marble pillar totter on its base, and the astronomer himself survive only in the gratitude of his posterity; but the record remains, and transpires all its own exactness into every determination which takes it for a ground-work."

"Happier hours I never spent than those early morning ones under this beautiful heaven; for in helpless restlessness I had again taken up my position on the clinker. The night was unusually still, and outside the Observatory there was not a sound save the gentle flapping of the tents—like the wing of passing birds, and the continual murmur of greeting from the waves as they met the shore. Time passed unconsciously, for I was giving my imagination full play, and when I heard the Observatory dome shut, I could hardly believe that I had been dreaming on a rock for three hours. The awakening was as pleasant as the dream had been. David was radiant, and no wonder! All our previous disappointment, fatigue and anxiety were forgotten in the good fortune of to-night, and now we might rest."

"For The Friend."

1858. 1st mo. 2d. Another week of my precious time is almost past; a solemn subject when properly considered. I feel very unworthy of the many precious seasons I have been favored with of late; may I be more grateful and more faithful.

14th.—Fifth-day evening. We have been much favored with, (I think I may say), the presence of the Great Head of the Church in our meeting to-day. When thus favored, how sweet, solemn and precious are our meetings! His life-giving presence, with a sense of his Divine approbation is a feast to the soul that is alive to a sense of good. Oh! what unmerited mercy, that our Divine Master, after our backsliding, continues to visit us with sense of his loving-kindness. May these mercies not be slighted, but increase our love, gratitude and obedience to our dear Master.

17th. We have again been favored, in unmerited mercy, with a very solemn comfortable meeting; may the favor be gratefully received and remembered.

21st. We have had a very comfortable meeting; cause for gratitude and encouragement. Language cannot express the great amount of the favors bestowed upon us.

23th. Our Preparative Meeting day. The queries were read and answered. I think there is an advantage in it, it brings into view the state of Society, and overseers and other concerned Friends are brought to think seriously whether they have discharged their duty to those who are the cause of the deficiencies in our answers.

2d mo. 1st. Our meeting was unusually large, Friends were under the necessity of using the upper gallery; it was, I think, a favored one during the silent part of it, and I thought Samuel Cope much favored to speak to the state of some present; the praise be to the great and holy Head of the Church.

3d. Our Select Preparative Meeting to me was a comfortable one; amidst all our trials, I think we may acknowledge it is a day of visitation of Divine mercy to our little meeting.

4th. Our Monthly Meeting. All the Queries were read, and I think deliberately considered. I think some of the concerned members were brought to feel for the welfare of our religious society and their own responsibility—which I esteem a blessing. Oh! that we may be preserved in that state comparable to little children, walking in obedience to all the Divine requirements; I think it more to be sought after than length of days. There is a precious peace in a life of dedication to our dear Master; I have no doubt but that it is the will of the Great Head, that all should experience it.

2d mo. 11th, was our Select Quarterly Meeting; at the close of which Samuel Cope proposed that the elders should the next day, the day of the Quarterly Meeting, occupy the upper gallery. I felt my weakness, and was tried with the thoughts of it; thought I could not give up to take that seat, until, after getting into the meeting-house, I was favored with quietness and composure of spirit; and so to feel the danger of (being) exalted on account of the seat I occupied. I am convinced of the truth of the doctrines held by our religious Society, of the necessity of waiting on the Great Head of the Church for the qualification to worship Him acceptably. To merit was a comfortable meeting.

6th mo. 11th. I have passed through some close trials on account of heaviness in meetings, sometimes attended with pains in my eyes and head. I hope it has in some degree had a humbling effect. I have also had some comfortable and very encouraging seasons. As I have no doubt, but that it is intended that all things should work together for good, I desire to live so near to the Great Head of the Church as to receive the blessing. Oh! the long suffering and loving kindness of our Divine Master, who is worthy of honor, thanksgiving and praise forever.

7th mo. 26th. Been favored with a sense of the necessity of true humility and a giving up to serve the dear Master. What a blessing not to be cast off—so unworthy a creature.

31st. (Have) been mercifully favored with seasons of encouragement; may the unmerited favor be remembered, and a nearer living unto the Great Giver of all good be experienced.

8th mo. 28th, 1858.

Dear friend Joseph Elkinton,—* * * In regard to A. H. Blackburne's inquiry, I have always thought it was no disadvantage to lend a little to the Indians, with the understanding they were to use the article and return it soon. Such small acts of kindness are felt by them and seem at times, through the blessing of our Divine Master, to open the way to use much freedom and plainness in explaining to them the great advantage there would be in their owning all necessary articles themselves, and being industrious (to) using them, and have sometimes afforded favorable opportunities when the minds of those who are laboring amongst them are religiously concerned for their best welfare, to advise them against the evils of intemperance and other immoral practices which are amongst them. Poor people, they are much to be pitied; in some respects they seem like children, while they are not deficient in intellect. I need not tell this to one who is better acquainted with the Indians than myself. I think it is said, that "speaking to one's friend is like thinking aloud." I wish the committee to direct in the matter as they think best. The time of our next meeting will soon roll round and if spared with life and health perhaps we may meet again and talk freely on these subjects. I thought of thee at the time of our last Quarterly Meeting. Moses Baily at that time was sinking fast. (He) was mercifully preserved in a sweet frame of mind, and on the subject of religion his mind seemed clear to the last. It was R—'s wish that very extensive information (of the funeral) should not be given, that every thing should be done without making an improper show and as quietly as conveniently could be, and the corpse be buried in a plain and simple way, as was practised by our early Friends. His loss is felt in Society, in his family and in the neighborhood, but I hope and trust we are all in good measure resigned to it, believing it is in the ordering of Best Wisdom that he has (been) removed from us.

Thy friend,

EBENEZER WORTH.

9th mo. 12th. Were favored with a comfortable meeting, and was in unmerited mercy through the past week favored with very encouraging seasons. May time give evidence of improvement.

10th mo. Left home in company with Jos. Elkinton to visit the Indians on the Allegheny reservation; were mercifully favored in getting there safely, and while there with ability to labor with these poor people to the relief of our minds. We were kindly received by them; they appeared willing to hear what we had to say. We parted with them in feelings of love, and had evidence theirs were of the same kind towards us.

11th mo. Left home with Samuel Cope to visit Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting and the meetings belonging thereto. Although I felt my own great weakness, was favored to return with peace of mind for having accompanied Samuel in his visit. It is cause for encouragement that the Great Head of the Church continues to preserve and qualify for the services He requires of us.

Ut Indians.

The New York Tribune gives the following account of these Indians, and of the causes which led to the recent fighting with the U. S. troops.

The Utes, one of the largest and most powerful tribes in the West, composed of hardy, athletic, intelligent savages, have generally been on good terms with the whites; but they have had the hard luck to own lands valuable both for mining and agriculture. They once owned a large part of Colorado and Utah. They refused to join the Mormons in their opposition to the government of the United States, but the Pike's Peak excitement brought many white men into the domain of the tribe, and a war was the consequence. As the flowing tide of emigration to the Rocky Mountains could not be stopped, the final result was that the Utes were deprived of the larger part of their lands. By a treaty in 1865, the largest tract of country ever ceded by a single tribe was transferred to the United States, and thrown open for settlement, and the rapid mineral development of Colorado was thereby made possible. Considering that the Utes exceeded 16,000 in number, and loved to roam in bands over the mountains and plains, despoising, as they did, farming, and being very jealous of the settlement of white men in their reservations, it is not surprising that after 1865 there were several years of year. Black Hawk, chief of the Pah Utes, made a great deal of trouble. The gold and silver mines of the Ute reservation in Colorado attracted prospectors continually; there were frequent fights, and peace with the aboriginal proprietors of the land could not be secured until after the Utes had, in 1872, been compelled to cede 4,000,000 acres more of their valuable estates to the Federal Government.

The Utes were then left with one reservation of about 12,000,000 acres in Colorado, west of the mountains, one in Utah of 2,000,000 acres, and one in New Mexico of 670,000 acres. A dozen or more bands occupied these regions, roaming over them at will, hunting and fishing, and maintaining all their original wildness. Their wealth consisted chiefly in their horses and tents. They owned horses in immense numbers. The 900 Utes of the White River Agency in Colorado alone have had 3,000 horses, and the 2,000 Utes at the southern agency on the same reservation, 6,000.

As long as the Government has kept its treaty obligations with these Indians, they have been friendly to the whites. As long as the annuities paid to them in compensation for their valuable lands have been promptly forwarded, they have behaved well; and it is recorded to their credit that many times they have even maintained their good behavior under circumstances of great disappointment and provocation.

The Ute troubles began precisely as all troubles with the Indians begin. The Utes had a reservation, and were conducting themselves peaceably enough on it. A gang of white miners made an irruption into it on June last. No attention was paid to the complaints of the Indians. They declared that they had not enough to eat, and a body of them went off with a chief, Ogallala, to Snako River, a district to which he has a claim. In the meantime, the Agent claimed certain pasture lands belonging to the Indians, for farming purposes, and persisted in enforcing his claim to plough the land, until they fired on his ploughman, when he called on the military for protection. The match was put to the fire; the whole country was in a flame. Major Thornburgh's detachment was sent forward. A scout, Lowry, was dispatched to the agent to see how matters stood. The Indians had then possession of the Agency and were resolved to kill the agent, but were persuaded to desist. A body of armed Indians then went forward to meet Thornburgh, and a battle followed in which that officer and sixteen of his men were killed."

Some Ancient Advice.

Take heed, dear friends, we entreat you, to the convictions of the Holy Spirit, who leads, through unfeigned repentance and living faith in the Son of God, to reconciliation with our Heavenly Father, and to the blessed hope of eternal life, purchased for us by the one offering of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Be earnestly concerned in religious meetings reverently to present yourselves before the Lord and seek by the help of the Holy Spirit, to worship God through Jesus Christ. Be in the frequent practice of waiting upon God in private retirement, with prayer and supplication, honestly examining yourselves as to your growth in grace, and your preparation for the life to come. Be careful to make a profitable and religious use of those portions of time on the first day of the week, which are not occupied by our meetings for worship. With a tender conscience, and in accordance with the precepts of the Gospel, take heed to the limitations of the Spirit of Truth, in the pursuit of the things of this life.

Maintain strict integrity in all your transactions in trade and in your other outward concerns, remembering that you will have to account for the mode of acquiring, and the manner of using, your possessions. Watch with Christian tenderness over the opening minds of your offspring; inure them to habits of self-restraint and filial obedience; carefully instruct them in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and seek for ability to imbue their minds with the love of their Heavenly Father, their Redeemer, and their Sanctifier. Observe simplicity and moderation in the furniture of your houses, and in the supply of your tables, as well as in your personal attire and that of your families.

Be diligent in the private and daily family reading of the Holy Scriptures; and guard carefully against the introduction of improper books into your families. The end of all religious training is to bring the mind under subjection to the will of God, to lead our children unto Jesus, that through Him they may obtain the forgiveness of their sins, and be taught in his school who was meek and lowly of heart. How, dear friends, shall we prosecute this work, if we have not ourselves submitted to the yoke of Christ and been taught of Him? We believe that not a few who have been measurably thus instructed, and who are religiously concerned for the welfare of their families, will do well to look around them and consider whether any thing in their habits of life, whether the indulgences which they allow themselves, the character of their conversation, the persons with whom their children have intercourse, and the books and other publications which are permitted to enter their houses, are not opposed to the training of their families in a religious life and conversation. Let us not esteem any of these things as insignificant.

THOUGHTS ON SILENT MEETINGS.

'Tis good to sit us down in stillness,
In silent waiting on the Lord,
With prayerful hearts to Him uplifted,
Discerning His interchanging word.

The blessed Saviour while on earth,
This lesson taught to age and youth,
That worship, when performed aright,
Must be in spirit and in truth.

He knocketh at the inner door,
The inmost threshold of the heart,
And waiteth long, for entrance there,
His grace and mercy to impart.

Ah! why keep waiting such a guest,
The holy Lord of light and life,
Until his head is wet with dew,
Likewise his locks, with drops of night.

Oh! that in humble childlike faith,
We would invite Him to come in,
An honored guest, into our heart,
To sup with us, and we with Him.

This would be worshipping indeed,
'Tho' not a word be uttered there,
But sweet communion in the heart,
And all of self laid low in prayer.

But oh! if idle musings take
The place of inward grace and prayer;
Or things of time engage the mind,
In vain do we assemble there.

The holy One sees every heart,
And all that passes there within,
And jealous is He of his right,
Nor will accept us in our sin.

Then oh! that great and holy One,
Who doth our every action see,
With thou prepare our erring heart,
Acceptably to worship Thee.

MARAH AND ELIM.

To-day 'tis Elim, with its palms and wells,
And happy shade for desert weariness;
'Twas Marah yesterday, all rock and sand,
Unshrouded solitude and weariness.

Yet the same desert holds them both the same,
Soft breezes wander o'er the lonely ground;
The same low stretch of valley shelters both,
And the same mountains compass them around.

So it is here on earth—and so—

I do remember it has ever been;
The bitter and the sweet, the grief and joy
Lie near together, but a day between.

Sometimes God turns our bitter into sweet,
Sometimes He gives us pleasant water springs;
Sometimes He shades us with His ever-shed
And sometimes to a blessed palm-shade brings.

What matters it, the time will not be long,
Marah and Elim will alike be past;
Our desert wells and palms will soon be done,
We reach the city of our God at last.

Oh! happy land beyond these lonely hills!
Where gusts in joy the everting springs,
O holy Paradise! above these heavens
Where we shall end our desert wanderings.

Does each day upon its wing,
Its allotted burden bring;
Load it not beside with sorrow,
Which belongeth to to-morrow.
Strength is promised, strength is given,
And then the heart by God is risen,
But forbade the way of sin,
And alone thou bearest the blow.
One thing only chains thy care,
Seek thou first by faith and prayer
That all-glorious world above,
Scene of righteousness and love;
And what'er thou need'st below,
He thou trustest will bestow.

Brief Spiritual Observations;

Extracted from the writings of William Linn.

"Babel hath always had men for its builders; but the kingdom of God ever was, and ever will be made up of little children."

"Hear what our blessed Lord saith of the place, the power, and origin of Truth: He refers us not to the current doctrines of the times, or to the systems of men, but to his own name, his own nature, his own divinity hidden in us; My sheep, says He, hear my voice. Here the whole matter is decisively determined, both where Truth is, and who they are that can have any knowledge of it. Heavenly truth is nowhere spoken but by the voice of Christ, nor heard but by a power of Christ, living in the hearer. As He is the eternal only Word of God, that speaks forth all the wisdom and wonders of God; so He alone is the Word, that speaks forth all the life, wisdom and goodness, that is or can be in any creature. It can have none but what it has in Him, and from Him."

"That state is best, which exerciseth the highest faith in, and fullest resignation to God. This state of resignation, naked faith, and pure love of God, is the highest perfection, and most purified life of those, who are born again from above, and who through the Divine power become sons of God. And it is neither more nor less, than what our blessed Redeemer has called, and qualified us to long and to aspire after, in these words: Thy kingdom come; thy will be done, on earth, as it is in heaven. It is to be sought for in the simplicity of a little child, without being captivated with any mysterious depths or heights of speculation; without coveting any knowledge, but so far as it impels us to forget and renounce every thing for Him; to do every thing in Him, with Him, and for Him; and to give every breathing, moving, intention and desire of our heart to Him."

"When, therefore, it is the one ruling, never-ceasing desire of our hearts, that God may be the beginning and end, the reason and motive, the rule and measure of our doing or not doing, from morning to night; then everywhere, whether speaking or silent, whether inwardly or outwardly employed, we are equally offered up to the eternal Spirit, have our life in Him, and from Him; and are united to Him by that spirit of prayer, which is the comfort, the support, the strength and security of the soul, travelling by the help of God, through the vanity of time into the riches of eternity."

"Come unto me, says the holy Jesus, all ye that labor, and are heavily laden, and I will refresh you. Here is more for you to live upon, more light for your mind, more of union for your heart, than in volumes of human instruction. Jesus is the love, the sweetness, the compassionate goodness of the Deity itself. He became man, that so men might have power to become sons of God."

"To be like-minded with Christ, is to live in contrariety to self, the world, the flesh, and the devil, as He did; this is our belonging to Him, our being one with Him, having life from Him, and washing our robes in the blood of the Lamb. For then, and then only are we [truly] washed and cleansed by his blood, when we drink his blood; and we do drink his blood, when we willingly drink of the cup that He drank of."

"Live in the love, the patience, the meekness and humility of Christ, and then the lestial, transparent, spiritual body of Christ, continually forming itself, and growing in and from, and about your soul, till it comes to be fulness of the stature in Christ Jesus; and his is your true, substantial, vital eating the flesh, and drinking the blood of Christ, which will afterwards become your body of glory to all eternity."

"The spirituality of the Christian religion, is the reason why it was first preached to the world under the name of the kingdom of God, because under this new dispensation, freed from veils, shadows and figures of good things about or to come, God himself is manifested, dwelling in us and over us, as an essential Light of our lives, as an indwelling Word of power, as a life-giving Spirit within us, forming us by a new birth, to become a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices to God, through a new and living way which Christ hath consecrated for us. The truth and perfection of which state, is plainly set forth by the following prayer of Christ, viz: That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; I in them and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one, and that the love wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them, and I in them."

The Pennsylvania Free Dispensary for Skin Diseases.—From 11 o'clock A. M. until 1 o'clock P. M. daily, the room is open for the reception of persons afflicted with those skin affections that are commonly known as ringworm, tetter, boils, itch, erysipelas, cancer, hives, burns, loss of hair, mother's marks, and the various rashes. Many of these diseases are loathsome and contagious, and necessarily exclude their victims from the society of others.

The report of the physician in charge, in the last annual announcement, refers to the following as being the exciting causes of the cases treated by them.

"Disorders of the organs of digestion from irregular habits, hurried meals, bad food, confinement in close rooms, and the constant toils and cares of life, have occasioned many of these eruptive diseases in youth, manhood and old age.

In addition, numerous external agencies have been the exciting cause of a large class of these affections. Among these has been the occupation, wearing of flannel, pressure of articles of wear over tender and delicate parts of the body, exposure to extremes of heat and cold, handling dyes and dyed goods, the application of mercurial salves and oils, parasites, and wetlandings.

It is in this latter class that I desire to call especial attention. It has been one of the most prolific sources of many of the obstinate eruptions of the skin. I have taken the pains for the past two years to make a careful inquiry of all dispensary patients when they had last bathed the whole body, and they have, in some instances, replied never, or have acknowledged that an interval of years had elapsed between the ablutions. When advising the frequent use of the bath to this class of patients they always replied that they had no place in which to bathe. Can this be surprising when we consider the manner in which many of the poor of both sexes are often crowded together in a single room, or occupy apartments or dwellings in which there are absolutely no facilities for bathing? When ablution is thus neglected the result is that cast-off scales, together with the dust from the air, and poisonous principles from the system, remain upon the surface and close up the pores. The skin can then no longer eliminate carbon and take in oxygen, and the respiration of the individual is impeded. Should any infectious material exist in the atmosphere, it will settle upon the surface and gradually become absorbed into the system, and thus poison the blood. When the functions of the skin are thus impaired, the extra work of this organ will then be thrown upon the lungs, liver, kidneys and bowels, which will be taxed beyond their capacity. In such a case these latter organs will suffer, or, what is more probable, the morbid action will react upon the skin. Thus have the habits of uncleanliness become very often the cause of cutaneous eruptions. A multitude of diseases other than those of the skin are also produced by uncleanly habits.

These facts should afford a sufficient reason for the councils of this great metropolis to establish free baths. London, Paris, Dublin, New York, Boston, Chicago, and almost all the large cities except Philadelphia have erected public bathing establishments. The poor do not ask the city for these baths, but they are an actual necessity for the health and cleanliness of this community. At the present time when the most eminent scientists are engaged in enunciating laws for the protection of public health, some should at least make an effort to carry the art of cleanliness to the high perfection that it once enjoyed in the ancient days of Rome. The bath was at that time both the great health-restoring agent and the pleasurable place of resort for all classes.

It will be found that the erection of free bathing establishments will mitigate suffering, afford comfort to the poor, lessen disease, and thus relieve the city of the expense of taking care of an unprofitable class."

The late Vice president Wilson, soon after his public profession of Christian faith, gave this statement of the struggle which that step cost him: "For a while I was reluctant to come out and profess Christ publicly, lest my course should be misrepresented. I was in political life. Every action of mine was liable to hostile criticism. Living in New England as I was, it might be said that I expected to gain favor, and to increase my popularity, by being known as an orthodox church-member; and I couldn't bear the thought of being misjudged in that way. It seemed to me that I was in danger of dishonoring the Master whom I desired to serve, if I should incur the risk of being supposed a hypocrite in my profession of faith in him. That thought troubled me greatly. At last I came to see that just there was my cross. I must be willing to be misunderstood for Christ's sake. I did have faith in Him. His command to me was to confess that faith before men. I must be willing to do that plain duty, whatever others might think of my purpose in its doing. Jesus Christ would take all the risks of dishonor to his cause through my doing as He told me to. So I came out and publicly confessed my faith in Him as my Saviour, trusting Him, as I did so, to take care of his good name and mine."

Temporal things are of small importance, when compared with those which are eternal.

The Temperature of Meeting-houses.

As the cold season approaches when we have to be shut up within doors, and the stoves and furnace fires are lighted for our comfort, the writer is reminded of the need there is for regulating the temperature of our meeting-houses so that they may be suitably warm, but not to range higher than 65 degrees at most.

Stoves are at times brought up to a red hot condition, and within a few feet of the seat appropriated to a visitor; or the furnace in the cellar made to do extra duty on a cold day, and the temperature thus raised into the neighborhood of 75 or 80 degrees. In this atmosphere the congregation sits for an hour and a half with outdoor clothing on, and of course becomes very warm and the brain somewhat stupefied with the closeness of the room. To leave such an apartment and ride several miles in the cold air is dangerous, and in some cases productive of serious results.

A thermometer should be placed in each end of the meeting-house, about four feet above the floor, and care taken by the person in charge of it that a certain temperature be arrived at and maintained as nearly as practicable during the meeting hours. Where stoves are used, a sheet iron fender or screen put around them will be found advantageous.

Such precautions would, it is believed, tend not only to health, but have an influence in preserving a lively feeling in our religious assemblies.

An Interesting Anecdote by Dean Stanley.

In the course of a sermon to children in Westminster Abbey, Dean Stanley told the following story of an Edinburgh street Arab:

Not long ago, in Edinburgh, two gentlemen were standing at the door of a hotel one very cold day, when a little boy with a thin blue face, his feet bare and red from the cold, and with nothing to cover him but a bundle of rags, came and said: "Please sir, buy some matches." "No, don't want any," the gentleman said. "But they are only a penny a box," the poor little fellow pleaded. "Yes, but you see we don't want a box," the gentleman said again. "Then I will give you two boxes for a penny," the boy said at last, and to get rid of him, the gentleman who tells the story says, "I bought a box; but when I found I had no change." So I said, 'I will buy a box to-morrow.'" "Oh! do buy them to-night, if you please," the boy pleaded again. "I will run and get ye the change, for I am very hungry." So I gave him the shilling and he started away. I waited for him, but no boy came. Then I thought I had lost my shilling; still there was that in the boy's face I trusted, and I did not like to think bad of him. Late in the evening I was told a boy wanted to see me; when he was brought in I found it was a smaller brother of the boy that had got my shilling; but, if possible, still more ragged and poor and thin. He stood a moment, diving into his rags as if he was seeking something, and then said, 'Are you the gentleman that bought the matches frae Sandie?' 'Yes.' 'Well, then, here's fourpence out o' yer shilling; Sandie can not come; he's very ill; a cart ran over him and knocked him down, and he lost his bonnet and his matches and your seven pence, and both his legs are broken, and the doctor says he'll die, and that's all.' And then putting the four pence on the table, the poor child broke down into great sobs. So I fed the little man, and I went with him to see Sandie. I found the two little things lived alone, their father and mother being dead. Poor Sandie was lying on a bundle of shavings. He knew me as soon as I got in and said: 'I got the change, sir, and was coming back; and then the horse knocked me down, and both my legs were broken; and—O Reuby! little Reuby! I am sure I am dying, and who will take care of you when I am gone? What will ye do, Reuby?' Then I took his hand, and said I would always take care of Reuby. He understood me, and had just strength enough to look up at me as if to thank me; and the light went out of his blue eyes."

Wrath Disarmed.—A man of my acquaintance who had a vehement and rigid temper, had a dispute with a friend of his, a professor of religion, and had been injured by him. With feelings of resentment he made him a visit for the avowed purpose of quarreling with him. He accordingly stated to him the nature and extent of the injury done him, and was preparing, as he afterwards confessed, to load him with a train of severe reproaches, when his friend cut him short by acknowledging, with the utmost readiness and frankness, the injustice of which he had been guilty, expressing his own regret for the wrong which he had done, requesting his forgiveness, and offering him ample compensation. He was compelled to say he was satisfied, and withdrew full of mortification that he had been precluded from venting his indignation, and wounding his friend with keen and violent reproaches for his conduct. As he was walking home he said to himself: "There must be more in religion than I have hitherto suspected. Were any to address me in the tone of haughtiness and provocation, with which I accosted my friend this evening, it would be impossible for me to preserve the equanimity of which I have been a witness, and especially with so much frankness, humility and meekness to acknowledge the wrong which I had done; so readily ask forgiveness of the man whom I had injured, and so cheerfully promise a satisfactory recompense. I should have met his anger by anger, &c. There is something in religion that I have hitherto been a stranger to." He soon after became a Christian.—Dr. Dwight.

Let the Ancient Standard be lowered.—It is well there are a few left, who are jealous lest the ancient standard should be lowered by unskillful soldiers in things too high for them. Oh! how tried my poor mind is, under a sense of a world amongst us of true discernment; and even in my very secluded allotment here, I think my inward eye sees a covering in our Society that is prohibited in the truth; a mixture as surely disapproved in the sight of the Great Head of the Church, as ever the forbidden linsy-woolsey garment was of old; and which must one day be taken off, for the all-scrutinizing eye will not wink therewith.—S. Lynes Grubb.

A religion which does not suffice to govern and control a man, will never suffice to save him. That which does not distinguish him from a wicked world, will never distinguish him from a perishing world.

Disregard of the First-day of the week.—The Annual State Fair of the Pennsylvania Agricultural Society, recently held at the Permanent Exhibition Buildings at Philadelphia, was kept open for the admission of visitors on the First-day of the week. The responsibility for this breach of the law is said to rest with the Exhibition Company. The Agricultural Society, it is said, had no expectation of such a course being pursued, declined to take any of the money received for admission on that day, and instructed its employees to confine their work to such necessary duties as feeding and watering stock, &c. To prevent the recurrence of such a disgraceful procedure, the Executive Committee of the Agricultural Society has since passed the following resolution:—

Whereas, the existing contract between the Permanent Exhibition Company and this Society does not enforce the uniform practice of this Society that its exhibitions be closed on Sundays, therefore

Resolved, That the Committee of Arrangements of future exhibitions of the Society, when held in connection with other organizations, shall cause to be inserted in the contract between the parties thereto a clause expressly prohibiting the opening of the exhibition on Sunday.

Heathenism in London.—In the Eastern part of London, on a recent First-day, fifteen places of worship belonging to the establishment, and having a seating capacity of 14,478, were visited, and exactly 905 persons were found present in the fifteen; in four of them only 157 persons were found. About the same time eleven Nonconformist houses in the same part of the city were visited and 5500 worshippers were found. The last Spectator, in a long article on this indifference to religion, makes the startling assertion that "the working-classes of East London do not go to church or care about religion in any way."

Religion in Japan.—An address delivered by James H. Ballagh, who for 19 years resided in Japan, as reported in The National Baptist, contains some interesting information.

In the sixth century after Christ, there was a Buddhist emigration from the highlands of India, which pressed eastward and found its resting-place in Japan. These invaders displaced the aborigines, who fled to the Isle of Yesso and the Kurile group, where they still exist to the number of 10,000. They are called Ainos, which means "O dog!" They maintain their aboriginal customs, as the Indians of our West do when displaced by the white man and driven into a corner. They dress still in bark clothing, have a simple faith, worship nature in her rudest forms, but remain stationary—refuse to advance. The arrival of the Buddhists brought a religion which taught the duty of prayer and the exercise of charity. The five commandments of Buddhism are, not to kill any living being; not to steal; not to commit adultery; not to lie, slander, and swear; to avoid drunkenness. These Buddhists thus had a religion that inculcated the humanities of life. A lower race and civilization were forced to yield to their conquering arm. The new-comers retained their warlike character, and when the recent opening of Japan occurred, the native princes had a large patrician military class under their command. These soldiers, owing to their leisure, had abundance of time to give to the study of literature. This literature had come from China, and had been brought over by them thirteen hundred years before. To become proficient in the knowledge of these writings of Confucius was a national ambition with the military classes. They are written in the Chinese characters; to begin with, a man must know 3,000; to be considered an advanced scholar, 7,000 are necessary; and to be a proficient, 60,000.

These princes and their retainers had been faithful subjects and servants of the old Tycoon. But when the empire was opened to foreigners, the privileges granted to these princes were small, and in consequence the Tycoon was deposed (1868), and with his fall the whole military system of the empire went to pieces.

The overthrow of the Tycoon was a fatal blow to Buddhi temple worship, for he was its chief supporter. These temples abounded in the country. There were nearly 300,000 of them. They resembled small monasteries, with a priest and ten to twelve attendants. But the dethronement of their patron compelled these men to seek their daily bread in some other way. The service has fallen into disrepute and the temples are falling into decay, or being transformed into school-houses.

Thus the way has been opened for the introduction of a purer and more spiritual religion.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Balance of Nature—Fish.—It is difficult to convey an adequate idea of the number of individual fish which may compose a shoal of herrings, and it has been averred that they would speedily impede navigation were it not for the vast number of agencies that are at work to prevent an undue increase of their number. As the result of recent inquiry, we have been informed that the quantities which man takes from the water for food uses do not represent a tenth of what are captured by the sea birds, or devoured by marine enemies. As the herring is the only fish of which statistics of the capture are collected and tabulated, we are in possession of figures which afford us a rough idea of the numbers annually withdrawn from the sea for food purposes. In a recent year, sufficient herrings were taken to fill a million barrels and as each barrel contains on an average 700 fish, we have thus a number equal to 700,000,000. This quantity, it must be observed, represents cured fish only, and only those which are caught in Scotland under the superintendence of the Fishery Board. It is pretty certain that as many herrings are captured and offered for sale as fresh fish and "reds" as are cured for the markets in Scotland and offered for sale as salt herrings; which gives us the prodigious total of 1,400,000,000 withdrawn annually from the sea; and even this number, vast as it is, does not include what are used in the form of whitebait, or those which are sold as sprats. After draining the sea to such an extent, it might be supposed that there would be scarcely so many herrings left as would suffice for a breeding stock; but the demands of man are a mere fraction of what are taken out of the shoals. All that are captured, as well as all that are wasted during the capture, and destroyed in the process of curing, sink into insignificance when compared with the vastness of the quantities which are devoured by other enemies of the fish. Cod and ling are known to prey extensively on the herring; and a calculation, based on the number of cod and ling annually caught under the auspices of the Scottish Board of Fisheries, (3,500,000 were taken in 1876.) assumes that there is a capital stock of these fish in the Scottish firths and seas of 1,000,000 individuals; and that each individual consumes 420 herrings every day, or seven months in the year, shows a consumption of 29,400,000,000 individual herrings, or does the account stop at this point. The commissioners who recently collected information on Scottish herring fisheries assume that in Scotland alone the gannet (a sea-bird) will annually draw on the shoals to the extent of 1,100,000,000 herrings! In addition dog-fish, cod, gannets and other sea-birds, the herring has many other enemies; and porpoises, seals, coal-fish, and other voracious fishes are constantly lying in wait to fall upon and devour them. A female herring, we know, yields over 30,000 eggs; but at the shoaling, millions of these eggs are devoured by a variety of enemies, besides which, hundreds of thousands of the eggs perish in the water.

Chambers' Journal.

A dog or cat if dipped into melted paraffine or tallow, so that the skin exertions are suspended, will die almost as quickly as if ten grains of strychnine had been administered. The skin is the most important auxiliary to the lungs in the process of aeration of the blood, and so intimate the connection, or so similar and important are its functions, that when death ensues from skin obstructions, all the conditions resemble those occasioned by cutting off air from the lungs. More deaths from consumption are caused primarily by skin obstructions than from any original weakness or disease in the lungs. The lungs are the first of the important organs to be injured by derangements of the skin, and they often become congested or disorganized through secondary causes.

Hot Lemonade.—A hot lemonade is one of the best remedies for a cold, as it acts promptly and efficiently and has no unpleasant after-effects. One lemon should be properly squeezed, cut in slices, put with sugar and covered with half a pint of boiling water. Drink just before going to bed and do not expose yourself to the following day. The remedy may ward off an attack of chills and fever if it is used promptly.

Equal parts of lime water and linsed or live oil make, probably, the best remedy for severe burns. This should be applied with a lint or soft rags saturated with the mixture; and oiled silk or rubber cloth applied outside to prevent drying.

The largest egg in the world is the fossil egg of the Reptorina Maxima. There are but few specimens of this egg in existence. The egg has the capacity of 144 hens' eggs. The bird which produced this egg was anciently a native of Madagascar, but has long since become extinct.

A rather gaily-dressed young lady asked her class: "What is meant by the pomps and vanities of the world?" The answer was honest, but rather unexpected: "Them flowers in your hat." That was a sermon on "top-not come down."

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 25, 1879.

A writer in a recent number of the Christian Advocate, describes a tent-meeting which he attended held by one of the off-shoots from the Methodist Church. He says: "After long, loud, and vehement prayers, accompanied with boisterous and incessant shouts and exclamations, a strange effect was manifested among some of the young women who had gone forward for prayers. Some burst out into loud lamentations and groans, then into hysterical laughter, and finally into shouts and screams, followed by general or partial physical prostration. The groans and shouts of some young girls were heard more than a mile. Those were the most affected who were the most closely surrounded by the strong and noisy ones who proposed to 'pray them through.'"

"Stepping up to one of the happy ones after the meeting, I asked her if God had given her a conscious sense of pardoned sin. 'O, I don't know,' said she, 'what it is; but I feel so happy.' Perhaps, said I, God has enlightened your mind respecting some precious truth in the gospel, and therefore you are happy. 'O no,' said she, 'that isn't it, I don't know what it is; but I feel so happy.' She then complained of numbness in the hands and arms, and apparently swooned away, giving occasional utterance to ecstatic expressions.

"When water was brought for her restoration, in response to her request, the managers of the meeting objected, saying this was 'the power of God.' Others attempting to remove the numbness complained of by rubbing the parts affected, were rebuked as interfering with 'a work of the Spirit.'"

"These phenomena being pointed to as samples of 'old-fashioned conversions,' I was led to ask, How much of this has a natural, and how much a supernatural, cause? Is there not something in the condition of the mind and its influence upon the body that will explain some of the phenomena thoughtlessly attributed to the Holy Spirit? Dr. Cathbert of Londonberry, a witness of many of the Ulster revival cases of 1859, says: 'There were cases in which hysterical symptoms arose, not, apparently, directly from the impressions produced on the mind by the revivalist preachers themselves, but as the result of sympathy and imitation. This agrees with Watson's explanation of similar phenomena in Wesley's day. He says: 'There are always nervous, dreamy, and excitable people to be found; and the emotion which was produced among those who were really so 'pricked in the heart' as to cry with a sincerity equal to that which was felt by those of old, 'What shall we do to be saved?' would often be communicated to such persons by natural sympathy. No one could be blamed for this, unless he had encouraged the excitement for its own sake, or taught the people to regard it as a sign of grace, which, most assuredly, Wesley never did.

"Now, when I think of four or five strong athletic men, kneeling beside three or four penitent girls, praying with all the fervor they can command, shouting, clapping hands, and exhorting them so incessantly, that, as one remarked, she 'couldn't think at all,' it is no wonder a depression and then a reaction is produced, in which the experience is simply an unaccountable happiness. Such a method is calculated to produce a superficial work, having its source in nervous excitement, leading finally to disappointment, and the most rigorous and bitter skepticism.

"One of the most pronounced skeptics I know is a backslidden Methodist preacher, who was once remarkable for the wonderful physical manifestations that attended his preaching. Shouts, groans, and tears were frequently heard and seen in his audiences, and himself has been known to drop in the pulpit from sheer exhaustion. To-day he doubts if there is any work of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of even the best of men. Another preacher, when quite a youth, was urged by certain ignorant brethren to be more demonstrative in his religious life, and to make audible responses to prayer or exhortation. During a protracted meeting they urged him to shout, and, obeying their counsel, was soon as ecstatic as the noisiest of them. Before he arose from his knees a conviction that his demonstrativeness was factitious sent a feeling of remorse and shame into his soul, and for months he was on the verge of backsliding, feeling he had been guilty of blasphemy. To-day, he says, he remembers that experience as he would a horrid nightmare. Are we not exhorted: 'Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God.'"

We have been induced to give this article a place in our columns, believing it is a timely and needed caution in the present day. Persons of an enthusiastic temperament, may work themselves and their audiences up to a high degree of excitement, and think that they have accomplished great results; when no real good has been effected. As Samuel Fothergill remarked, more than a century ago, "I have seen a danger of being taken by the passions. The passionate preacher hath affected the passionate hearer; both have been in raptures, and neither of them profited."

The Spirit of the Lord alone can change the heart of man, and unless it accompanies the labors of the preacher, all his words are no better than sounding brass. Therefore the Society of Friends have ever believed that no man should venture to enter on the ministry of the Gospel unless he is called of the Lord so to do; and that he must be conscious of a fresh requisition of duty, and of the assisting power of the Lord on every exercise of his gift. For unless these things attend the ministry, there is no reasonable ground to believe that the Holy Spirit will bless the efforts of the preacher—and without the Divine blessing no spiritual fruits will follow.

Our Saviour has laid down the rule by which we are to judge of the reality of a conversion of heart, and change from a state of nature to that of grace—"By their fruits shall ye know them." "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." Where these holy and heavenly fruits are manifested in the daily life and conversation of a man, there are scripture grounds for believing that he is Christ's, even if his voice is never heard in the assemblies of the people, and his path through life is in the vale of unobtrusive quiet. But if these are wanting, no degree of physical or mental excitement, no amount of profession, and no measure of active labor in professedly religious or philanthropic movements, will convince a clear-sighted observer that he has really entered into the Saviour's fold, and that the life he is now living is a life of faith.

We have been instructed and comforted in reading "A Brief Memoir of the late Joseph Henderson," sent to us by a friend from Canada. He was a carpet weaver who removed from Scotland some years ago, and settled in Canada; and joined the Society of Friends through conviction of the truth of its principles. He appears to have been one of those whom the apostle describes as "the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him."

As his attention was turned to the Light of Christ shining within him, he found this blessed and holy Guide to lead him in the same path that it led the early members of our Society. It led him to value that quiet retirement of spirit and waiting on the Lord, in which ability is received to hold communion with our Heavenly Father; it taught him that the tendency of singing, as practised in times of public worship, was "to raise the heart out of that low, humble and penitent state in which alone we can worship God in spirit and in truth;" and it enabled him to feel the preciousness of those silent meetings in which the people are "gathered together in the presence of God himself, that Great Teacher who teaches as never in a taught."

It is encouraging to observe how the King Immortal is pleased to bring in, as from the highways and hedges, those whom he chooses to partake of the rich bounties of his table; and it confirms our belief that he will care for his own cause in the earth, and will raise up from time to time those who will uphold the Truth in its purity. We most deeply desire that none of those who may be called the children of the kingdom, may be cast out because of their unfaithfulness, but rather that in them may be fulfilled the prophetic declaration: "He shall be named the priests of the Lord; men shall call you the ministers of our God."

The memoir will be found in another part of our columns.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Owing to continued drought, the streams in Lancaster county are lower than they have been for thirty years. In the southern portion of the county most of the springs are dried up, and farmers have to haul water for their stock. A rolling-mill, and most of the grist-mills in the county have stopped.

Forest fires are reported in various parts of New Hampshire and Vermont lately.

A dispatch from Washington says: The expenditures for the Post-office Department for the next fiscal year are estimated at $29,920,000. The revenues will be $32,210,000, leaving a deficiency to be provided for out of the general fund of $7,710,000.

The Hudson Tunnel Company, which began excavations in 1871, for a submarine passage to connect New York and Jersey City, have again resumed operations. The tunnel is to be circular in form, 25 feet wide, and 21 feet high; its length 12,000 feet, and its greatest depth below water over 60 feet. Its estimated cost is $1,000,000, and the engineer thinks it can be finished in two years. The object is to make direct railway connection between New York and the several railways terminating in Jersey City.

The coal conference recently held at Elmira, N. Y., resulted, it is said, in all the dealers agreeing to refrain from cutting, and also agreeing upon a general advance of prices.

The superintendent of the department of buildings in New York city, states that during the first eight months of 1879, there were 1450 buildings constructed, at a cost of $16,351,512, an increase of 522 in number over same period last year, and in cost of construction $1,872,312.

Official returns of the vote on Chinese immigration in California show that the vote in its favor was 883, and against it 154,638.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics reports, that the value of the exports from the United States of live animals of all kinds increased from $5,844,653, during the fiscal year of 1878, to $11,487,754 during 1879. Of the total exports of live animals during the last fiscal year, 71 per cent. were sent to Great Britain, the remainder being distributed to other countries. The chief articles being the sheep, the export of which is chiefly for the purpose of effecting the speedy transportation of cattle and for securing their comfort and health, both on cars and on shipboard, it is believed will result in a large and constant increase of such exports.

During the past week the mortality in New York 465 deaths. The average of mortality is said to be the lowest of any week on record.

In Philadelphia the mortality was 223.

Markets, &c.—U. S. bonds, 6% 1881, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 5% registered, 102 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; do., coupon, 103 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ %, 1891, 105 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 4 per cent., 102.

Business generally has been quite active during the past week, and prices of most of the leading articles were higher.

Cotton, 10 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 11 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude 7 a 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. in barrels, and refined 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. for export, and 8 a 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—Minnesota extra, $7.25 for medium, to $7.50 for extra; Penna. and Ohio, do. $7.00 a patent, $5.50 a $7.00; Rye flour, $3. Bran, $1.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat unshelled and a few cents lower. Red, $1.47 a $1.48; amber, $1.50 a $1.51. Rye, 90 cts. Corn, 64 a 65 cts. Oats, 43 a 45 cts. for mixed, and 46 a 47 cts. for white.

Sticks of Lard.—Prime tallow, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 8 cts. per pound; Timothy seed, \$2.50 per bushel; Flaxseed, \$1.30.

Hay and Straw.—Prime timothy, $9 a 90 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 65 a 75 cts. Straw, 85 a $1 per 100 pounds.

Cattle.—The market was stronger and prices higher.—\$200 head sold at 3 a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts., as to quality. Cows, \$20 a \$45 per head. Calves, 5 a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per pound. Hogs, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 6 cts. Sheep, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 5 cts. Lumbs, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts., as to condition.

A meeting of the New York Chamber of Commerce, it was stated that the grain charges in the port of Liverpool amounted to one dollar per ton. In Havre the charges exceed the original cost of the grain. In New York the elevator charges aggregate only nine and one-half cents a ton.

Portugal and Spain.—A hurricane on the night of the 14th inst., accompanied by heavy rains, caused the rivers Mondo and Segura to overflow, and it flooded the populous and fertile valley. Several cities and villages sustained severe injuries. The inundations were so extensive that the inhabitants were compelled to fly without saving any property. A dispatch from Madrid says, the Cortes will be asked to relieve Murcia from direct taxes, in consequence of losses occasioned by the inundation. The total damage is estimated at $1,000,000. Three thousand five hundred houses, and one hundred and twenty mills were destroyed. King Alfonso has subscribed 50,000 francs for the relief of the sufferers, and the Princess of Austria 5,000 piastres. The Bank of Spain has collected 60,000 francs for the same purpose.

There was a sharp frost on the 17th, in the Department of the Gironde, endangering the vintage. Snow has fallen at Marseilles.

A Vienna dispatch of the 17th says: "Snow is falling in the night, and will reach six inches deep. At Great Falls snow is several feet deep. Such weather is unprecedented at this season."

Advices from Pesh state: It is feared the help which the Hungarian Government proposes to afford disaffected agriculturists will come to nothing, on account of the autumn and winter sowing. Throughout the country, thousands of people lack money with which to purchase food, as the tax-gatherers have seized all their possessions.

The Spanish Submarine Telegraph Cable was successfully laid on the 14th inst.

On entering Calcut, General Roberts made a speech to the following effect: It will be necessary to inflict severe punishment. Buildings of the Bala Hissar, and of the city interfering with proper military occupation, will be destroyed. A heavy fine will be levied on the citizens. A military Government will be placed over the city. The inhabitants will be required to surrender their arms within a week, under pain of death if they refuse to do so. Rewards will be paid for the denunciation and conviction of any person concerned in the massacre of the British Embassy.

The plans for the opening up of Central Africa, projected by the late Khedive, have been abandoned on account of his financial failure. The importance of this work is thus indicated. Since 1874, a tract of country mapped with the Southern States of America, has been surveyed with remarkable accuracy. Over 3,000 miles of telegraph lines are in operation, the slave trade has been suppressed, the postal service and other valuable improvements introduced.

Romania.—The Chamber of Deputies have passed the bill for the re-constitution concerning the abolition of religious disabilities. A despatch to the Times says, that the measure adopted by the movement for the relief of the Jews does not comprise all that they desired, but it is the beginning of better days for them, and if they accept and make the best of them, they will have a peaceful and prosperous political future before them.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WESTTOWN SESSION opens on Second-day, Eleventh month 3d. Parents and others intending to send pupils will please make early application to BENJAMIN W. PASSMORE, Sup't., Street, West, Pa. Also, to the Publishers, CHARLES J. ALLIE, Treasurer, 301 Arch street Philadelphia.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION of the School will commence on Second-day the 3rd of Eleventh month.

Pupils who have been regularly entered and who pay by the cars from Philadelphia, can obtain tickets at the depot of West Chester, at the Philadelphia and Chestnut street cars of Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, by giving their names to the Ticket-agent there, who is furnished with a list of the pupils for that purpose. In such case the passage, including the stage fare from the Railroad Station, will be charged at the School. The charge for the ticket will be 12 cents per trunk, to be paid in time. Tickets can also be obtained of the Treasurer, 301 Arch street. Conveyances will be at the STREET ROAD Station on Second and Third days, the 3rd and 4th proximo, to meet the trains that leave Philadelphia at 12 o'clock, and arrive at West Chester at 12:30.

Baggage may be left either at Thirty-first and Chestnut streets or at Eighteenth and Market. If left at the latter place, it must be put under the care of H. Alexander & Son, who will convey it thence to Thirty-first and Chestnut at a charge of 10 cents per trunk, to be paid in time. Those who prefer can have their baggage sent for to any place in the built-up part of the City, by sending word on the day previous (through the post-office or otherwise) to H. Alexander & Son, N. corner of 18th and Market streets, to have their baggage for taking incidental charges to Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, will be 25 cents per trunk. For the same charge they will also collect baggage from the other railroad depots, if the checks are left in their office corner of 18th and Market Sts. Baggage put under their care, will be taken to the depot, and will be forwarded direct to the School. It may not always go on the same train as the owner, but it will go on the same day, provided the owner has H. Alexander & Son reaches them in time.

DEPARTURE SESSION.—Passengers for the School will be met at the Street Road Station, on the arrival of the first train from the City, every day except First-day and small packages for the pupils, if left at Friend Book Store, 301 Arch street, will be forwarded every Sixth day at 12 o'clock, except on the last two Saturdays of the Twelfth month, and the expense charged their bills.

Tenth month 22d, 1879.

Though not having much of a gift of utterance in public, yet it was his constant concern to show to all around him that there was a reality in the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and endeavored in his daily life and conversation to live consistently with his profession thereof. He had a great desire for the spread of Truth as professed by Friends, and he believed it to be nothing short of Primitive Christianity revived, and in accordance with the teachings of Scripture; and it was his daily concern, wherever his lot was cast, whether in his own family or among his neighbors, to be watching for opportunities of speaking a word for his Lord and Master. He also felt a great concern for his children, that they might be trained up for the Lord, and while he was diligent as far as he was able to provide for their bodies, his greatest concern was for the salvation of their souls, and to this end he felt it his duty to be diligent in instructing them as they came to the years of religious understanding in the Holy Scriptures, and, as ability was afforded him, in the principles of Truth therein revealed. It was his constant practice to collect his family together twice in the day for the purpose of reading the Scriptures, and waiting upon the Lord, and although thus a continual practice, it never became an empty form with him, for in the exercise thereof he realized more and more the truth of the promise, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up upon wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint;" and he often said that he did not know how he could have got along without the strength that he received in this line of duty. His wife also being closely united with him in these things, they were a great help to each other and a blessing to their children, and it might be said of them, that though poor in this world's goods, they were rich in the things of God.

His concern for his children increased as they grew up and began to work among strangers. Often would he leave his own work and go and see them when within reach, and inquire after their welfare, warning them when necessary against evil company, and always encouraging them in doing right.

They were not always under the influence of as good example as he would have liked, which also increased his anxiety. He always liked to have them as near home as possible, that he might still, in some measure, have a care over them, and influence them as much as possible in the right way, so great did he feel his responsibility to be; and he continually presented them before the Throne of Grace, that they might be kept from the evil which is in the world. The troubles of body which he had incurred in youth, from a want of care and from exposure, and which he never got rid of, increased as he advanced in years. His nervous system was also much impaired, so that for two or three years previous to his death he was not able to labor much, but as long as he was able to be up he endeavored to be faithful in whatever he felt it his duty to do, visiting his neighbors or going wherever he felt drawn, with a word of encouragement or counsel as the case might be.

Although his requirements were thus in a humble sphere, he felt very much the importance of a faithful discharge of them, knowing that in the sight of the Lord, "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much;" and that He who had committed unto Him this work would call him to account for the same, he endeavored so to live as to be able to render up his account with joy and not with grief.

Although poorly the greater part of his life, he very seldom was confined to his bed. During the year 1877, he was rather worse than usual, and seemed to fail, considerably more so in strength than in flesh, and in the latter part of it was unable to attend meeting. About the middle of Twelfth month he contracted a severe cold which confined him to his bed by renewing his old complaints, inflammation of the lungs, and disease of the kidneys. Dropsy also set in, and, with all combined, he suffered very much the remaining part of his life, which was short. When thus brought so near to his end he felt that sustaining evidence, that He who had been so merciful and gracious, and had so kindly led and brought him thus far, would not forsake him now, as he frequently testified, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto his care against that day." Though at times he longed to depart, yet throughout his illness, as also in times of health, he desired and was willing that the will of the Lord might be done in him, and that he might be enabled by his grace in all things to glorify his great and ever blessed name. He very much desired of his wife and family that they also might submit to the will of the Lord, and give him up thereunto, so that he might be more freed from that which would bind him to earth, and when the messenger came and called him hence, he could answer the summons with joy. The only desire he had for life was that he might be made instrumental in extending the cause of Christ, and as a monument of God's mercy, might proclaim to a dying world the infinite goodness, boundless love, and the tender mercies of our common Saviour, who is Judge of both quick and dead. But apprehending that his day's work was almost done, that his time was but short, he wished to spend it in praising the Lord while he had breath; and at times whilst he was able to speak plain, his tongue was loosed and his mouth opened in living praises to God Most High, declaring that had he the pen of a ready writer he could write volumes of the great goodness of the Lord to him, but it could not be half told, realizing the language of the apostle when he said, "Oh! the depth of the riches of the goodness of the Lord, how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways are past finding out."

He was always pleased to have his neighbors come in and see him, but he did not like to hear any conversation that savored of a light or worldly nature, as it was a great annoyance to him, but when Friends came in, those with whom he was in unity, he seemed to be so revived as to talk a good deal, sometimes more than was best. He got very feeble towards the last, but was quite sensible, with the exception of a few times when his mind seemed to be wandering, till within a few hours of his death, which was a great favor and comfort to his family. On the last day, feeling that the time of his departure was at hand, he called them around him, and bidding them all farewell, and with a word of exhortation to all—"Follow me as I have followed Christ"—he folded his arms in peace. A little after this his mind began to wander, and he lapsed in this state unconscious of any one for about six hours, when about six o'clock in the evening he suddenly expired. He departed this life on the 1st day of Second month, 1878, in the 52nd year of his age, and was buried in the Friends' burying ground, North Norwich, Ont.

Shortly before his death he desired that a short account of his life might be written and preserved, as a memorial of the kind and merciful dealings of the Lord with him, and as an encouragement to those into whose hands it might come, who were placed in like situations, to be attentive to the gentle intimations of the inward monitor, willing to be led and guided by it in all circumstances, and faithful in obeying and following it as it opens to our way of duty. It was his experience, after coming to a knowledge of the intimate intimations of the Holy Spirit in the heart of man, that it was only by a faithful obedience to its gentle intimations in little things that he was led step by step into a higher and more perfect knowledge of God, until he came to be familiar with his voice and to know it from family as a stranger, as Christ hath said, "My sheep know my voice, and they follow me, but a stranger will they not follow, for they know not the voice of strangers." In this following its motions he ever felt the blessed effect of obedience, the peace and favor of God, and was enabled to keep his lamp trimmed and burning, so that when the cry came, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him," he was ready to enter with him to the marriage.

In writing the above I have endeavored to be as concise as possible, not mentioning anything but what I deemed was really necessary to give the reader a correct idea of his situation and the manner of God's dealings with him, and hope that it may answer its designed end.

Babylonia and Assyria.

Going back to about 2000 B. C., when Egypt had long enjoyed an isolated and wonderful civilization, we find the lower plain of the Euphrates, or "the land of Shinar," occupied by two distinct but already mingled races—the Aceads and the Semites.

The Aceads were short, oblique-eyed people, speaking a language, allied to the Elamite on the East, and perhaps to the modern Finnish and Tatar. They had many cities—such as Erech, Calneh, and Calimira, afterwards called Babylon (cf. Gen. x. 10), and had plainly been long in the land. Their civilization was considerable, and seems to have been of native growth. We find no traces of Egyptian worship or sculpture, and though the writings which from time immemorial had been in use among them was doubtless derived from earlier hieroglyphics, or picture words, yet this does not imply contact with Egypt. From the brick tablets, which have survived in a climate where paper or parchment has perished, we know that the Aceads had written laws, and carefully-recorded legal precedents. They protected the slave against his master, and the wife against her husband. We can read their ploughman's songs, their rules for agriculture, their works on arithmetic (including fractions), and even the fortnightly reports of the astronomers which now and then record an eclipse happening other than "according to calculation." True, the Acead star-gazers were "monthly prognosticators," and everything in heaven above as well as in the earth beneath was consulted in order to divine the future. Yet if they failed to explain what they saw, these early astronomers were the first to arrange the Calendar. The lunar month was divided into four weeks, and the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days were Sabbaths, or days of rest, when even the king might neither eat cooked meat, change his clothes, sit in judgment, drive his chariot, nor review his army, though the why and wherefore of this does not appear. The early Acead religion had been a kind of dependence on sorcerers. Magic formulae and spells formed a large portion of their earliest literature, and in later days Chaldee sorcerers found their way to Imperial Rome. But by 2000 B. C. a complicated mythology and a powerful priesthood had arisen, and there was formed about this time a collection of poems which served as a sort of Acead Bible. Of one of these, remarkable as a penitential Psalm, a few lines may be given:—

"O my Lord, my transgression (is) great, many (are) my sins,

O my Goddess, my transgression (is) great, my sins (are) many.
The forbidden thing did I eat.
The forbidden thing did I trample upon.
My Lord, in the wrath of His heart, has punished me.
God, in the strength of His heart, has overpowered me.
The Goddess upon me has laid affliction and in pain has set me.
God, who knew (that) I knew not, hath caused darkness.
I cried aloud, there was none that would hear me.
To my God my (distress) I referred; my prayer I addressed.
The sin (that) I have sinned to blessedness turn.
The transgression I have committed let the wind carry away.
My manifold affliction like a garment destroy.
O my God, seven times seven (are my) transgressions, my transgressions are before me."<sup>17</sup>

Striking as this is it must not be forgotten that at the same time human sacrifice was practised, and the prevailing superstitions were degrading in the extreme. The chief poem, however, is the Epic of Gilshubar. This is arranged in twelve books, which by their contents correspond to the signs of the Zodiac. The hero, Gilshubar, a great conqueror, after many impossible adventures, wanders to the South, and hears the account of the Deluge from Sisathrus—the Noah of the Bible—who had been translated to Heaven. As is well known from the works of its discoverer, the late George Smith, this account presents numerous minute parallels with the Scriptural one, and agrees, too, in representing the flood as sent by the gods to punish men for sin.

From the Aceads we now turn to the Semites. By Semites (or Shemites, i. e., the supposed descendants of Shem) is meant the race of which the later Babylonians and Assyrians, the Syrians, Phœnicians, Arabs, and Jews were the leading examples. All these spoke allied languages, which had no connection with the Acead. Whence the Semites came, or when they began to supplant the Aceadians, is unknown. At any rate, by 1750 B. C. we find a Semite king ruling the whole of Babylonia, and the Acead tongue no longer spoken. The Semites inherited and handed on the civilization of their predecessors, and we find Acead divinities, B-el, Istar, and Rimmon, worshipped in Syria and Phœnicia with, in some cases, the dreadful accompaniment of human sacrifice. The Semite settlers formed for themselves, out of the Acead characters, a cumbersome syllabic alphabet of 500 or more letters; they kept up the Acead libraries, and translated the works in them, and the old language continued to be studied and used by the Semite priests and perhaps lawyers, much as Latin is or was amongst ourselves.

Amidst the obscurity of this period we know that Ur, the home of Abraham, and one of the most powerful cities of Babylonia, and it can hardly be that the patriarch, when called to leave his country, can have been ignorant of its literature. There is evidently some connection between the Scripture accounts of the Creation, the Deluge, and Babel, and those current among the Aceads before the time of Abraham. As yet the literature, 4,000 years old, which is being recovered from the mounds and buried cities of Assyria and Babylonia has failed to show what that connection is. Abraham's defeat of Chedorlaomer, King of Elam (Gen. xiv.), is consonant with known invasions of early Babylonia by the Elamites of the mountains to the east of the Euphrates.

In fact the raids of these highlanders were only finally checked by Nebuchadnezzar.

For a thousand years after Abraham, Mesopotamian history scarcely touches the Israelites. Whilst the latter were in Egypt the city of Babylon became the acknowledged sovereign of the South Euphrates Valley, and Assyria to the north, an early colony of Babylonia (cf. Gen. x. 11), threw off the yoke of the mother country though retaining her language, customs, and religion. The Babylonians were essentially a peaceful people (The Assyrians, on the contrary, the Roman of the East, delighted in war, and under Tiglath Pileser I. (690-640 B. C.), they not only ruled the whole Euphrates Valley, but reached the Mediterranean. Pretty full details, and fairly accurate chronology, are available for three centuries before this point. We know little, however, of Assyria or Babylonia during the reigns of David and Solomon, nor indeed, until the time when Assyrian affairs touched Palestine. Just at this juncture the State archives furnish, from B. C. 900 forward numerous details and an exact chronology which serves as a useful check on the data given in the Books of Kings and Chronicles. The zenith of what is commonly called the Second Assyrian Empire dates from 732 B. C. when Tiglath Pileser II. took Damascus, slew Razon, and broke the power of Syria, of late a sad oppressor of Israel. The only great nation which remained unsubdued was Egypt and her cowardly attempts to induce her neighbors to revolt against Assyria were at last deservedly punished in the destruction of Thebes by Assurbanipal (B. C. 666-5, and of Nahum iii. 8-10.)

Assurbanipal (B. C. 665 to 626 ?), the Sardanapalus of the Greeks, was the last of the great Assyrian monarchs, and the most magnificent of them all. But he will be remembered less by his conquests and palaces than by the great library of 10,000 tablets which he caused to be "written, engraved, and explained, and stored in the midst of his palace for the inspection of his subjects" at Nineveh. Acead and Babylonia literature was studied by the Assyrians, just as in later days the Romans cultivated the learning of the conquered Greeks. It is from the grammars, dictionaries, and translations of this library that we have obtained most of our information on Aceadian life. It is impossible to detail the multifarious character of the documents discovered, ranging from the private will of Sennacherib to a spelling lesson for the grand-daughter of Assurbanipal. Suffice it to say that we now know Assyrian civilization almost as well as we know the not dissimilar Chinese life and thought of to-day. Moreover when we consider that thirty years ago no Jewish king was known to have been named in foreign documents, and that the cuneiform records already deciphered have mentioned Omri, Abah, Jehu, Menahem, Pekah, Hoshea of Israel; Azariah, Abaz, Hezekiah, and Manasseh of Judah, and in every respect strikingly illustrate and confirm the Scripture narratives of this epoch, we may well do honor to the labor of Assyrian scholars and wish them God-speed in their further researches.

Exhausted by wars, Assyria rapidly and finally fell on the death of Assurbanipal. About 607 B. C. Nineveh was destroyed, and her dominions shared by Babylon on the south, the Medes on the east, and Egypt on to south-west. Then, under Nebuchadnezzar, Babylon conquered Egypt, and, after enjoying her one brief hour of empire, herself fell before Cyrus the Persian, B. C. 539. The monuments have thrown much light on this complicated period. Belshazzar's name has been recovered, and perhaps we may yet hear of some reference to Daniel.

Brief Spiritual Observations;

Extracted from the writings of William Linn.

"The greatest danger that new converts are liable to, especially if they are young, rises from their conceiving something great of their conversion, and that great things are a follow from it. Hence they are taken up too much with themselves, and the supposed signs of God upon them. They enter into reasonings and conjectures, how they shall be able to do something extraordinary; and so lose that simplicity of heart, which should think of nothing but of dying to self, that the Spirit of God might have time and place to create, and to form all that is wanting in their inward man."

"There is nothing more plain and simple than the way of religion, if self is but kept out of it; and all the perplexities and scruples which pious persons meet with, chiefly arise from some idea they have formed, of a progress they ought to make in order to be that, which self would be. But piety makes little progress till it has no schemes of its own, no thoughts or contrivances to be any thing, but a simple penitent, left wholly and solely, in faith and hope, to the Divine goodness."

"The faith that ascribes all to God, and expects all from Him, cannot be disappointing."

"To be inwardly attentive to God, while He is showing the good and the evil, distinguishing the light from the darkness in our own souls; to listen to the voice of his ever-speaking Word, and to watch the movings of his ever-sanctifying Spirit within us, waiting and longing in the spirit of prayer, of faith and hope, of love and resignation, to be inwardly quickened and revived in the image, and according to the likeness of that Son, in whom He is well pleased, is the worshipping of God with our whole heart and soul, in spirit and in truth."

"God is always present, and always working towards the life of the soul, and its deliverance from captivity under flesh and blood. But this inward work of God, though never ceasing or altering, is yet always and only hindered by the activity of our own nature and faculties; by bad men through their obedience to earthly passions, and by good men through their striving to be good in their own way, by their natural strength, and the multiplicity of seemingly holy labors and contrivances. Both these sorts of people obstruct the work of God upon their own souls. For we can co-operate with God no other way, than by submitting to the work of God, and seeking, and leaving ourselves to it."

"There is nothing that so sanctifies the heart of man, that keeps us in such habitual love, prayer, and delight in God; nothing that so kills all the roots of evil in our nature, that so renews and perfects all our virtues, that so wishes us with so much love, goodness, and good wishes to every creature, as this faith,—that God is always present in us—with his Light and Holy Spirit."

"The Son of God did not come from above, to add an external form of worship to the several ways of life that are in the world; and so to leave people to live as they did before, in such tempers and enjoyments as the fashion and spirit of the world approves. But as He came down from heaven, altogether divine and heavenly in his own nature, so it was to call mankind to a divine and heavenly life; to the highest change of their whole nature and temper; to be born again of the Holy Spirit; to walk in the wisdom and light and love of God; and be like Him to the utmost of their power; to renounce all the most plausible ways of the world, whether of greatness, business, or pleasure; to a mortification of all their most agreeable passions; and to live in such wisdom, and purity and holiness, as might fit them to be glorious in the enjoyment of God to all eternity."

"This is the state of separation from the world, to which all orders of Christians are called. They must so far renounce all worldly tempers, be so far governed by the things of another life, as to show that they are truly and really crucified, dead, and risen with Christ. And it is as necessary for all Christians to conform to this great change of spirit, to be thus in Christ new creatures, as it was necessary that Christ should suffer, die, and rise again for our salvation."

The foregoing extracts from the writings of William Linn, an English Episcopal minister of the last century, have been principally taken from his published letters on religious subjects; or one or two from his well known work, "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life;" and the remainder from other parts of his writings. Several of his books are more labored in their composition, and less satisfactory than the above named; but it has been refreshing to find so much in the works extracted from, so consonant with sound spiritual doctrine, and with Christian experience.

"For The Friend."

Six Months in Ascension.

Among the relaxations in which our astronomers indulged in the intervals of their anxious watching, was a visit to the breeding grounds of the "Wide-awakes" or "Tropical Swallows," a small and graceful sea-bird of the Tern family, which at irregular intervals resorts to Ascension to rear its young. Our author says:—

"Wide-awake! Wide-awake!" is the response of thousands of baby birdies to the encouraging cry of their mothers—"Come here! Come here!" in the lessons of first light. The noise they make is certainly fair-like, hence the names "Wide-awake" (Sterna fuliginosa) and "Wide-awake Fair."

"The Wide-awakes choose their nurseries for the most part among the rocks in the centre of the island. The largest 'Fair' which we now visited, lies between Gannet Hill and Riding school Crater, about three miles from Garrison and two miles from Mars Bay. Here David, attended by Greydon and Sam, met us, and so did the Wide-awakes with a noisy greeting. Poor little things, how they shrieked in their excitement! To say that there were thousands, conveys no idea of the vast multitude of birds that whirled around and above us—so close that one gentleman caught several, seizing them in his hands as they flew by. One carried in its bill a tiny fish, which we took the liberty of examining, and, much to our surprise, found it to be no inhabitant of Ascension waters; so that this hungry little Wide-awake—about the size of an ordinary pigeon, only more slender and graceful in form—must have flown many a weary mile in search of its prey. We restored to him his supper and his liberty."

"Of course there was competition in egg-gathering, at which I was singularly unsuccessful, feeling so confused by the deafening noise and so sickened by the strong smell of guano, that my wits went a-wool-gathering instead."

"The thin shell is speckled very much like that of the grouse, and is difficult to detect on the bare stony ground on which the eggs are laid. It is more by the excitement of the birds in the neighborhood of their treasures, than by anything else, that one discovers them; and so bold are they that the female will hardly leave her post until actually thrust aside."

"It was very amusing on one occasion. Just as we had scared a little hen from her solitary egg, her lord and master swooped down to defend it, and stood over the treasure screaming and flapping his wings in a fury, and threatening to attack any one that dared approach him. I admired his courage so much that, had not this been my first find, I certainly would not have robbed him."

"We gathered a good many dozens, but the eggs were by no means so numerous as I had been led to expect. I had been told that it was customary, on going to the Fair for plaster, to mark off and clear a space of ground, and then to sit down at some little distance and smoke a cigar till the birds should fly afresh. From the word 'clear' I had conceived an absurd idea of the ground being so covered with eggs that it would require stepping not to crush them! This is decidedly not so, and, as I succeeded in finding only fifteen eggs, I should prefer to say that they are scarce. But 'Honesty is the best policy,' and I must confess that the St. Helena boys, who cater for the officers' mess and for the few private families in Garrison, sometimes carry off as many as two hundred dozen in a morning."

"While poking at a lovely shelf of pink coralline in one of these grottoes, trying to dislodge it, I felt my stick suddenly pulled from my grasp. Thinking it must have got fixed among the stones in some way, I was about to put down my hand to disengage it, when to my horror I saw ugly slimy tentacles wind themselves round my trusty staff, which was now the prey of a cuttle-fish. There was not the slightest occasion for it of course; nevertheless, I screamed. This was no devil-fish of Victor Hugo's dimensions; but so hideous was the creature, that disgust, not terror, possessed me. David, who was at a little distance exploring on his own account, concluded that I had at last sprained my ankle—an accident he had been threatening me with for some time—and ran quickly to my assistance."

"Only an octopus! We have seen many of these before."

"Yes, but only baby ones, who looked innocent enough to be gorged with crabs: this is a monster—a fiend!"

"We stood watching him. Clearly my stick was not to his liking, for by-and-by he gradually unwound himself from it and sank sullenly down among the coral, looking, as before, like a tuft of harmless sea-weed. How I congratulated myself on not having trusted my hand under water! Had I done so, and had I been alone, I doubt not that this monster of ugliness would have cost me at least a limb, for I fear I should have lacked the strength and presence of mind to fling him off at once, before the 'suckers' had seized firm hold—the only chance, I believe, of freeing one's self without hurt. David wished to secure our big octopus for future contemplation, and aimed at him a strong blow, hoping by chance to touch his vital part, but he only touched his spleen. Immediately on finding himself attacked, the creature emitted an inky fluid, which turned the clear pool dark as Styx, and under cover of this he made his escape, much to David's disappointment, and to my relief."

The work of observation was completed a few days before the close of the year—and the astronomers and their instruments safely conveyed to their native land.

Modes of Beckoning.—The Africans all beckon with the hand, to call a person, in a different way from what Europeans do. The hand is held, as surgeons say, prone, or palm down, while we beckon with the hand held supine, or palm up; it is quite natural in them, for the idea in their mind is to lay the hand on the person and draw him towards them. If the person wished for is near, say forty yards off, the beckoner puts out his right hand on a level with his breast, and makes the motion of catching the other by shutting the fingers and drawing him to himself; if the person is further off, this motion is exaggerated by lifting up the right hand as high as he can; or he brings it down with a sweep towards the ground, the hand being still held prone as before. In nodding assent they differ from us by lifting up the chin instead of bringing it down as we do.—Dr. Livingstone.

Blessed are those who have their minds and hearts always exercised by that which leads into the fellowship of just men's spirits made perfect; such have also unity with their words and testimonies, left upon record in the Scriptures of Truth, as it is written by one in the Psalms, "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners; nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful; but his delight is in the law of the Lord, and therein doth he meditate day and night."

The same blessed state is to be witnessed now, which is more than to read and sing all the Psalms; and he is the only blessed man that doth these things.

If Christendom had learned this lesson, which they have read and sung, they would not have become as a waste heaving wilderness, and as a desert which brings forth no fruit to God, having lent their ears to the wicked one, and walked in the way of sinners so long, till they are brought to believe, that it is impossible to walk in any other way, while on this side the grave.

Those that obey this wicked one, lend their ear to him; and those that commit sin, walk in the way of sinners.—William Shewen.

"EXAMINE THYSELF?"

Selected.

Again a day has come and gone,
Again have night's dark shades crept on;
What battles hast thou lost, or won?
My soul, look back and see!

How hast thou done each duty small?
How hast thou fought against sin's thrall?
Hast thou this day given Christ the all
'Twas in thy power to give?

For what lost sinner didst thou pray?
What wand'ring sheep of Christ's astray
Hast thou led back unto the way
Of peace and liberty?

My soul, do thou, with thought sincere,
Work out with trembling and with fear,
Thine own salvation, till 'tis clear
That thou art Christ's alone.

AUTUMN.

Selected.

O breezy, bright September days
With sunshine overflowing,
I would that I could sing your praise
In truly sympathetic lays,
As tender and as glowing!

Your asters by the wayside nod
In many a purple cluster;
Your gentians star the grassy sod,
And far and near your golden-rod
Displays its lavish lustre.

With keen delight the eye perceives
Your orchards ripe and mellow—
The corn-fields bristling with your sheaves—
Your charms upon the fore-headers
To crimson and in yellow!

What matter if it means decay,
And consolation few—
The golden glory of the day
For me will never fade away
From these green hills and hollows.

I did not see them when the spring
With fairy-feet tripped over;
Or when the rose was blossoming,
And honey-bees began to sing
Above the summer's clover.

Nor shall I feel the blank despair
Of winter creeping nigh them;
Before the crimson boughs are bare,
Before the asters purpling die,
Grow scarce, my feet will fly them.

Far off where city walls are set
In crowded ranks together,
I shall behold his form and met,
And—heedless of them all—forget
The wild and wintry weather.

For your delight will linger still,
O fair, O sweet September!
In fire-lit dusk mine eyes at will Shall see your bloom upon the hill,
Your lights and darks remember.

And could the joy you bring to me
But find its fit expression,
Whoso my little verse might see,
His heart would thrill in sympathy,
And own a like possession.

THE LOVED AND LOST.

Selected.

Time hath no power to bear away
Thine image from my heart,
No sorrow that such life's onward way
Can bid it hence depart.
Yet while our souls with sorrow rivin
Mourn, loved and lost, for thee,
We raise our tearful eyes to Heaven
And joy that thou art free!

We miss thee from the hand so dear,
That gathers round the hearth;
We listen still thy voice to hear,
Amid our household mirth,
We gaze upon thy vacant chair,
Thy form we cannot see;
We start to find thou art not there
And joy that thou art free.

A thousand old familiar things
Within our childhood's home,
Speak of the cherished absent one
Who never more can come.
They wake with mingled joy and pain
Fond memories of thee;
We would not call thee back again,
We joy that thou art free!

Amid earth's conflict, woe and care—
When dark our path appears,
'Tis sweet to know thou canst not share
Our anguish or our tears;
That on thy head no more shall fall
The storms we may not flee;
Oh safely sheltered from them all
We joy that thou art free.

For thou hast gained a brighter land,
And death's dark stream is past,
Thine are the joys of God's right hand
That shall forever last.
A crown is on thine angel brow,
Thine eyes thy king shall see,
Thy home is with the blessed now,
We joy that thou art free!

The following letter was written by George 3rd to Dr. Cornwallis, the Archbishop of Canterbury, upon the occasion of his hearing of unbecomingly dissipation in the palace of the archbishop:—

"My good Lord Prelate,—I could not delay giving you the notification of the grief and concern with which I was affected at receiving authentic information that routs have made their way into your palace; at the same time I must signify to you my sentiments on the subject, which hold these levities and vain dissipations as utterly inexpedient, if not unlawful, to pass in a residence for many centuries devoted to divine studies, religious retirement, and the extensive exercise of charity and benevolence. I add, in a place where so many of your predecessors have led their lives in such sanctity as has thrown lustre on the pure religion they professed and adorned. From the dissatisfaction with which you must perceive I behold these improprieties, not to speak in harsher terms, and on still more pious principles, I trust you will suppress them immediately, so that I may not have occasion to show any further mark of my displeasure, or to interpose in a different manner. May God take your Grace under his Almighty protection. I remain, my lord primate, Your gracious friend, G. R."

Not Filled.—That was a capital lesson which Prof. Faraday taught one of his students in the lecture-room after some chemical experiments. The lights had been put out in the hall, and by accident some article dropped on the floor from the professor's hand. "The professor lingered behind, endeavoring to pick it up. "Never mind," said the student, "it is of no consequence to night, sir, whether we find it or no." "That is true," replied the professor, "but it is of grave consequence to me, as a principle, that I am not foiled in my determination to find it." "Perseverance can sometimes equal genius in its results." "There are only two creatures in the world," says the Eastern proverb, "that can surmount the pyramids—the eagle and the snail."—Exchange.

Conversion of Brownlow North.

The "Records and Recollections of Brownlow North," by K. Moody Stewart, states that till he was nearly forty-five years old, he lived according to the course of this world," and then it pleased God to call him by his grace. One night in the year 1854, he was playing at cards, and had a sensation of sudden illness, which made him think he was going to die. He said to his son, "I am a dead man; take me up-stairs." He threw himself on his bed. He says, "My first thought then was: Now, what will my forty-four years of following the devices of my own heart profit me? In a few minutes, I shall be in hell, and what good will all these things do me, for which I have sold my soul? At that moment I felt constrained to pray, but it was merely the prayer of the coward, a cry for mercy. I was not sorry for what I had done, but I was afraid of the punishment of my sin. And yet still there was something trying to prevent me putting myself on my knees to call for mercy, and that was the presence of the maid-servant in the room, fighting my fire. Though I did not believe in five that time I had ten minutes to live, and knew there was no possible hope for me but in the mercy of God, and that if I did not seek that mercy I could not expect to have it, yet such was the nature of my heart and my spirit within me, that it was a balance with me, a thing to turn this way or that, I could not tell how, whether I should wait till that woman left the room, or whether I should call on my knees and cry for mercy in her presence. By the grace of God I did put myself on my knees before that girl, and I believe it was the turning point with me."

* * * On the following day he publicly announced to his friends that he had become changed man. His biography says: "The announcement made by Brownlow North to his old friends of his sudden change, whether orally or in writing, created no small sensation among them. Some thought he had gone out of his mind, others thought it was a temporary impression or excitement, and that it would soon pass off, and this was especially the case with those of them who were acquainted with his previous convictions and temporary reformatations, while in some of the newspapers it was even said, after he began his public work, that the whole thing was done for a wager, and that he had taken a bet to gather a certain number of thousands or ten thousands of hearers in a given time. So little do carnal men understand the workings of the Spirit of God, even when they see the most striking and manifest proofs of it. Not only did worldly people stand in doubt of him, but Christian people stood aloof from him for a time, and he underwent the trying ordeal of St. Paul, when he essayed to join himself to the disciples, recorded in Acts ix. 6, to whose case his own experience of God's sovereign awakening power had borne a very marked resemblance. B. North recorded this similarity of his case to that of Saul of Tarsus, in a marginal note on John iv. 27. "Upon his case Jesus' disciples, and marvelled that He talked with the woman." It is often a marvel to disciples in every age, the people Christ speaks to. When Paul was converted, they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple. So it was with Brownlow North, and no wonder; yet for all that he does believe that the Lord had spoken to him. To Him be the gratitude and the glory! So on the remark of Festus to Paul at his trial (Acts xxvi. 24), that the apostle was 'beside himself' 'and mad,' he notes from his own experience, 'Christians in all ages have been called mad; but who was the most mad, Paul or Festus?' and at verse 22, when Paul said that it was by the help of God that he had continued from the day of his conversion until that day, he doubly underlines Paul's words, and adds, 'It was God who enabled him to continue. Give Him the glory, and trust in Him, and he will enable me.' But some at least of his old Christian friends, who had known the history of his careless, godless days, and the history of his religious impressions, stood by him, and encouraged him at this crisis of his life. One of these, after describing her arrival at Dallas, writes: 'He was soon obliged to go on a mission of kindness promised to godless friends (for he was by nature kind and generous). His family were fearful of his health, and he did not seem fit to go, for such a mental revolution had acted on his frame, but no one else I found could do it. I asked him to let me hear soon from him. He wrote from Liverpool, and his note contained a few words: 'I am kept. Yours, &c.' And 'I am kept' were long the last words in his notes.'

"Thus suddenly arrested, awakened, and reformed, it must not be supposed that Brownlow North as rapidly found peace in believing in the Saviour. As we have already indicated, he underwent a very severe and prolonged period of deep-spiritual conflict, which made the strong man become feeble through the intensity of his emotion, and the protractedness of his distress. With him it was of a truth the strong man striving, and striving with all the powers of his being, and the faculties of his mind and spirit, to enter in at the straight gate; while he wrestled not only against the flesh and blood of his whole nature, but, as he himself felt, against principalities, against powers, and against the rulers of the darkness of this world. (Eph. vi. 12.) * * *

"During this long period he read nothing but the Bible, not even looking at a newspaper. Charles G. Scott mentions that B. North told him that at that time he was so engrossed with the concerns of his soul, that although the Crimean war was raging, its thrilling events were all unknown to him, and that one day when the country was ringing with the battle of Inkermann, happening to be travelling on the outside of a stage-coach, he overheard a conversation about the great battle which had been fought, and of which he knew nothing, so entirely absorbed was he in the greater and more terrible conflict that was raging within his own breast. * * *

"Still fierce temptations beset him, and much darkness beclouded his soul for many months after this. He tells us that on the day already referred to, the 21st verse of John v. struck him very powerfully as he read, 'The Son quickeneth whom He will.' He saw it was a certainty that if he received the kingdom of God as a little child, since Christ could quicken whom He would, He could quicken him. At least he felt that he might be saved, for he had found one who was able to save anybody, and therefore could save him. * * *

"During these long, dark months he was often sorely tempted to deny the very being of God, and to find relief in Atheism from the accusations of conscience, and the weary struggles of his soul toward the light for which he was vainly, as it seemed to him, groping. We have heard him tell how at this momentous period of his history, the suggestion that there was no God, and that his existence, was a mere fable, often so persistently pressed itself upon him, even when on his knees in prayer, that he felt as if Satan were at his elbow, constantly whispering, 'There is no God, there is no God!' that he would then have to rise from his knees and walk up and down the little gravel path in his back garden at Elgin for hours, almost like one demented, iterating and reiterating the words, 'God is, there is a God,' in reply to these temptations of the devil or of his own heart; until enabled once more to realize his existence, he returned to his devotion. It might be when he went out into the street upon some business, perhaps before he was aware, his faith in the existence of God again would fail, and plunged into a sea of doubt and distress, he would return to repeat his whole wrestling and struggling until God satisfied him once more of the truth of his existence. It was a trying ordeal to go through; but when once the way of escape from this temptation was opened to him in God's good time, it left his feet planted upon a rock which never trembled beneath him, and gave him a manly, almost a Titanic grasp of the truth of the being of God, which added vivid color and character to his preaching.

"At one critical time during this period of soul conflict he stated in one of his addresses, that the question, 'Believest thou that I am able to do this?' was made a word of life to him. He writes: 'I was almost despairing. The only thing that kept my head above water was the promise, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out." I repeated it again and again, and prayed very earnestly, when the word came to me with such power, and with such a rebuke, 'Believest thou that I am able to do this?' He was able, and I believed Him, and He did it.'

"The above text (John vi. 37) was one which he never wearied of quoting, to which he never failed in public and in private to direct the anxious and returning sinner, and no words are oftener written on the pages of his private Bible than those which, like the old woman, he could mark as both 'tried and proved,' 'Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out.'

"At length he was delivered out of all his distresses and perplexities. He says: 'I was many months in trouble about my soul, though I need not have been as many hours, if I had only had faith to believe in Jesus Christ, and to make my own heart a liar; but my own heart told me that I was the chief of sinners, that Paul, who called himself the chief, was not to be compared—no neither was he—to me, and that there could be no hope for me; and for months I believed my own heart.'"

"The experience of Brownlow North strikingly corroborates the Scripture declaration, that faith is the gift of God. His long continued wrestling for the Divine blessing was itself an evidence of the possession of a degree of faith, for nothing else could have enabled him to persevere in his hunger and thirst after righteousness. His remark, "I was many months in trouble about my soul, though I need not have been as many hours, if I only had faith to believe in Jesus Christ," indicates that he did not, when he wrote it, fully realize how entirely dependant we are on the Lord for all spiritual power; that without his help we cannot exercise true faith or any other spiritual quality. Doubtless the Lord saw it meet for his refinement to subject him for a long time to the "ministration of condemnation," which humbles the soul and prepares it for the reception of other gifts; and until this had been accomplished, and he in measure prepared to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world, a sense of acceptance and the Divine favor was withheld. There was no way in which this could have been obtained but by patient endurance of the Lord's judgements, and looking unto Him for help and deliverance.

"It was with deep sorrow and humiliation, that on one occasion he alluded to himself as being like the man who was above forty years of age, on whom the miracle of healing was showed (Acts iv. 22). On the first page of the New Testament which he began to use on the New Year's day, 1855, is the affecting inscription, written apparently at first in pencil, and afterwards traced in ink; 'B. North, a man whose sins crucified the Son of God.' And his words and manner alike, in alluding to his having been as one born out of due time, proved that the deepest feeling was—

"Alas, that I so lately knew Thee,
That I wrothly of thee best;
Nor had sooner turned to view Thee,
Thou art good, and only rest!
The more I love, I mourn the more
That I did not love before."

Religious Items, &c.

DECREASE IN Church Membership.—The Christian, of London, has the following: "The Wesleyan Church has this year to report a considerable decrease in the number of its members. It will not be possible to state the figures with exactness until the official return has been prepared, but enough is known to awaken earnest reflection. Manufacturing districts and agricultural districts present the same appearance. Districts as diverse as Birmingham and Cornwall, as Bedford and Leeds, have similarly suffered. Wounds and bruises and purifying sorrows are not readily discernable, but the whole head seems sick and the whole heart faint. We suspect that when the circuit returns are published it will be found that in some circuits where there are stationed ministers who have long been remarkable for success, decreases have occurred."

Immorality.—The N. Y. Tribune, in speaking of the immorality so lamentably prevalent, asserts, that "the mass of the people are decent and God-fearing; the instinct of the American woman is to be modest and pure. Human nature is no coarser or less reverent than in the days of our grandfathers. Our literature is purer than it was then." It gives as one cause of the evils of which it complains, the increased familiarity with vice and its effects which is tolerated in the newspapers of the day, and even in the conversation of the family circle; and adds, "The very air is poisoned in which our children live. No legislation, no single reform can touch this disease any more than it could cure the malaria which slays its victims by the thousand. It is for each family to clean and sweeten their own household."

Jewish Population.—According to official data, the total number of the Hebrew race to-day is about what it was in the days of King David—between six and seven millions. There are in Europe about 5,000,000, in Asia 200,000, in Africa over 80,000, and in America from a million to a million and a half. The present population of Jerusalem is given as 13,500 Jews, 7,000 Mahomedans and 5,000 Christians.

Spread of Protestantism in France.—The Secretary of the Central Evangelical Society of Paris states that, if they had means, they could found a new Protestant place of worship every week, so eager are the people all through Southern France to accept the gospel.

The Episcopal Register says:—"Theatres are maintained for the amusement of the people, and in many cases churches are managed so as to present somewhat similar attractions. The music is controlled and intended to satisfy those whose tastes have been cultivated by the opera, and in large measure in the same style of music. The decorations are such as are adapted to satisfy the same or similar tastes. In the pulpit there is much that is dramatic and entertaining. When will we learn that the church is not intended merely to keep the minds of men occupied with serious subjects, but by the assistance of the Holy Spirit to produce devout affections, to enkindle longings after holiness, and to be the means of conveying that grace without which men cannot lead godly, righteous or sober lives."

The Quipu.—A short time since we saw in the possession of a friend some valuable relics which had been forwarded to him from Peru. These antiquities were a portion of a costume, some silver and bone beads, a wooden needle, a piece of bread, and what is believed to be a part of a Quipu, which were all obtained from the grave of one of the Incas, and must have been placed with him in the cradle centuries ago. They were in wonderful preservation, owing no doubt to their being buried together in the sand.

The scrap of garment which had enveloped the mummy was like coarse canvas, and interwoven with it were small but beautiful yellow feathers, resembling those of the canary. The remaining antiquities were easily named, except what appeared to be a bunch of different colored threads. We at first thought they appertained to the shuttle, but could not understand why the various colors should be in the same skein; and then we remembered that in lieu of an alphabet, the Peruvians used the Quipu.

The absence of an alphabet amongst the Peruvians at the time of the Spanish conquest must have forcibly struck the scholars of that time, especially as the invaders found a powerful nation, far advanced in civilization under the despotic though paternal rule of the Incas. The laws of the country were suitable to the condition of the people, the science of agriculture was well advanced, mines were opened and worked, the palaces of the Incas are described as magnificent, bridges were constructed, woolen and cotton goods were fabricated, yet, the nation possessed no characters for a written language.

Among the Peruvians men were specially appointed to learn and recount the history and personal adventures of the Inca, and of his forefathers; and these men, called Amanutes, had the duty of giving instruction to the sons of the nobility. That these men should remember every statistic necessary for their discourse would be almost impossible without some arbitrary aid, and the necessity for this led to the adoption of the Quipu; which was a cord about two feet long, composed of different colored threads slightly twisted together, from which smaller threads were suspended in the manner of a fringe. These threads were of different colors and were tied into knots. The colors denoted sensible objects; for instance white represented silver, yellow, gold. The knots served instead of ciphers, and could be combined in such a manner as to represent numbers to any amount they required.

When our readers are reminded that the Peruvians were very exact statisticians—inasmuch as they registered every birth and death, and kept account of all agricultural produce—the important use of the Quipu among them is apparent.—Leisure Hour.

An Elephant's Revenge.—The next time I met the elephant in camp was when the Maharajah Dhulee Sing was coming down from Lahore to Futtelghur, attended by his tutor, Sir John Login, some of the sirdars, and a large escort. He had handsome lancers for himself and his suite, and elephants were required for carrying them. After depositing the tents in Futtelghur the escort was returning to Meerut accompanied by the elephants that were no longer required. With these was a motley group of servants, &c. also not wanted. Along with them was a fine middle-aged Sikh Fakoor who had far exceeded while in the retinue of the Maharajah, but on the return he was not in such good company, and found himself rather hard up. He therefore thought he could not do better than help himself one of the cakes, a quartish thick and one foot in diameter, a pile which was supplied every evening to each of the elephants. He was too sacred a character for the mahout or any other native to interfere with, and as long as no European eye was upon him he found it quite easy to supply all his wants from this source. One evening, however, he tried the experiment once to often. As was his wont, he went carelessly to the pile that had been set before a small female elephant and took up one of her favorite cakes. Whether remembering his former offences or not it is hard to say, but she caught him in the act, pulled him down with her trunk, and put her foot upon him. A number of men saw what had happened, but it was all too suddenly and unexpectedly done to be avoided or prevented. On running up he found the man grievously hurt and unable to move. He was put into a dhoolie at once and carried to the hospital, where he presented a very remarkable appearance. He was blown out to an enormous size with air under his skin. His arms were almost as large as thighs, and his lower limbs and body were proportionately distended. His lips and cheeks were so distended and tight that he could not speak; and his eyelids firmly closed through both upper and lower lid being swollen and tense. He could bend no joint in his body, but lay stiff and straight on his back. The elephant was said to have put her foot on his chest, but there was no external mark of injury. It was clear however that she must have broken some of his ribs and driven the ends of one or more of them into his lungs. Acting on this belief the man's chest was banded up. The swelling subsided it was found eight ribs were broken. He continued to mend, and thanks to a grand institution was able to start for home in six weeks. It is hardly likely that he or his looks sought to interfere again with the elephant's evening meal.—Leisure Hour.

Antiquity of Glass.—A small specimen of pure glass in the British Museum is a moulded lion's head, the manufacture of which is dated previous to 2000 B. C. The invention of glazing pottery is assigned to the Phenicians byliny; fragments have been found bearing the inscription of early Egyptian monarchs, possibly of the 1st dynasty. The modern art of glass-blowing appears to have been known at a very early date, as half obliterated monuments of the 5th dynasty were found in a tomb at Sakkarah.—Scientific American.

An Archaeological Expedition.—The editor of Les Monies Paris, proposes the fitting out of an expedition to go in search of the "eloquent remains of the Egyptian cavalry buried in the Red Sea, with their chariots, horses, harness, treasures, &c." He believes the remains may be found by digging, and will be in an excellent state of preservation owing to the action of the salt in which they are buried. It is proposed to form a sort of joint stock company, the bonds to bear no interest, but the stockholders to be reimbursed by a division of the money procured from the sale of the discovered treasures.—Scientific American.

[The scheme is a wild one.—Eus.]

The Memory.—It has been observed that inferior races of mankind, as the negroes, Chinese, &c., have more memory than those of a higher type of civilization; women more than men; youths than adults, (the faculty being well developed in childhood and attains its maximum about the 14th or 15th year,) feeble invalids of a lymphatic temperament more than strong; peasants more than citizens, and the clergy more than the laity. Also, the memory remains intact in diseases of the left side of the brain and is much affected in those of the right.

We remember better in the morning than in the evening, in summer than in winter, in warm than in cold climates. From a physiological point of view memory is diminished by over-feeding, physical exercise, and education,—in this sense, that the illiterate have proverbially more memory than those who know how to read and write.—Scientific American.

A writer in the New York Times gives the following as the proper means to be employed to recover a person in a fainting: "When a person faints, or feels like fainting, he should be placed at once in a horizontal position—laid out on the floor—and have a little cold water washed in his face. This is the easiest, quickest, and surest way to recover from fainting. In this position the heart has less labor to perform in pumping the blood to the brain than in the upright position. A few years since a lady died in a dentist's chair, after having some teeth extracted, she having fainted. It was proved at the coroner's inquest that after the lady had fainted she was kept seated in the dentist's chair for ten minutes—probably the blood running down her throat. If the dentist had had the presence of mind to lift her out of the chair, allow the blood to run from her mouth, laid her flat on the floor, and washed a little water in her face, she would in all probability have recovered. It is a difficult thing to recover from a dead faint while the body is in an upright position. The London Lancet mentions the case of a woman who fainted on a race-course, when the bystanders placed her in an upright position against the fence. A physician happening along stretched her flat on the ground, and she recovered. Let every person who reads this remember that a fainting person should be instantly placed in a horizontal position."

Soule, of Elgin, Ill., is in his third year of frog farming, and his first crop is now being marketed. He has an acre and a quarter devoted to frog industry. The kind grown is the "Goslin frog," much larger than the common sort. He will next season furnish St. Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati with frogs, and is confident of success in the business.

What Became of Them.—An Ohio correspondent of the Tennessee Good Templar gives the following sad illustration of the wages of sin.

Forty years ago I noted down ten drinkers, six young men and four boys. I saw the boys drink beer and buy cigars in what was then called a "grocery" or "doggery." I expressed my disapprobation, but the seller gave a coarse reply. He continued the business, and in fifteen years he died of delirium tremens, leaving not five dollars.

I never lost sight of those ten, only as the clouds of the valley hid their bodies from human vision. Of the six young men, one died of delirium tremens and one in a drunken fit; two died of disease produced by their excesses before they reached the meridian of life; two of them left families not provided for, and two sons are drunkards. Of the two remaining, one is a miserable wreck, and the other a drinker in one way better condition.

Of the four boys, one who had a good mother grew up a sober man; one was killed by a club in a drunken broil; one has served two terms in the penitentiary; and one has drank himself into an inoffensive dolt, whose family has to provide for him.

Keep your conscience tender—tender as the eye that closes its lid against an atom of dust, or as the sensitive plant which shrinks and shuts its leaves not merely at the rude touch of a finger, but at the breath of a moth.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 1, 1879.

In a late number of The Christian Advocate, we find an editorial headed, "Only believe," which attributes salvation exclusively to the exercise of faith, by which a new life is received; and asserts that the power of the Spirit "remakes us on the sole condition of believing." It says, "The battle-cry of the New Testament is—'Only believe.'" Good works are not ignored, but are spoken of as the fruits of the regenerate life.

We refer to this subject because we believe similar views are at times advanced by some of our own members. We believe they do not clearly or fully describe the actual work of Grace in the transformation of man from a fallen to a regenerated state; and are liable to be so understood as to lead an inquirer into error and spiritual danger.

That faith is essential, is so clearly stated in the Bible, and so fully in accord with the experience of all true Christians, that we do not suppose any one who is practically acquainted with real religion can hold any other doctrine. But that "believing" is "the sole condition" necessary for regeneration and salvation, is neither consistent with Scripture nor experience.

The apostle James distinctly asserts—"By works a man is justified and not by faith only." "Faith without works is dead," and therefore can have no saving power when alone. Indeed saving faith is no mere intellectual operation that can be performed at our own will, but is expressly declared to be the gift of God.

Our holy Lord Jesus Christ, by his Spirit, shines into the hearts of mankind, even in very early years, showing people what is right and what is wrong, reproving for sin, and seeking to draw them into communion with God. The earliest exercise of faith is in the reception of these teachings and leadings; in turning to, believing in, and obeying them. The same mental process may be regarded as one of those "good works" wrought by the power of the Spirit through our yielding ourselves to its operation. Faith and works are thus inseparably connected together in the work of righteousness in its very beginning within us—and they are never separated in the whole course of all sound spiritual progress.

The apostle Paul declares, "By Grace are we saved, through faith, and that not of ourselves; it is the gift of God;" and again, "God so loved the world, that He sent his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him might not perish but have everlasting life." No one who gives due weight to these precious texts can hope to merit salvation by any thing that he can do of himself. The real Christian must ever cast all his crowns at the foot of the Divine throne, and join the angelic throng in ascribing all honor and glory and power unto Him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb. Yet it is very possible for one who has not yet turned with full purpose of heart to the Lord, and who is unwilling to give up his own will in some particulars, so to misapprehend these texts as to think himself in a saved state, while in a state of disobedience to the Lord's requirements. The faith on which such lean is not of a Divine and saving nature, and will fail them in the time of need.

The coming and sufferings of Christ are declared to have taken place in order "that He might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." He is not only suffered for our sins in that prepared body, but He now operates in our hearts to purify us from our sins; giving power unto us as many as will receive Him in his spiritual appearance within them, to repent of and forsake all unrighteousness, and thus to come into the number of the redeemed of the Lord. This power comes from Him alone—so that it is very true that we are saved "by Grace," and not of ourselves.

The apostle Paul declares in his second epistle to the Corinthians, "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world."

There can be no more precious experience than that here referred to—even an habitual walking in and under the power and government of the Spirit of the Redeemer, and knowing "the law of the Spirit of the Law in Christ Jesus to set us free from the law of sin and death."

Those who have been brought into this condition are not freed from their share of the trials and sufferings incident to this state of existence. The same apostle, in the same epistle speaks of himself as being "troubled on every side," "perplexed," "persecuted" and "cast down;" yet, he says, "we faint not," being sustained by the heart-cheering confidence that "our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us as a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Among the memoranda of Job Scott, is this entry: "Thankful for preservation, and begging to be preserved; much broken off from all creaturely dependence, and all human, all earthly consolation; caring very little where I am or may be; what I am or may be about, or what does or may happen to me; so that in and through all I may be preserved from all sin. I scarce have any wish about my life, whether I may live long or be soon released; whether I may have little or much of this world; little or much toil of body or mind; little or much of the favors and friendship, or the frowns and reproaches of man; so that through all I may dwell steadfastly given up to the will of my God."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is estimated that 50,000 men and women are employed in Philadelphia in the manufacture of clothing, and 20,000,000 suits are made there every year. Cutting machines are being introduced into nearly all the manufactories; these have a capacity for cutting and button-hole making in one or twelve hours. Buttonholes can be worked by machinery at the rate of about one hundred and eighty per hour. An instance of the value of machinery in expediting manufacture, is afforded in the fact that an establishment where cutting and button-hole machines are used turns out one hundred suits, ready for wear, within twelve hours.

A press dispatch from Bradford, Pa., states that as much as 150,000 gallons of petroleum are wasted every day in the Allegheny oil regions. The tanks with capacity for several million barrels were filled to overflowing. The United Tidewater Pipe Line, is iron tankage in the Bradford district, for 3,000,000 barrels of oil, and are able to take care of all the oil of individuals and companies owning tankage in connection with them. The heavy loss falls on small producers who cannot afford to build tanks. In some parts of the region, streams were dammed and the oil thus collected set on fire. Heavy losses to derricks and other property have resulted from fires occasioned by sparks from locomotives, and from firing by tramps and malicious persons.

The B-Ireland made her last trip, from Antwerp to the dock at Jersey City, in 10 days, 21 hours and 20 minutes.

According to the estimates of the President of the State Vineyard Society, there are now 60,000 acres in California covered with vineyards. It is said $30,000,000 are invested in these interests, including the land.

Official returns of the vote for members of the Ohio Legislature, give the Republicans 7 majority in the Senate and 21 in the House, or 31 majority on joint ballot.

The body of a man found on the shore of Lake Michigan, has been recognized to be the person who accidentally died in his last battle, according to the following: The foreign immigration continues to show a large increase, the arrivals at C. the Garden on the 25th ult., numbering 1025; total for the week 1901.

The amount of grain about on the canal between Erie and Orono, on the 25th ult., coming towards the tidewater, was as follows: 2,225,000 bushels of wheat; 1,000,000 bushels of oats; 1,020,000 bushels of barley; 23,000 bushels of rye; 45,000 bushels. The receipts of all grains at the four principal Atlantic ports during the week ending on the 25th, were 7,111,159 bushels.

Eighteen million bushels of bituminous coal are detained in the river at Pittsburgh on account of the shortage of water. There is great scarcity of coal at all the cities on the Ohio and Mississippi.

The number of deaths in this city for the week ending at noon on the 25th ult., was 248; 155 being adults and 93 children. In New York, for the same period, the mortality was 509, an increase of 94 over the week ending on the 18th. This increase is said to be due to an unusual mortality from diseases of a pulmonary character.

Markets, &c.—The following were quotations on the 25th ult. U. S. sixes, 1881, 105½; do. 5s, registered, 102½; coupon, 103½; 4s, 130, 104½; 4s, 100, 102½. The market continued in fair demand and prices were rather firm. Sales of middlings at 11¼ a 11½ cts. per pound.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 cts. in barrels, and refined 7½ cts. for export, and 6 cts. per gallon for home use. Limited oil, 30 cts.

Flour.—Sales of 1800 barrels, including Penna. and Minnesota extra, at $6.75 a $7.25; western do., at $7 a $7.50; patent, $7.75 a $9. Rye flour, $6. Corn meal, $3.25. Wheat, red, $1.45; amber, $1.47, 93 cts.; Corn, 62 a 63 cts. Oats, mixed, 43 a 44 cts.; white, 45 a 46 cts.

Hay and Straw.—Prime timothy, 75 a 85 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 65 a 75 cts. per 100 pounds. Straw, 65 a 75 cts. per 100 pounds. The market active and prices well maintained. Sales at 3 a 5 cts., as to quality. Hogs, 5½ a 6½ cts. per pound. Sheep, 4½ a 5 cts. per pound as to condition.

Foreign.—The Paris-Gazette publishes an interview with Gladstone, in which he stated the extent of a Liberal victory at the next election in England, he himself would only resume office if forced to do so by his fellow countrymen. He deprecated contentions with Russia about Afghanistan, and said he believed there would not be any, that India had nothing to fear from the general war, and that the contest for the conquests in Turkestan. The Austro-German Alliance was doubtless intended as a check to Russia, but too much would not be made of it, as Prince Bismarck would abandon it as readily as he had abandoned the alliance with France. He said that he had long had England's road to India, he said, must be retained by keeping up her maritime supremacy.

Lord Harrington, in addressing a meeting of Liberals at Manchester on the 24th ult., said, "England's policy should be to stand as far as possible on the side of the Poor." That alliance ought to be used for the purpose of forming and joining in a combination of the States of Europe, framed for the purpose of preserving the peace and independence of Europe, repressing the aggressive ambition of any power, protecting the weak against the strong, the free against the oppressed. It is the policy which has always been in the main adopted by the Liberal party. It has not been the policy of the present Government."

The distress in Hungary is very great. The Government is struggling to collect 10,000,000 czs. upon the next harvest, in 57 towns and villages in Temes county. In Sors county some cases of starvation are reported, and forty parishes are threatened with famine. From three other counties distressing accounts are received.

A serious fire has destroyed one-fifth of the town of Ufa, in the southern part of the Province of Samara, in European Russia. It has a population of 5,900.

It is stated that King Alfonso has declared all sums which individuals or public bodies intend to contribute towards the celebration of his marriage, will be devoted to the relief of the sufferers from the flood.

A bill for the abolition of slavery in Cuba, to be presented to the Cortes, provides that slaves aged 55 years and over shall become free immediately; those aged 50, in 1880; those aged 45, in 1882; those aged 40, in 1884; those aged 35, in 1886; those aged 30, in 1888; and all others in 1890. The sum of 300 piasters will be paid to the owners for each slave.

The United States Consul at China, in a dispatch to the Department of State, reports that two English physicians have had remarkable success in their practice of the foot and family, leading to a large practice and the retention people. The Victoria has established a free dispensary, and placed one of the doctors at its head. The whole expense is borne by the Victoria. He has also indicated favorably a female physician who has had great success in the treatment of the sick. This liberal course will do much to break down the prejudices of the people.

A report from the U. S. Minister of Japan, gives much interesting and valuable information regarding that empire. During the past year the imports from the United States amounted to three and a half million dollars, the exports to the United States $75,000. The tonnage of American shipping is greater than that of all the European countries combined, except Great Britain. Statistics of the cholera are startling. The number of cases reported in 1875; deaths, 77,842; and during a date of report, 9th mo. 20th, 40,448. Foreigners seldom recover. The good effect of quarantine has been demonstrated. The action of the U. S. Government in sustaining the quarantine has been highly appreciated by the emperor and his people.

The report of the General of the Telegraph shows an increase of that enterprise. Total receipts from the earliest date (1878) are nearly 1,000,000. Nearly 2,000 miles of wire were put in that year over 1,400 persons are employed.

Without any demand on the part of the Japanese Government has declared that hereafter the coin known as the "yen" shall be received by the Government of a par with the Mexican dollar. The "yen" is silver of 416 grains and 900 fineness.

BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Annual Meeting will be held in the Committee room of Arch Street Meeting-house, on Fourth-day the 5th inst., at 8 o'clock P. M. E. A. S. Secretary.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Winter Session of the School will commence on Second-day the 3rd of Eleventh month.

Pupils who have been regularly entered and who by the care from Philadelphia, can obtain tickets at the depot of the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad, at the corner of Third-day and Chestnut streets, by giving their names to the Ticket-agent there, who is furnished with a list of the pupils for that purpose. In such cases the passage, including the stage fare from the Railroad Station, will be charged at the School, to be paid for with the usual incidental charges at the day of the term. Tickets can also be obtained of the Treasurer, 304 Arch street. Conveyances will be at the STREET ROAD STATION on Second and Third-days, the 3rd and 4th proximo, to meet the trains that leave Philadelphia at 7.50 and 10 A. M., 12.30 and 2.30 P. M.

Baggage may be taken to the Thirty-first and Chestnut street-car at Eleventh and Thirtieth. If left at the latter place, it must be put under the care of H. Alexander & Son, who will convey it thence to Thirty-first and Chestnut at a charge of 10 cents per trunk, to be paid to the Ticket-agent. Those who have their baggage sent for to any place in the built-up part of the city, by sending word on the day previous (through the post-office or otherwise) to H. Alexander & Son, N. E. corner of 18th and Market Sts. Their charge in such cases for taking baggage to Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, will be 25 cents per trunk. For the same reason they will also collect baggage from the other railroad depots. If the checks are left at their office corner of 18th and Market Sts. Baggage put under their care, if properly marked, will not require any attention from the owner, and will be delivered at the depot, or the Street Road Station, but will be forwarded direct to the School. It may not always go on the same train as the owner, but it will go on the same day, provided the notices to H. Alexander & Son reaches them in time.

DURING THE SESSION, passengers for the depot, or the Street Road Station, for the arrival of the first train from the City, every day except First-days and small packages for the pupils, if left at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch street, will be forwarded every Sixth day at 12 o'clock, except on the last two Sixth-days, at 12 o'clock, and the expense charged on their bills.

Tenth month 22d, 1879.

[The following instructive narrative has been forwarded for insertion in "The Friend," accompanied with a copy of part of a letter referring to it, written by our late valued friend, Hannah Williams.—Eds.]

Extract from a letter from H. W. to E. R., dated 12th mo. 30th, 1838.

I have just copied the account of Isaac Shoemaker, from my printed account, for our old friend Job Haines, at his request, and understanding some time since they were nearly at part, and feeling much interest in the contents, should be glad they could again be printed, either in pamphlet form, or let it enter the columns of "The Friend."

It seemed to me as I traced word by word those lines, that their use was not at an end; ear Elizabeth, thou knowest they are not cunningly devised fables," but realities seen and felt in an awful moment, when they were opened and laid on him to declare, as he says, "at the peril of his soul." "That God had opened his mouth on their account, that they might declare it to others." * * * Most of the subjects are of importance, and general concern to us as a Society, and would be received afresh (I should hope) not only with deep interest, but with gratitude, by some poorer souls; to believe that a kind providence so miraculously favored him; and be strengthened thereby to pursue the path of duty.

HANNAH WILLIAMS.

Some account of Isaac Shoemaker, of the Township of Cheltenham, in the County of Philadelphia, son of John Shoemaker of the same place, who departed this life on the 31st day of the Seventh month, 1779, in the twenty-fifth year of his age.

He was a young man of an active disposition and vigorous constitution, who in the general tenor of his conduct and conversation was preserved from what in the world's estimation is accounted gross or immoral; yet in his company, dress and deportment evidenced a leaning to levity, and fondness for things in their native vain and unsubstantial; of the emptiness and corrupting tendency whereof he was at times made sensible, by the faithful admonitions of the Divine Monitor in his own mind, as appears from some of his expressions near his departure out of time; when through the renewed extendings of heavenly favor, he was mercifully visited and awakened from a state of insensibility; under the quickening influences whereof, he had to warn and admonish his former associates and others, against indulging themselves in the vanities and follies of a perishing world; some of whom having been measurably reached thereby, have signified a desire that the weighty expressions uttered by him in that solemn season, might be communicated and diffused for the benefit of the youth of his acquaintance and others; which if weighed with becoming seriousness and depth of attention, might minister profitable instruction, and tend to lasting edification. This instance of heavenly condescension and divine regard affording renewed cause in humble admiration to say, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty! just and true are thy ways thou King of saints!" Rev. xv. 3.

About ten days before his decease, between the hours of eight and nine in the evening, he fell into a state of silence, and became speechless and incapable of bodily action, his month being open and his jaw set: thus he lay nearly three hours, supposed by the family and divers of the neighbors present, to be in a trance. Upon his recovery, he ground his teeth together, so as greatly to affect the teeth, and twice or thrice sighed deeply. After which, appearing like one raised from the dead, under great concern and exercise of mind, he began to speak with a strong voice, to the astonishment of those in company, saying: "Oh! that I could tell you what I have seen and understood. It would pierce the hardest heart amongst you; perhaps some may think there is no hell, but I have to tell you there is a hell, and a dreadful one too. And there is a heaven, and a sweet one too; and where angels clothed in white robes sit at the right hand of God, singing praises to his great name; I have to declare it unto you at the peril of my soul, but some will not believe though an apostle should rise from the dead. You may think I am not in my senses, but I knew you all as you came into the room, am perfectly in my senses, and God hath opened my mouth on your account, and that you might declare it unto others. Narrow is the way that leads to life, and few there be that find it; but broad is the way that leads to destruction, and many are going in that way." Proceeding in a bemoaning accent: "I have lived to this age without knowing what God really is, until this night. I have been often visited, but did kick and rebel. Three years ago, I had a sight that I should be brought to the brink of the grave, but it was not shown me whether I should recover or not; but if I do, I am desirous that I might be made an instrument to convert thousands into the right way. I wonder," continued he, "that I should undertake to be the head of a family and not capable to teach them their duty towards God; there is a necessity for parents and heads of families to bring up their children and others under their care, in plainness of speech and apparel, keeping humble, endeavoring to impress their tender minds with a sense of their duty towards God. Many let their children run about the streets, hearing (which is often used in this land) the holy name of Jesus taken in vain. My parents, when I was young, were drawn so much into the cumbering things of this world, that they did not teach me as they ought to have done my duty towards God." To his wife he uttered himself thus: "My dear comfort, my bosom friend, mourn not for me, there are many difficulties and trials to be met with in our passing through this world; retire to thy father's house, live a sober, virtuous life. If it should please God to take me out of the world this night, I would have none to take it to heart; no, not to shed a tear." He was divers times drawn forth in fervent supplication, and expressed himself on this wise: "Oh! Lord Jesus, be pleased to look down with an eye of pity upon me; on my father; be with him and comfort him in his old age, under the afflictions and trials that may be suffered to come upon him. On my aged mother, be her strength and support all the days of her life; who has been a kind and tender mother to me, all my days; and had shared my sorrows, in my distress, pointed out the right path for me to turn into, when I was ready to fall into despair, under a sense of my manifold transgressions, directing me to look forward towards my dear Redeemer, whose blood is sufficient to wash away all our sins, which I have experienced the truth of. Be pleased, if it be thy will, look down upon mankind universally; reconcile all men to one another, and to thyself, that there may be no more blood spilt in the land, if it be thy blessed will; not my will, but thine be done." Also singing praises to God for his many great mercies to him.

Being desirous of seeing divers of his acquaintance not present, he said: "They know not what God really is; some of them have in their breasts the spirit of envy and bitterness." Under much concern that they may be redeemed from that wrathful spirit, he earnestly besought the Almighty to turn their hearts to love and good will. "I wonder," said he, "that God hath not sent his just judgments and destroyed this place, for wickedness and hardness of heart." He desired to be made subject to the divine will, and said, "I have no will of my own, not my will but thine be done." To his brothers he said, "Remember your Creator in the days of your youth, dress plain and walk humble before the Lord; never mind what your comrades say, for we must all become fools for Christ's sake, that we may be made wise. Make Him your standard, keep the world under your feet; attend meetings with your father and mother, both on First and other days of the week; when met, turn your minds inward and solidly think what you came about, and endeavor to know

God for yourselves; do not as I have done; I often went to meetings and sometimes did think on those things, but soon let them slip, letting my mind out at fine clothes and gay dress, contriving how to exceed in grandeur." To his apprentice boy he said, "I have heard thee use many idle words and passed it by without proper notice, I beg thee may break thyself of them, or God will pronounce his judgments against thee." Desiring the company to withdraw out of the room and to be left alone in stillness, he said, "I think I have done with flesh, I have said all that I have to say unto you," then lifting up his hands he said, "Oh! holy Jesus, how sweet do I feel thee!" All being gone out of the room, he devoutly and loudly desired (in the hearing of some friends in the adjoining room) that God might be pleased to stop the effusion of blood.*

After which he appeared like one whose mind is redeemed from the earth and much swallowed up in a sense of that sweetness he had been so marvellously favored with; continuing in this frame of spirit to the close of his time; and we doubt not but he now rests in peace and quiet with the Lord.

The Island of Mangaia.

This is one of the small coral islands of the Pacific Ocean, belonging to what is called "Hevey's" group. It is about twenty miles in circumference, and has a population of 3000 people. The following particulars are taken from Gill's "Gems from the Coral Islands."

"During our stay here, we had frequent conversations with the people who visited us, respecting their former heathen state, and the blessings of the gospel which were now so richly enjoyed by them. The old natives gained new vigor of body and mind, while they related to us, in language of deprecation, the facts and details of their idol-worship and their heathenism. The last man who had seen Captain Cook, when he visited the island, had died a month or two before we arrived; but most of the present population remembered the accounts respecting him and his ship, as given to them by their own parents; and they preserved with great sacredness an axe, and two or three old knives, which were left on shore by this early navigator and discoverer of the island.

"It was interesting also to witness their emotions of sorrow, while they told us of their cruelty towards Papahia, the Christian teacher, whom 'William' wished to leave among them, and of their subsequent afflictions, by which God prepared their hearts to receive 'David's' when he came. They also told us, with much shame, of a singular instance of their heathen ignorance and superstition. When David landed on the island, he brought with him a pig. Having never before seen any animal larger than a rat, they looked on this pig with mingled emotions of awe and pleasure. They believed it to be a representative of some superior spirit, 'it is a muriata,' of the other world. The teacher did all he could to convince them that it was only an inferior animal, brought by him on shore with a view to benefit the people; but they were determined to do it temple honor. They clothed it in white bark, sacred cloth, and took it in triumph to the principal 'Marae' on the island, where they fastened it to the pedestal of one of their gods. For some time she resisted such honor, and made attempts to get at large; but all efforts to escape proved futile; for two months her degraded votaries brought her daily offerings of the best fruits of the land, and presented to her the homage of worship. At length, however, she repaid the degraded devotees by a litter; and the young ones also were considered as sacred as the mother. For some time they kept within the precincts of the temple, until, becoming more unmanageable than the dumb gods, they were left to the privilege of a wide range over the land. The teacher, who had not ceased to ridicule their folly, succeeded in having the sow now returned to him, which he killed, and cooked, and ate! Thus was the spell broken; and since then the posterity of this honored ancestor of the pig tribe have been left to their natural state, administering no small gratification to the people at their feasts, and, by barter, are now the principal means by which they obtain foreign property from ships that call at the island.

"We have already had occasion to notice that the people of Mangaia in their heathenism knew no animal larger than a rat. We have also observed their ignorance and superstition on seeing the first pig that was taken on shore. It will be somewhat amusing, and not altogether below the design of these pages, in noticing native habit and character, to give a brief account of the introduction of another animal, which now so largely abounds on the island.

"On our voyage thither in 1813, we were accompanied by many natives, among whom was a young man who was returning from Oyuyi, whither he had gone as a sailor. This young man was taking home a rabbit. It was a fine creature, and much thought of by the owner and by the natives on board. One day, while standing on deck, fondling his rabbit and thinking what notoriety he would gain among his countrymen for taking it on shore, the young man was accosted by an elderly man, a friend of his, who was a deacon in the Mangaia church; a man of known integrity and, moreover, honorably connected with the bench of magistracy on the island. 'Friend,' said this worthy man, 'that is a pretty creature. What is its name?' 'It is a rabbit,' replied the young man; 'and,' he continued, 'they are very numerous in foreign lands.' 'Numerous, are they?' replied the old gentleman. 'Allow me to nurse it a while.' The rabbit was immediately handed over to him, and for some time he continued to stroke its head and back very playfully; and then, in a moment, to the distress of all who stood by, he wrung its neck and cast into the sea? Astonished and irritated at this unprovoked conduct, I united in condemning it, and in demanding an explanation. But, finding myself too much vexed to institute a calm inquiry, I turned aside, leaving the enraged young man to discuss the matter with his friend, who was provokingly easy, and, without, apparently kind in the midst of the storm of angry words which bore down upon him.

"Some time afterwards I seated myself in their midst, and asked an explanation, assuring the good deacon that I thought he had done a very wrong act. 'O no,' he replied. 'It will all be right when we get on shore. I shall report it to the magistrate. The thing will be justified, and the young man will receive native property more than the value of the animal.' 'Indeed!' I inquired, 'How so?' 'Last year,' the old man replied, 'a ship came to our land and put on shore two beasts, much like that rabbit. At first we were pleased with them, but very soon they became the plague of the island. They took up their abode in the hills and bush; and so rapid was the increase, and so ferocious and wild their habits, that they had well-nigh destroyed all our poultry.' 'Tell me what kind of beast it was,' I asked. 'It was much like that rabbit you have seen,' he replied. 'These animals became so destructive that the chiefs and landlords held a council and resolved to hunt them to death, and that no such animal should ever be brought on shore.' 'What do you call it?' I inquired. 'We call it "Keao," answered the old man. 'Keao, keao,' I repeated again and again. 'What can it be?' 'O, it is a real savage beast! You will soon see it,' was the reply.

"About a fortnight after landing, a terrible uproar was heard at midnight in the settlement. On making inquiry as to the cause, I saw a multitude of half-naked natives armed with sticks and stones, and carrying flint beaus, and was told it was a keao hunt, and in a short time afterwards shouts of victory were heard, and the hero of the night was seen returning through the settlement, holding up a large cat by the tail! Yes, it was poor puss! She had been landed among a people who did not know her quiet domestic habits. Circumstances had driven her to the bush, where she had become wild, and had occasioned the grave incidents we have noticed in the island life of the people of Mangaia. The young man to whom the rabbit belonged received property, by order of the chief, from the public store, which more than remunerated his loss, but which did not overcome his regret that his quiet pet animal had been mistakenly supposed to have relationship to the 'keao' tribe."

Animal Sacrifices.—When Sir Joseph Hooker and his companions made their botanical explorations in Morocco, a curious incident occurred at a village where they stopped, which is thus described: "Eight or ten women, dragging with them a sheep, entered the house in a tumultuous way, crowding up the stairs and into the verandah, addressed vehement entreaties to Hooker, and suddenly cut the sheep's throat in his presence. Then followed more passionate entreaties, a document was thrust into his hand, and we were left at a loss to guess the meaning of the strange scene. At length, through Ambak's increasing skill as interpreter, the matter was made sufficiently clear. A number of men of the village the husbands or fathers of our suppliants, had been carried off as prisoners to Morocco, for non-payment of taxes, and were there confined in the horrible subterranean dungeons that serve as prisons. The object of these poor women was to obtain from the [Governor] an order for their release, through the intercession of Hooker. A promise to do what was possible on their behalf was readily given; but although a courteous answer was afterwards sent through the consul at Mogador, it may be feared that little attention was paid by the powerful governor of this region to the representations of Christian strangers."

The Training of Children.

The following remarks, contained in a letter received from an aged Friend in one of our Western States, are commended to the thoughtful notice of the readers of "The Friend."

"It has often appeared strange to me to think that a people making the profession that we do, should have been so careless in instructing our children (they having a birth-right membership) in the principles of Christianity, as held by Friends, and the testimonies which they maintained before a frowning world, as being the natural fruit or outgrowth of living in accordance with the teaching of our holy Redeemer; and yet we see families of children grown up amongst us who have read little or nothing of the history of our Society, and some of these becoming active members and even recorded ministers, running to and fro in the land teaching the people; and they have not learned the alphabet well in the school of Christ, who could not give a serious enquirer after Truth a satisfactory answer in regard to our principles, or why Friends bore the testimonies they did. That such circumstances it is not strange that the Society should be in the condition which we see. It is true that parents or the church cannot give grace to the members, but they may be as an auxiliary by right training to prepare the fallow-ground of the heart to receive the good seed, which may spring up in due season, and bring forth fruit abundantly to his praise, and to the advancement of the Messiah's kingdom in the earth. But alas! the love of the world, its riches, honors and pleasures, with a desire to gratify individual curiosity or interest, has so nearly filled the hearts of the people, that they have nearly lost sight of the necessity of living a humble, self-denying, cross-bearing life, to be a follower of Christ. The apostle emphatically declares, if ye have not the Spirit of Christ ye are none of his.

"May we not fear and tremble when we glance over this country and see the corruption and wickedness of the people, that the vengeance of the Lord will not sleep forever, and that his judgments will overtake us ere long if we repent not of our wickedness."

"Pay John Williams."—At a church prayer-meeting not far from Boston, a man whose credit was not the best, and who was somewhat noted for his failure to meet his obligations, arose to speak. The subject for the evening was, "What shall I do to be saved?" Commencing in measured tones he quoted the passage, "What shall I do to be saved?" He paused, and again more emphatically asked the question, "What shall I do to be saved?" Again, with increased solemnity and impressiveness of manner, he repeated the momentous inquiry, when a voice from the assembly, in clear and distinct tones answered, "Go and pay John Williams for that yoke of oxen you bought of him!" The remainder of the gentleman's address was not reported. All present appreciated the fitness of the unexpected word in season.

The incident has led us to think that there are a good many people who, before they make much progress in walking in the way of salvation themselves, or guiding others therein, will have to "Go and pay John Williams," or John somebody else, the money that they honestly owe them. There is no man shrewd enough to pursue a course of dishonesty and trickery, and still retain the favor of God in this world, or a good hope of glory for the world to come. It is best to settle up, square up, and pay up.—Christian.

For "The Friend"

1859. 2d mo. 8th. Attended the Select Preparative Meeting. It was very comfortable to me. I have been, through unmerited mercy, favored at seasons of late to feel precious love to my Divine Master, and a sense of his goodness. These feelings are far more precious than the riches and honors of this world. Oh! his loving-kindness and long-suffering to me a poor unworthy sinner; may there be an increase of gratitude and obedience to so kind and merciful a Master; He is worthy of all that He is pleased to require of us; and we cannot love Him too much; to love Him and feel a sense of his loving-kindness is leading to the soul; how much we labor and toil after that which is comparatively of but little value, and neglect that which is of infinite value. May I be rightly directed in all my movements, and preserved from all that is offensive in the Divine sight, that the remainder of my days may be more and more given up to serve Him.

2d. mo. 9th. Our Monthly Meeting—a very comfortable and interesting one. All the queries were read and answered. Our esteemed friend, S. C., was, I thought, favored in his communication, and showed much submission to other Friends in speaking to the business of the meeting. Our Select Preparative Meeting, held on the 8th, was also a favored season. A precious feeling of unity was felt in it; what a blessing to be thus preserved; the praise is due to the Great Head of the Church. How comforting to feel gathered as under the wing of his Divine power—a feeling more precious than language can describe.

2d mo. 20th.—First-day. Another evidence of Divine regard. I think the presence of the dear Master was felt to comfort and strengthen his poor dependent ones. I think I have been of late blessed and favored with a sense and feeling on a subject (about) which I felt much anxiety. May I be enabled to make straight steps and walk in the way that would be consistent with the Divine Will in all things.

6th mo. 7th. Through unmerited mercy I am enabled to record some account of the great favors bestowed upon me, a poor unworthy creature. Although I have passed through some trials of late, I think I have been favored to feel a comfortable sense of the loving-kindness and presence of the Great Head of the Church. May these favors not be trifled with, but be received with an ungrudging favor that I am continued here; and that it is for a wise and good purpose in endeavoring to answer it, in serving my Divine Master unreservedly, for He is forever worthy. How I have felt the truth of the language expressed by our blessed Saviour, "Without me ye can do nothing;" his holy help can enable us to do all things that He is pleased to require of us, and we may safely trust ourselves and our all in his holy hands. Our religious meetings of late have been increasingly comfortable. What a blessing when we are assembled for the purpose of performing worship, to be enabled to do it in spirit and in truth; it is certainly our duty to wait for and feel after the qualification thus to worship, and it is due to Him who created us and from whom we receive every blessing. Visited a sick friend yesterday, whose case I understand is considered by the physician a doubtful one; I felt much for the individual. All things are possible with Him who created us, and who has a right to do with us as He sees meet, and who doeth all things right; may his blessed will be done in this case. I felt comforted on my way home and have since in thinking of the friend, with sincere desires that the blessings of the Great Head of the Church may be upon the dear friend. How comforting is his life-giving presence with a sense of his Divine approbation.

12th mo. 16th. Went to the city (Philadelphia) to attend the meeting of the Indian Committee and Meeting for Sufferings. Attended Arch Street Meeting (in the morning), which was a comfortable one to me. In the meeting of the Indian Committee in the afternoon, felt my mind interested for the welfare of the Indians, with a wish to see them; was appointed to go to Tunesassa on account of three of the Friends there being about to leave, and the school to stop. I feel as if I had great reason to be thankful that I am accounted worthy to labor in the good cause, hoping I am serving my Divine Master in laboring there. May I love Him, be humble before Him, and try faithfully to serve Him in the way of his requirements, that his great and holy name may be honored. I have had a lameness in my leg which I have been obliged to be confined to my good. T. V. has expressed a willingness to go to Tunesassa and assist in carrying on the school.

22d of 12th mo. Left home to go to Tunesassa; met T. V. at Downingtown; took the cars about 9.45. We got safely to the ferry, near Tunesassa, on the afternoon of the 23d. Called at Wm. Blacksnake's; saw his father, old Governor Blacksnake; he expressed satisfaction on seeing me. The old man seemed nearly worn out with age. There was a good deal of floating ice in the river, the day being cold. We crossed over in a canoe, and got to Tunesassa before night. It felt comfortable to be at the end of our journey and to enjoy the comforts the place afforded, which, with a peaceful mind, is a great blessing.

Please, Sir, Don't Step There.—A layer of snow was spread over the icy streets, and pedestrians, shod with india rubber, walked carefully. Walking somewhat hastily churchward, for I was late, I noticed a bright looking little lad standing upon the pavement, his eyes fixed upon one spot on the sidewalk. As I approached him he looked up to me, and, pointing to the place, said:

"Please, sir, don't step there. I slipped there and fell down."

I thanked the philanthropic little fellow, and passed round the dangerous spot.

"Don't step there!" was the theme of my meditation during the remainder of the walk. A thousand times since has the clear voice of that kind-hearted child rung in my ear, reminding me of my duty to those around me, and urging me to repeat it whenever it promises to be useful. "Please, sir, don't step there."

The Quaker's House.—A most remarkable case of providential preservation occurred at the siege of Copenhagen, under Lord Nelson. An officer in the fleet says: "I was particularly impressed with an object I saw three or four days after the terrific bombardment of that place. For several nights before the surrender, the darkness was ushered in with a tremendous roar of guns and mortars, accompanied by the whizzing of those destructive and burning engines of warfare, Congreve's rockets.

"The dreadful effects were soon visible in the brilliant lights throughout the city. The blazing houses of the rich and the burning cottages of the poor illuminated the heavens and the wide spreading flames, reflecting on the water, showed a forest of ships assembled round the city for its destruction.

"This work of conflagration went on for several nights, and the Danes at length surrendered. On walking some days after among the ruins of the cottages of the poor, houses of the rich, manufactories, lofty steeples, and humble meeting-houses, I desisted, amid this barren field of desolation, a solitary house unharmed. All around it was a burnt mass, this alone untouched by the fire, a monument of mercy. "Whose house is that?" I asked. "That," said the interpreter, "belongs to a Quaker. He would neither fight nor leave his house, but remained in prayer with his family during the whole bombardment." Surely, thought I, it is well with the righteous. God has been a shield to thee in battle, a wall of fire round about thee, a very potent help in time of need."

A FLOWER NOT FOR THE CHILDREN.

FRISCILLA J. OWENS.

Beware of the opulet flower, beware,
Each creature that swims the sea;
In its beauteous leaves is a cruel snare,
That is hid to wait for thee.

Its fringes soft through the waters glide,
In purple or golden green;
Its lovely petals are spread to hide
Where a grim mouth waits unseen.

See where it floats with the waves at play,
And expands its silk-fringed crown
'Tis waiting the moment to strike its prey,
To the depths it will drag them down.

Beware, beware of the poison flower,
The fatal opulet of sin,
That lies in wait for many an hour,
To draw the unwary in.

Does it seem fair, and bright and gay?
Does it seem to beckon and smile?
O, turn thee then from the lure away,
It will snare thy soul with guile.

Fringed with purple or shining with gold,
'Tis hiding the gulf of death;
It will clasp thee round with its fearful hold,
And wither thy hopes with its breath.

O, sin is worse than the opulet flower,
With its purple and gold-fringed crown;
In its venomous leaves there is deadly power,
To the depths it will drag thee down.

The Opulet appears as a beautiful flower floating on the surface of the sea, but in reality it is a sea animal, and the pretty silk-fringed petals are clasping fingers, seizing every fish which ventures near, to benumb it with swift poison, and draw it down to the voracious mouth beneath.

RESIGNATION.

Selected.

In trouble and in grief, O Lord,
Thy smile hath cheered my way;
And joy hath huddled from each thorn
That round my footsteps lay.

The hours of pain have yielded good,
Which prosperous days refused;
As herbs though scentless when entire,
Spread fragrance when they're bruised.

The oak strikes deeper as its boughs
By furious blasts are driven;
So life's vicissitudes the more
Have fixed my heart in Heaven.

All-gracious Lord! what'er my lot
In other times may be,
I'll welcome still the merciest grief
That brings me near to thee.

THE TWO WEAVERS; or, TURN THE CARPET.

"Lo, these are parts of his ways."—Job xxvi. 14.

As at their work two weavers sat,
Beguiling time with friendly chat,
They touched upon the price of meat,
So high a weaver scarce could eat.

"What with my brats, and sickly wife;
Quoth Dick, "I'm almost tired of life;
So hard my work, so poor my fare,
'Tis more than mortal man can bear.

"How glorious is the rich man's state,
His cheer is fine, his wealth so great;
Heaven is not, you just agree;
Why all to him? Why none to me?"

"In spite of all the Bible teaches,
In spite of all the parson preaches,
This world—in deed I've thought so long—
Is ruled, methinks, entirely wrong.

"Where'er I look, howe'er I range,
'Tis all confused, and hard, and strange;
The good are troubled and oppressed,
For where's the reward where the border?"

Quoth John, "Our ignorance is the cause,
Why thus we blame the Maker's laws;
Parts of his ways alone we know;
'Tis all that man can see below.

"Seest thou that carpet, not half done,
Which thou, dear Dick, hast well begun?
Behold the wild confusion there;
So rude the mass, it makes one stare.

"A stranger, ignorant of the trade,
Would say, "No meaning's there conveyed;
For where's the reward where the border?
Thy carpet now is all disorder!"

Quoth Dick, "My work is yet in bits,
But still, in every part it fits;
Beside, you reason like a lout:
Why man, that carpet's inside out!"

Says John, "Thou sayest just what I mean;
And now I hope to cure thy spleen:
This world, which clouds thy soul with doubt,
Is but a carpet, inside out.

"As when we view these shreds and ends,
We know not what the whole intends;
So when on earth, things here but odd,
They're working still some scheme of God.

"No plan, no pattern can we trace;
All wants proportion, truth, and grace;
The motley mixture we deride,
Nor see the beauteous upper side.

"But when we reach the world of light,
And view the works of God aright,
Then shall we see the whole design,
And own the Workman is divine.

"What now seem random strokes, will there,
All order and design appear;
Then shall we praise what here we spurned,
For then the carpet shall be turned."

"Thou'rt right," quoth Dick, "no more I'll grumble
That where's the reward where the border;
My heedless doubts are put to flight
For my own carpet sets me right!"

"I'm Afraid to Die Rich."

Such was the reply, not long since, of a man who was noted for his liberality in doing good. He had just been giving a large sum to a certain benevolent object, when a friend enquired "If it was not more than he could well afford, and why it was that, with all the demands upon him for his business and his family, he gave away so much." And his reply—for ever memorable—was, "I feel that as to my property I am but God's steward and I'm afraid to die rich!"

What a lesson to all, especially to every Christian! A lesson—

1. On the fact of our stewardship. Deny it, forget it, disregard it though we may, it is still forever true that we are not owners but stewards of all we possess. On our time talents, influence, property—on all that we have and are, the finger of God hath written "Occupy till I come." Whether we have five or ten talents, He bids us remember that it all belongs to Him, and that soon He will call us to give an account for the manner in which we have used it. If we remembered this, should we not spend less for self, and fashion, and appetite, and the world in its many forms than now we do? Should we not regard all our possessions as sacredly to be held and faithfully used for the Master in advancing his cause, in spreading his truth in blessing our fellow-men? At any moment we may hear the call, "Give an account of thy stewardship." Let us so admit, and realize, and be faithful to the trust committed to us, that when that call shall come we may not hear that fearful addition, "Thou mayest be no longer steward."

And not merely as to the fact of our stewardship, but it is a lesson also—

2. On fidelity to it. Did we but bring home to ourselves and seriously consider the fact of our stewardship, would it not make us more faithful to its duties? If in worldly matters it is a dark sign for the steward of a rich man himself to be growing rich while his master's interests are not advancing, is it not in the sphere of religion? And is that disciple a faithful steward who is rolling up wealth or expending it on self, while his charities are less and less in proportion to his riches? Quoth lately a very wealthy man died, and one who, as the world goes, was regarded as very liberal in his gifts. And a thoughtful man of the world said, "All his gifts, though counted by thousands and tens of thousands, were not so much for him as a few pennies would be for me." And then he added, not in the spirit of censure, but in sad and serious tones, as expressing the deep convictions of his heart, "If I called myself a Christian, I would not dare to go to the judgment, dying worth so many millions, when there is so much to do in a world like this to benefit one's fellow-men!" And there is truth—to many, it is to be feared, alarming truth—in the thought thus expressed. To every one, and especially to those who are increasing their riches, there is a solemn lesson in these words of the Saviour at the final day: "Inasmuch as ye did it not!" It is not needful to our condemnation that we use our wealth for positively evil ends, that we squander it in dissipation, or in spreading error, or in corrupting our fellow men. It is only not to use it in doing good, not to use it as faithful stewards of the great Giver, not to employ it as He directs and for his honor and glory.

This may be the "hiding of the talent in the sack," and may incur the doom of the wicked and slothful servant?

Let every one seriously consider his stewardship, and pray for grace to be faithful to it. Let every one sympathize with the spirit of the expression, "I'm afraid to die rich!"—American Messenger.

But one Religion.

Selected.

I am on this occasion renewedly confirmed in a sentiment I have long been settled in, that is, that there never was, and never will be but one true religion in the world, to wit, the work of the Spirit of God in the souls of mankind; and that some of all denominations have something of this true religion, even though some of these, through the prejudice of education, disallow it in profession; and that no man has any real religion, but what he comes to the knowledge and experience of through the alone influence of this Holy Spirit of God; this it is that begins and carries on the work; this it is, that, by its own divine influence, operating in the minds of mankind, reveals Christ in them, the hope of glory; or so prepares from time to time, on reading the scriptures or other good books; on hearing the gospel preached; on meditating on the works of creation and providence; on God's judgments in the earth; or his dealings with himself as individuals; or whatever other occasion, circumstance or thing, is ever made means of conviction or conversion; the Holy Spirit so operates, I say, in all these cases, as to produce the happy effect, and without the ward operation thereof, all these other opportunities and things would be utterly in vain as to salvation, and never able to produce the least degree of true religion, or sanctification in the soul.

So that, though there are many opinions, many creeds, professions and denominations, and some truly religious persons in them all; yet there is, and can be, but one true religion. All true religion is of one kind; all springs from one source. And, blessed and adored ever be the Lord, in order that all men may, if they will, be benefited experimentally by this one true religion, "the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit him." He that rightly profits thereby, and continues so to do, will live in the exercise of the one true faith; will witness the one true Christian baptism; will know and obey the one living Lord; will, by the Holy Ghost, in word and deed acknowledge and call Him Lord; and so will be saved with an everlasting salvation. And on the other hand, seeing measure of the Holy Spirit is given to every man; seeing the grace of God that brings salvation hath appeared unto all men; seeing the light and life of the holy Word, which in the beginning was with God, and was God, hath enlightened every man that cometh into the world; and seeing, moreover, Christ Jesus has tasted death for every man; how shall we escape if we neglect and reject so great salvation? How great must be the condemnation of every soul, thus highly favored, which yet stands out against and rejects the strivings of the Spirit, the teachings of grace, the things and convictions of this Divine Light.—J. Scott.

The Lord searcheth all hearts and understandeth all imaginations of the thoughts.

Street Words.

Commenting upon the whitened hair, whilst passing an old and familiar face, said I, "We are much whiter than we were twenty years ago." "Yes," was the reply, "but we shall soon reach home, I trust." "Home! home," said I to myself, as I drove on amid the busy throng; "what a word is that, 'home, home!' I was at the moment the subject of deep sorrow of heart on account of a most sad and sorrowful epistle from a sorely-tryed friend and brother. His was a case which I felt to be far out of the reach of the creature. In it he expressed his anticipation of twenty years of the very keenest and most agonizing of sufferings, and I felt at an utter loss what steps to take or argument to adopt with the view of relieving his tortured mind and overburdened heart. Intensely did I feel, 'Vain is the help of man.' It was a case in which the Lord Himself alone could bring his mighty power to bear, and raise his servant from the horrible pit and mire clay." I felt that it was the Lord, and the Lord only, could "set his feet upon a rock, and establish his goings," at the same time "putting a new song into his mouth, even of praise unto our God." Yes, this must be the Lord's work, and his alone.

But, lo! under the circumstances, how sweetly came the thought of "home! sweet, sweet home!" How the mariner, tossed upon the mighty deep, encountering rough seas and boisterous winds, longs for "home! sweet, sweet home!" How the poor soldier, in that land of swamps and savages where dread war now rages, must think of and long for "home! sweet, sweet home!" How the one who have passed years and years upon foreign service must long for "home! sweet, sweet home!" But what opportunity do all these wretched cases bear to the poor worn-and-weary wanderer across the desert wilderness of time, as he looks and longs for "home! sweet, sweet home!" where he shall find, not only eternal shelter from all storms and tempests with which he had been so many years familiar, but likewise eternal freedom from all the deadly assaults of an ever-vigilant adversary, and equal freedom from the strife and the strugglings of his poor fallen flesh? Yea, and how blessed will be the society, as well as the security, of that "home! sweet, sweet home!" There will be patriarchs and prophets and martyrs! There will be "the general assembly and Church of the First-born, whose names are written in heaven!" There will be many—a! very many—whom he has known, loved, and communed with on earth. Oh, then, what a heaven and what a home will that be? "Home! sweet, sweet home," indeed!

"There shall he bathe his weary soul

In seas of heavenly rest;

And not a wave of trouble roll

Across his peaceful breast!"

Paying a visit, shortly after the incident aforementioned, upon one who was only partially recovering from a short but severe illness, the letter aforementioned from the deeply-tryed and tempted friend was referred to. The case reminded a friend who was present of one upon whom she once had occasion to call in a way of business, who (to her surprise) took her into her confidence, and began to tell of the desperate state of mind she was in. Although at the time rolling in wealth and encompassed by every luxury, she stated that, in place of thankfulness and gratitude, her mind was so filled with cursing and blasphemy that it seemed impossible to refrain from giving utterance to what she was enduring. She felt, however, that she dare not tell what she was passing through even to her husband, although a most godly man! Even at the family service her temptations were fearful beyond expression. At length her husband suddenly sickened and died, and then (to her utmost surprise and amazement) she found she was left a widow, almost penniless, with two growing-up sons to educate and place in some profession. This state of things followed their many years' prosperity, and the loss of property of many thousands as her own marriage dowry. However, in proof of what the Lord himself can do in connection with these otherwise most painful reverses, He so turned her captivity, in a spiritual sense, that "her peace flowed like a river." Now, when walking the streets, only a little removed from absolute poverty, instead of as before riding in her carriage, she was so joyful in the God of her salvation that her very countenance was lighted-up with an almost supernatural radiance. When spoken to upon the subject, as being in such striking contrast to her previous condition in the midst of all her prosperity, she stated that the Lord's presence and consolations were so great that, whilst she felt nothing of her reverses, she could but rejoice in the God of her salvation.

But a short time before she was called hence, in the very room where we were then seated, she was expressing her peace and joy in the assurance that she was shortly going home!

Thus, reader, within a short half-hour or so of the aforementioned remark, "We shall soon reach home, I trust," we had a practical illustration of the blessedness of death, prospect of contrast with the so-called luxuries of life!

Reader, say what men may to the contrary, the word of the living God stands as firm, as full, and as blessed as ever: "There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift Thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. Thou hast put gladness in my heart more than in the time that their corn and wine increased."—The Episcopal Recorder.

The natives of Africa have an amiable desire to please, and often tell what they imagine will be gratifying, rather than the uninteresting naked truth. Let a native from the interior be questioned by a thirsty geographer whether the mountains round his youthful home are high; from a dim recollection of something of the sort, combined with a desire to please, the answer will be in the affirmative. And so it will be if the subject of inquiry be gold or uniforms, or men with tails. English sportsmen, though the number of their misses on first trying the native shots at home, are notorious for the number of their misses on first trying on such a large scale, and there is such a glare of bright sunlight, that some time is required to enable them to judge of distances. "It wounded?" inquired a gentleman of his dark attendant, after firing at an antelope. "Yes; the ball went right into his heart." These mortal wounds never proving fatal, he asked a friend, who understood the language, to explain to the man that he preferred the truth in every case. "He is my father," replied the native, "and I thought he would be displeased if I told him that he never hits at all."—D. Livingstone.

Nan, the Newsboy.

Nan, the newsboy, is among the latest of the odd characters which spring into fame from time to time out of the varied life of the great city of New York. A year ago he formed a little band, consisting of himself and two others, to patrol the East river docks at night and rescue persons from drowning.

Some charitable persons heard of the boys, gave them a floating station to live in, boats, neat blue uniforms, and a small weekly salary, to devote their whole time to the work.

The regulations by which the association should be governed, according to his idea, are few and simple. As jotted down with other matters in his rough log book, they are:

1. Members shall do whatever the president orders them.

2. No one shall be a member who drinks or gets drunk.

3. Any member not down in Dover Dock, and miss one night except in sickness, shall be fined fifty cents by order of the president.

No cursing allowed.

The first meeting of the association took place one pleasant day in 1878.

"We was a sittin' on Dover Dock," Nan says, "telli' stories. We got talkin' about how a body was took out 'most every day, and some said two hundred was took out in a year. We heard about life-savin' on the Jersey coast, too. So I says: 'Say we make a' association of it, boys, for to go along the docks pickin' 'em up regular.' 'All right!' they says, and they nominates me for president."

They have also with them five unpaid volunteers who serve at night. The force is divided into three patrols.

Usually they hang their nets about the tenements, sailor boarding-houses and drinking saloons. The upper part of South street is a kind of breathing place for this squalid quarter. It is much favored by idle urchins especially, who find a hundred ways to amuse themselves among the boxes and bales. A breeze blows from the water across the dusty, coffee-colored piers and gives a breath of fresh air.

The fish dock and the old "dirt" dock in Peck Slip on summer evenings are white with the figures of bathers. Often, too, even when the law was more stringent against it than now, they found means to swim in the day-time. They wrestle and tumble over one another, remain in the water for hours, swim across the swift stream to Brooklyn and back, and dive to the muddy bottom for coins thrown to them by spectators.

This was the training-school of our life-savers. Accidents were very frequent here, and the boys made many rescues without thinking much of them. Their house is a little box of a place, painted bright blue, moored under the shade of the great Brooklyn bridge, and close to both Fulton and Roosevelt street ferries. The front door of the establishment, as it might be called, is through a hole in a dilapidated fence; then down a ladder, and perhaps across a canal-boat or two, to where it lies, wedged in, in the crowded raft. They have a rowboat, and a life-saving raft of the catamaran pattern.

Inside, the station has three bunks, some lockers to hold miscellaneous articles, a small stove in a corner, and a small case of books contributed by the Seaman's Friend Society. These are largely accounts of courage and ingenuity in danger likely to be appreciated by boys in their circumstances.

Nan had saved eight persons, Long six, and Kelly four, before the association was formed, and Nan had received a silver medal from the United States Life-saving Association.

His most gallant case was the rescue of three young men overturned from a row-boat by the collision with the Harlem steamer off Eleventh street. He was selling his papers on the dock at the time. When his notice was attracted to the accident, he at once threw the papers down and plunged in. He was taken out himself in a drowning condition.

"When you drowns," he says, speaking feelingly from experience, "not a thing you ever did but comes up in your head. Then, maybe, after that you hear a kin' o' noise like music in your ears."

Long's best case was the saving of a son of Police Sergeant Webb's in Dover Dock, and Kelly's of a boy at Bay Ridge, who drew him down twice in the effort.—St. Nicholas.

Selected.

"Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love; in honor preferring one another. If it be possible, as much as liech in you live peaceably with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." Heb. xii. 14.

Since wrath and anger turn into nothing but disquietude, and are punished by themselves, why dost thou suffer thyself to be easily moved by them? The least provocation, even a single word, perhaps, will stir up the corruption of thine heart, so as to change the countenance, and make thee utter dreadful words. Therefore, consider how God ~~hates~~ hates with thee, and what an abomination anger is. * * * Being called to bear the image of God, and bring forth the fruits of the good Spirit, thou art to follow the lamblike mind of Christ; and to that purpose it is highly necessary, first: To avoid all occasions of strife and contention. Secondly, To bridle our tongue, if quarrels arise. Thirdly, To suffer when we are wronged. Fourthly, To quench when the sparks of fire, before they break out into a flame. This is the easiest and the only method to prevent great troubles, and lead a peaceful, happy life: for anger carries uneasiness, and love a sweet rest in itself.—Bogatzky.

War.—How true it is that war is the extremity of evil! and that a resort to the arbitrament of the sword to settle national disputes is both extremely impolitic and highly unchristian. Truism-like these must more and more permeate and leaven the public mind in proportion as the Gospel of the kingdom of Christ is allowed full place in the hearts and consciences of men. How long nation will be permitted to lift up sword against nation, or to go on learning to war and fight, is only known to the Great Arbitrer, whose beloved incarnate Son is declared to be the Prince of Peace; and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end.

That man should fight and destroy his fellow-man, though permitted under a less perfect dispensation, yet then but at the express command and going forth of the Eternal, is one of those outrageous horrors which belong not to these new covenant days; when instead of retaliation for injuries, love is to be the Christian's badge and armor; because as

Christ our Lawgiver has said, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

Oh! how fiend-like is the strife and madness upon the field of battle! How wickedness reigns! How cursing and bitterness malice and death, cry aloud and prevail!

"To rush into a fixed eternal state,

Out of the very flames of rage and hate,

Or send another shivering to the bar,

With all the guilt of such unnatural war,

Whatever use may urge, or honor plead,

On reason's verdict is a madman's deed."

When will the benign principles of the Gospel of Jesus be suffered to leaven all hearts so that instead of this blasting scourge of war being resorted to, nations no less than individuals, the whole like its parts, shall have recourse to the more civilized, as well as more expedient and righteous course of submitting, to pacific arbitration the grievance, whatever it be, and thus now and forever banish a scene so calculated to glut not only the carrion-loving birds of the air with mangled human flesh but Satan and his angels with fields of horri-wickedness and death's eternal reign.—The Episcopal Recorder.

For "The Friend."

A letter which I have just received from Elizabeth L. Comstock, written from Lawrence, Kansas, represents the destitution of many of the colored refugees to be very great. She earnestly appeals for clothing, bedding &c., and for money with which to buy food and fuel, as well as to pay for roofing for the rude stork cabins.

I have made arrangements with the Pennsylvania railroad for transportation, free of cost, and should be glad to receive and forward any contributions, either in supplies or money.

"This is an age of multiplied and busy usefulness. We hear much everywhere of high education and its advantages; especially the higher education of women urged as necessity of the greatest importance. While we attach all due value to the cultivation of the intellectual powers given to us by God, and for the right use of which we are doubtless responsible, we cannot but feel that there is danger of giving to intellectual culture that first place, which [the Bible] teaches should ever be given to the education of the heart. Against such an error we are bound, as Christian women, firmly to take our stand."—M. Cronyn.

A Howling Wilderness.—We leave the West of Moses and ride over a dead level of sand and gravel without seeing a house or a mill or an animal or a tree, but every now and then the skeleton of a camel which marks the track. In this region Dean Stanley was overtaken by a roaring and driving sand storm, which lasted a whole day and explained to him the term "howling" wilderness. The whole air he says was filled with a tempest of sand, driving in your face like sleet; the Bedouin rode with their shawls thrown over their heads, and half of the riders sat backwards; while the camels moved painfully onwards, seriously impeded by their saddle-bags which act like sails, and stretching from time to time their long necks sideways to avoid the blast.—Schoff's Through Bible Lands.

Religious Items, &amp;c.

Native Christians in India.—Bishop Caldwell, of Madras, in a paper on Indian converts to Christianity, says: "Remembering that we never can know the private life of any class of people in England so well as we know the private life—if that can be called private which is perfectly public—of native Christians in this country, I maintain that the Christians of our Indian missions have no need to shrink from comparison with Christians in a similar station in life and similarly circumstanced in England or in any other part of the world. The style of character they exhibit is one which those who are well acquainted with them cannot but like. I think I do not exaggerate when I affirm that they appear to me in general more teachable and tractable, more considerate of the feelings of others, and more respectful to superiors, more patient and gentle, more trustful in Providence, better church-goers, yet freer from religious bigotry, and, in proportion to their means, more liberal than Christians in England, holding a similar position in the social scale. I do not for a moment pretend that they are free from imperfection; on the contrary, living among them as I do from day to day, I see their imperfections daily, and daily do I reprove, rebuke, exhort," as I see need, but am bound to say that when I have gone away anywhere, and looked back upon the Christians of this country from a distance, when I have compared them with what I have seen and known of Christians in other countries, I find that their good qualities have left a deeper impression in my mind than their imperfections."—Leisure Hour.

The Primitive Christian copies from a Baptist paper some advice against unnecessary and extravagant preparations for entertaining company at the time of large gatherings of people for religious purposes. The caution may be valuable to some of our own members who have many visitors at "Quarterly Meetings," and other occasions. It says, "Let there be a supply of plain simple food," and do nothing for vain glory." "We have heard sisters say they would not go to so much trouble if others would not, but this is not a good excuse." "The manna that comes down from Heaven is the food that we should be most concerned about, and the more our sins are taken up with the natural food, the less we can feast on the bread of life."

Elevation in Catholic Schools.—A daughter of Richard H. Dana, Jr., of Massachusetts, having become a convert to Rome from attending a Romish school, a Romish paper very handsomely says: "The influences of convent education have wrought this change of views, and if her family object to the way she has taken, they have themselves to thank for it. Religious instruction from a Catholic standpoint is about the first thing to find lodgment in an imaginative mind, and Miss Dana is quite romantic and poetic in her temperament."

The English Primitive Methodists, through John Bright, have presented to Parliament a petition three-fourths of a mile long, and signed by 1,000,000 persons, asking for the closing of the liquor shops on First-days, their plea is justified by the results of the bill closing all liquor shops on that day in Ireland, as set forth in an official report on the subject, presented in the House of Commons. For twenty-seven weeks before the closing, the arrests were 2,264; after for the same period the arrests were 707—a reduction of 70 per cent. In cities and towns where the prohibition was not made absolute, but the hours of liquor-selling were materially shortened, the figures show a reduction of 35 per cent. in arrests.

A Pet Monkey.—This animal, a large and powerful specimen of his class, belonged to an officer in the British army, and was a general favorite from his gentleness of disposition. During a temporary absence of his master, he was entrusted to the care of a brother officer, who chained him to a chest of drawers in his own barrack-room, being anxious that no harm should happen to him while under his charge. This restriction of his usual liberty appears to have quite depressed him. To while the tedious hours away, upon a certain day during which he was left alone longer than usual, he bit upon the following occupation. Having, with a patience and perseverance worthy of a better cause, forced open the locks of all the drawers,—a feat requiring a very considerable degree of strength—he strewn the miscellaneous contents upon the floor, and seated himself in the centre, monarch of all he surveyed; and doubtless contemplated with tranquil satisfaction the chaos he had produced. Unfortunately he soon espied a very large inkstand, placed, it must be allowed in extenuation, within easy reach. He immediately availing himself of the contents, he deliberately and with unsparing hand, bedaubed every article of his hospitable entertainer's property with ink. The scene on the entrance of the accompanying boat may be possibly better imagined than described. Peter (the monkey was so named) appeared to be totally unconscious that he had been guilty of the slightest wrong-doing in this somewhat sensational scene. He was mercifully spared from punishment, but summarily dismissed from his comfortable quarters, and left to wander about the barracks.

Soon after poor Peter was found in a woful condition; it being discovered, amidst general indignation, that he had been fired at and seriously injured by gun shot wounds. His numerous friends did their utmost to save his life which was in imminent danger. He had the best medical advice; the slugs were all extracted; and with surgical skill and affectionate care he was soon restored to health. His master returned at the time of Peter's convalescence, and the rapturous joy of the poor monkey at seeing him once more will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. He clung to him, and fondly embraced him over and over again; repeatedly kissing or rather licking his face and hands, with demonstrations of the most devoted attachment.

When the first paroxysm of delight had subsided, Peter, sitting on the table, the better to gaze upon his newly recovered friend, looked earnestly at him, and clasping his arm, to bespeak special attention, pointed with his own forefinger to each of the wounds whence the slugs had been taken; trying at the same time, in the nearest approach to speech that he could accomplish, to tell the piteous story of his narrow escape from a violent death, at the hands of his ruthless assailant.—Chambers' Journal.

Hawaian Surf-bathing.—The wind was light, but immense seas were rolling in through the broad opening into the bay, in front of which was our place of observation. To our left was a broad area covered with large volcanic rocks, extending almost half a mile into the bay. Near the shore the tops of many of these appeared above the water, the depth of which gradually increased seaward. As the big seas chased each other in from the open ocean, the west end first reached this rocky bed; and the moment the bottom of the wave met the obstruction the rotary motion was checked, and instantly the comb on the top was formed, so that the foamy crest seemed to run along the top of the wave from west to east, as successive portions of it reached the rocky bottom. To our left, over the rocky bed, perhaps half a dozen of these huge crested waves would be chasing one another, the most advanced being the least perfect in form, till finally they became quite broken down, and dissolved into a vast field of white foam, in the midst of which the great volcanic boulders showed themselves.

Three bathers appeared, each with his bathing-board, which was some three-quarters of an inch thick, about seven feet long, coffin-shaped and rounded at the ends, and chamfered at the edges; it was fifteen inches wide at the widest, near the forward end, and eleven inches wide at the back end. The bathers started out, their boards under their arms, in this seething sea of foam, among the rocks, where only an expert, familiar with the ground, could avoid being dashed to death; sometimes wading, and sometimes swimming, and sometimes stopping on high rocks to study and take advantage of the situation, till they reached the regular wave formations, when they struck out on their boards, diving under the waves they met, making their way rapidly outward and towards the west end of the breakers. Here they remained floating on their boards, till an unusually large and regular wave approached and commenced breaking, its great foaming crest arching over in front, the milky foam falling upon the front declivity of the wave several feet above its base. This was the condition desired by the surf-bathers. One instantly dashed in the front and at the lowest declivity of the advancing wave, and with a few strokes of hands and feet established his position, and then without further effort shot along the base of the wave to the eastward with incredible velocity. Naturally he came toward the shore with the body of the wave as it advanced, but his course was along the foot of the wave and parallel with it so that he only saw that he was running past with the speed of a swift-winged bird.

So soon as the bather had secured his position, he gave a spring and stood on his knees on the board; and just as he was passing us, when about three hundred feet from the little peninsula where we stood, he gave another spring, and stood upon his feet, now folding his arms upon his breast, and now swinging them about in wild ecstasy in his exhilarating flight. But all this must be enjoyed rapidly; for scarcely a minute elapsed from the time he started till he was far away to the right, where he abandoned the exhausted wave, and with a few vigorous strokes propelled himself into shallow water, when he waded ashore with his board under his arm, and came up to us as calm, at least, as those who had witnessed his wonderful feat.

The bathers themselves were quite unable to explain what it was that propelled them with such astonishing velocity along the foot of the wave.—Atlantic Monthly.

Dexterity of the Elephant.—Strolling out of our tents one afternoon, another officer and I saw a small elephant coming along at a racing pace from the rear, pursued by a larger one in no very quiet mood, with his trunk in the air. The little one made straight for the nearest soldiers' tent, and running among the ropes, snapped some of them like strings, and drew the pegs of others out of the ground. She then turned in among the horses, who, thoroughly scared, broke from their head and heel ropes, and commenced racing about, fighting, kicking and neighing. The soldiers' tent, which fell over, gave the men a scare, and they came rolling out as fast as they could. The native horse attendants were set off screaming and yelling, and altogether there was a bewildering Babel of voices and noise.

In last time it has taken to read these few last lines, the elephants who doubled back came at a great pace, the little one still leading. As she advanced, the mahout of the larger elephant came rushing forward, with his long black hair streaming out behind him. In his hands he had a short spear, which he carried at the charge. He passed the smaller elephant unnoticed, and without hesitation, or halt, met his, the larger elephant, at charging pace, and struck the lance of his spear into the side of his trunk. The shock of the charge made him reel, and the elephant threw himself back on his haunches and stood still. The spear was withdrawn, followed by a very little blood, and the man spoke to the animal in some familiar tones. It immediately put its trunk to the man's forehead, and he was at once lifted over the animal's head till he stepped on his usual seat on its neck. He then rode it quietly to the rear. The submission, under such circumstances, to punishment, and the spirit of loyalty to the man who daily fed, watered, washed and clothed it, was touching in the extreme. Considering the strength and courage of the elephant, its having been born and bred a wild beast, and its natural hostility to man, one could not but believe that the man who thus conquered most assuredly had formerly gained its affections through kind and considerate treatment. We were glad when we saw that the spear, wielded in a moment of excitement and fury, had inflicted a wound so free of danger.—Leisure Hour.

Attacked by a Rattle Fish.—The Leeds Mercy says that a rather amusing incident was witnessed in the Scarborough Aquarium recently. The keeper, while engaged in cleaning out the tank occupied by the octopods, was suddenly seized by the leg (fortunately he had sea-boots on) by the largest of the octopods, which fastened four of his tentacles round the leg of the boot, and with the other four held firmly on to the rocks forming the back of the tank. A struggle ensued during which the man found he could not disengage himself without killing the animal, and finally lay upon the specimen of slipping his legs out leaving the boot in the water and leaving a retreat. The hungry octopus struck to the boat for 20 minutes, when it relinquished its hold.

The English Sea-briar (Rosa rubiginosa) has become a wide spreading annoyance in Tasmania, where it was originally introduced as a hedge plant, for which it is very efficient, if kept within proper bounds and well clipped; but from carelessness or inattention, it has been permitted to run wild, and being propagated by the aid of birds and other causes, it is fast becoming a serious evil, for so firm are the roots, it can only be eradicated by the help of bullocks.—Leisure Hour.

ELEVENTH MONTH 8, 1879.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—During the Tenth month there were six days on which some rain fell, but the total amount only reached .41 of an inch. Average rainfall for the month, .23 inch. Number of 10th month for the past six years, 2,836 inches. Number of clear days 17. Frosts occurred on the 20th, 25th, 29th, and a few flakes of snow fell on the 24th. The average temperature of the month was 61.7 degrees, which is 3.6 degrees higher than same month last year, and 3.6 deg. above the average for the past six years. Prevailing direction of wind was south-west. Total tonnage of all kinds of coal, for the week ending 10th mo. 25th, is 669,988 tons, against 662,436 for corresponding week last year; and the total for the year is 23,915,816 tons, against 16,021,655 tons to same date last year.

Sixty-nine wagon loads were ninety-two carriage establishments in the United States. These gave employment to 2,274 persons, producing 13,331 carriages of various kinds, representing a value of $1,708,741. It is now estimated there are 15,000 carriage manufacturers in the United States, who employ upwards of 100,000 men, and produce annually for the past twelve months upwards of 1,200,000 carriages, amounting in value to fully $125,000,000.

Officers of the Canadian Geological Survey, now engaged in the Northwest Territory, report the discovery of extensive beds of coal in the neighbourhood of Nelson, B. C. It is thought this will hasten the proposed expedition to test the navigability of Hudson's Bay and Strait.

The steamship City of Bristol, drawing 25 feet, went through the Mississippi jetties without detention. This is said to be the largest craft ever loosed to sea from New Orleans.

Forty-five Indian children arrived last week at the school at Hampton. It is stated these were obtained through the exertions of two of the Indians who were taken four years ago to Florida as prisoners of war. While in prison some instruction was given them, and their advancement proved so encouraging that they were sent to the school at Hampton. From there many of them have gone to the school at Carlisle. About one year ago, four of them went to Syracuse, N. Y., and entered a school under care of the Episcopalians. When children were wanted for the Carlisle school, the officers decided to send two of these Indians to make selections. The result is the result of their first visit among their people.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending at noon on the first inst., was 225, a decrease of 23 from the previous week, and of 61 from the same period of 1878.

Markets.—U. S. bonds, 65, 1881, 105½; 5s, 1881, 102½; 4½s, 1881, 100; common 106; 4 per cents, 102½.

Business generally has been quite active during the past week.

Cotton, 11½ a 11½ cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Flour.—Prices closed firmer: Minnesota extra, at $6.50 for medium, $6.75 for choice, and $7 for fancy; patent, $8.25 a $8.75. Rye flour, $6. Feed.—Bran, 5½ a $1.90 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat unsettled and higher. Penna. and Southern red, $1.37 a $1.38; amber and white, $1.10, 10m, 59 a 60 cts. Oats, 13 a 15 cts. for white, and 11 a 12 cts. for mixed.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week: Prime timothy, 90 a 95 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 90 cts. per 100 pounds. Straw, 35 a 41.05 per 100 pounds.

Live cattle.—The market active, though prices for the beef grades were off. Extra, 5½ a 5½ cts.; good, 4½ a 5 cts., and common 3 a 3½ cts. per lb. Hogs.—The market was active and prices higher, 5½ a 6½ cts. per pound, as to quality. Sheep, 3½ a 3½ cts. per pound, as to condition. Lambs, 4½ a 6 cts.

Ice formed in the gutters at Memphis on the 3d inst., ending all fears of further fever this year. Refugee boats, and a cable bridge was formed on the river at Winnipeg Manitoba, on the 3d, and people walked across. Unusual snow storms for this season of the year, have occurred through the lake region and New England.

The steamship Teutonia arrived at New Orleans on the 3d inst., from Liverpool, with two hundred immigrant farmers who intend to settle in Texas.

FOREIGN.—At the municipal elections throughout England on the 1st inst., wherever political considerations were involved, the Liberals were mostly triumphant; in one or two very important boroughs the balance of power was completely reversed in favor of the Liberals.

Sir Stafford Northcote, Chancellor of the Exchequer in answering a letter calling his attention to the distress acting by the Government in providing work for the people, says he sympathizes with the people, but can only refer them to the Irish Executive. He adds, the direct interference by the Government would be open to great abuse.

A dispatch from Cabul says: The population is quite but not so small a number. There can be no doubt the beneath it is hid deep hatred of the British dominion. The Cabules are kept down simply by fear, and will rise if they saw a chance of success.

By order of the Viceroy of India, Sir Frederic Roberts has issued a proclamation, stating that, in consequence of the abdication of the Ameer and the outrage at the British Residency, the British Government has been compelled to occupy Cabul and other parts of Afghanistan. The Afghan authorities are instructed to maintain order in the districts, and to hold a joint consultation with General Roberts. Arrangements for a permanent administration of the country will be made after the above mentioned consultation has been held.

The Emperor William opened the Prussian Diet at Berlin on the 1st inst. The principal measure announced comprising a loan for covering the deficits, a bill for applying the surplus of the imperial taxes to the reduction of the income tax, a bill for taxing the retail trade in brandy, a bill for the purpose of increasing the duties on spirits, and the construction of new branches. No allusion was made to the foreign or political situation.

The Vienna correspondent of the Standard telegraph "Russia, convinced that she is isolated, has been earnestly seeking to be admitted to the Austro-German union. It is almost certain there will be a meeting of the emperors.

Spain.—There have been heavy rains throughout the country. The principal railroad lines of Aragon, Catalonia and Navarre, have been interrupted by gales and deluges. The river Guadalquivir, several metres above its ordinary level, has carried away houses, mills and bridges, and caused damage to the amount of several millions of pesetas. It is expected that a large number of the inhabitants have been drowned.

The Portuguese census of 1878, shows a population of 4,749,255 persons, or 23,143,325 souls, or 2,430,514 females—including Madeira and Azores. The inhabitants are 1,132,773 in number, the average thereof to each house being 3.85 persons.

Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M. D.
Application for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at her residence in West Chester, Pa., on the 6th of Tenth mo. 1879, MARY E. PIM, widow of Elisha Pim, in the 73d year of her age, a member of the Friends' Meeting of Philadelphia. Her husband, an ornament of meek and quiet spirit, in simple trust that "He doeth all things well," seemed to be her bright comfort through many years of single-handed responsibility for a large family. The loving serenity of her passing may, like that of her course of life, have witnessed the work of righteousness is peace, and the effect righteousness, quietness and assurance forever.

Selected for "The Friend."

This letter, of Samuel Bownas, appeared in The Friend several years ago. I should be glad to see it re-published. It is good for us to be put in remembrance of things that we readily know: that such who are called upon to minister to the people may "appear in the beauty of the Spirit, without any mixture of the flesh."

Letter to a Female Friend, on the Subject of Ministry.

Dear Debby,—The small time I had with thee, furnished me with an opportunity of observing the disposition of thy mind, and gave me a small taste of thy ministry, both which, under proper cultivation, I think may be improved, so as to render thee a member of good service in the body. In order to which, and that thou mayest in thy public engagements appear in the beauty of the spirit, without any mixture of the flesh, or of that weak and womanish part which, in both sexes, ought never to speak in the congregation of the saints, I will give thee a short sketch of some of my hits and misses, when, in my youth, I publicly appeared in the gallery; the observation of which, I hope, may lead me to thy profit and instruction, viz:

I was seldom, for near two years after my youth was first opened to preach the Gospel, without some degree of Divine love and virtue in my mind, but after I was called out to the service of visiting meetings abroad, I found my mind very often barren and weak, and as then thought, void of all good, in which state, (being companion to my dear friend J. J.) I cried out that I was deceived, to his great surprise; he fearing my affliction would be too hard for me. I had imprudently thought, that having such abundances of Divine love and life when I was daily at my work, I should be much more favored therewith when abroad in the service of the Gospel, isengaged from all other employments. But finding the reverse, I wished myself at home again, rather than travelling in such a barren state as I was then in, though at times I had minute enjoyments; but, alas! they were soon gone. In due time, I was favored with the design of Providence in dealing thus with me; and the very cattle in the field, by weaning of their young and turning them to shift for themselves, taught me, that it was meet I should be left a little to myself, and not always be kept to the breast and dandled upon the knee like an infant; but that it was needful I should grow, and advance above this infant state, to a degree more fit for service.

When I was thoroughly informed in this point, I longed to be a man; yea, sometimes, I verily thought I was so; but met often with great disappointments therein, by undertaking matters above my growth and experience; and the weak part appearing at times to my great shame and confusion, humbled me again for some time. But recovering strength and courage, I began, as I thought, to advance above the danger of making such blunders: a confidence arising in me, on imprudently comparing my service and growth as a minister, with others, that were in the work before me; supposing myself (and it was self that did suppose) more eminent than they. Thus self prevailed, and the weak part appeared again, to my shame and sorrow; but my Master's kindness and gracious regard was soon after evidently manifested in letting me plainly see the weakness and folly of taking the honor to ourselves, which alone is due to Him, when we have been drawn forth in the beauty of the Gospel, beyond what we ourselves, or those that heard us, did expect. Now I perceived the necessity of guarding against the inclinations of the flesh, which would sometimes be decking itself with the jewels of the Spirit, saying, I did this, or that, fishing for and seeking the praise of men more than of God. I also saw a danger of falling into a formal way of preaching a form of words, almost without variation, which, though sound, and perhaps pleasing to many, yet wanting the renewing of Divine virtue, are tasteless and unprofitable to the hearers. The view I had of the unprofitableness of such a ministry, would have carried me too far, to my own disadvantage, had I not also been favored with a clear prospect of the lawfulness, expediency and necessity, of speaking in the same matter, or preaching the same doctrine today, (being divinely opened and engaged thereto) as yesterday, though then entirely new to me; for nothing can be said that hath not been said, and it is the renewed evidence of the Spirit that makes it savory, both to us and our hearers.

Superfluous words, tones and gestures—'ah's! and groans—I was never under any temptation to make use of; but the impertinence of self sometimes, to my shame and trouble, would appear, in my imprudently affecting eloquent terms and scholastic expressions, which seemed to me, in that weak state, to adorn my doctrine, and recommend it better to the audience. All this proceeded from an affectation of appearing an able or skillful minister; a piece of unprofitable vanity; but I soon found it most safe and edifying, to use no more words but what I well understood, and could properly apply, and that truth shines brightest in a plain dress. No embellishments of ours can add to its lustre.

I have also, sometimes, for want of a patient and humble waiting to see my way opened, and discover clearly the leadings of the Divine Gift, warmed myself with sparks of my own kindling, to a degree of zeal and passion, and begun to thrash the assemblies, judging and charging the unfaithful, whether any such or none there, it was all one to me. Thus, in the dark, mistaking the cause of that uneasiness and straitness I found in myself, imagining myself loaded and oppressed by dark and unfaithful spirits in the assembly; after wearying myself with denouncing judgments upon them, I have sat down in sadness and trouble. Though I have found this sort of preaching please many, and was commended, it was ever afflictive to me, when, on reflection, I found the true cause of that uneasiness was in my own breast. Yet, it may sometimes happen that the unfaithful may bring great grief and uneasiness upon us, and this may be hard to bear; but let us take care we more not till the cloud is removed from off the tabernacle, because it is unsafe going forward till then.

I have, from experience, found it my safest and best way, carefully to attend to my gift, and earnestly desiring I may judge nothing before its time, but that my understanding may be opened to see the true cause of my own barrenness, that I may be enabled to address myself suitably to the Father of Spirits for help; that first, if it be in myself it may be removed, then the effect will cease; or secondly, if the weakness or back-sliding of others, be the cause of our barrenness and seeming dejection when we are sympathizing with the true seed in its oppressed state, that we may patiently wait the Lord's time, to receive a word from Him fitly to speak to the present state of the people; or, thirdly, if the people's too imprudent expectation of what cannot be had, unless I am favored with a superior aid, qualifying me to answer their desires—I say, if by any or all of these causes, at times, I am shut up, the best way I have ever found is to be patient in waiting the Lord's time for relief. To seek it in our own time, will be but adding sorrow to affliction.

To conclude; the most safe way I ever yet found in the exercise of my gift, is, to stand up, as little regarding any thing besides my opening as I can; and deliver it, in my beginning, just as I do other matters in my common discourse, not endeavoring to beautify it either in matter, tone, or address. As I keep my place, and go on as doctrine is opened in my understanding, I feel at times my voice gradually filled with virtue and power; and even then I find it safest not to speak too fast, or too loud, lest I lose sight of or outran my guide, and so lose the sight or sense of that inward strength I felt increasing in my mind. This care seems to me necessary to my taking the apostle's advice, "Let him that ministers do it of that ability which God giveth;" this has a double signification; first, respecting the matter which we deliver: if we keep to our openings, we shall be furnished with suitable doctrine; secondly, the wisdom and strength of the spirit and power of the Gospel will be felt in it, and, at times, by our thus going on according to the ability God gives, the very spirit and marrow of religion will appear plainly laid open to the understanding of the hearers. But when we raise our voices, or hurry on, above or beyond that inward strength we feel in our minds, we are apt to cloud our own minds, lose sight of or outrun our guide, and then run into a wilderness of words, which I have too often done, and found the consequence of such imprudence poverty and death; though even this kind of preaching is, by some unskillful and/or, admired. They will say, "O, how matter flowed from him! how full was he!" (of emptiness and confusion, say I,) "of power and authority," say they; or rather, of passion and blind zeal of the creature; the fleshly part not being thoroughly mortified and subdued. But when I dare assume to begin with the Spirit, and follow its leadings in my ministry, I feel strength by degrees cover all my weaknesses; wisdom, illuminating my mind, hides all my folly, so that nothing appears inconsistent with the beauty and wisdom of the Spirit. This is the vestment, the Urim and Thummim, that covers the whole man that is to be covered; so that no weakness will prevail or appear in our ministry. When I am thus conducted (which sometimes happens), though I may be accounted, in my beginning, a dull, heavy, or lifeless preacher, yet I rarely miss the approbation of the congregation; and feeling the gradual increase of Divine virtue, in the patient exercise of my gift; finding myself both furnished with matter and skill to divide the word aright; both which coming from the Spirit, and not being the product of my own wisdom or apprehension, I dare assume no part of that honor to myself, which, at such times, by an imprudent audience is lavishly bestowed upon one, who am only the instrument by which the Lord of the harvest works; but find it my safest way, humbly to make thereof an offering unto Him who is worthy forever.

Thus, dear friend, I have stained some paper with a few observations on my own conduct, aiming at thy good; and conclude with desires, thou mayest endeavor to improve thy skill in this work, and rightly divide the word of Truth, so as neither thou thyself, nor those that hear thee, may have cause of shame or uneasiness.

First Impressions.

For "The Friend."

When David Livingstone, in his African explorations, made his way from the central regions of Southern Africa to the coast of the Atlantic ocean at St. Paul de Loanda, his retinue consisted of a band of the uncivilized Makololo, who had been sent with him on the long and perilous journey by the chief of their tribe; and who carried a few tusks of ivory for purposes of trade.

The impressions produced on these men by the wonders they beheld—wonders so unlike anything which their previous experience had prepared them to understand—were often amusing, and at the same time suggestive.

On crossing the elevated plains near Loanda they first beheld the sea, and Livingstone says: "My companions looked on the boundless ocean with awe. On describing their feelings afterward, they said 'we marched along with our father, believing that what the ancients had always told us was true, that the world has no end; but all at once, the world said to us, 'I am finished, there is no more of me.'" They had always imagined that the world was one extended plain without limit."

"They viewed the large storehouses and churches in the vicinity of the great ocean, with awe. A house with two stories was, until now, beyond their comprehension. In explanation of this strange thing I had always been obliged to use the word for hut; and as huts are constructed by poles being let into the earth, they never could comprehend how the poles of one hut could be founded upon the roof of another, or how men could live in the lower one in the middle. Some Makololo, who had visited my little house at Kolobeng, in trying to describe it to their countrymen at Linyanti, said, 'It is not a hut: it is a mountain with several caves in it.'"

"Commander Bedingfield and Captain Skene invited them to visit their vessels, the 'Pluto,' and 'Philomel.' Knowing their fears, I told them no one need go if he entertained the least suspicion of foul play. Nearly the whole party went; and, when on deck, I pointed to the sailors, and said, 'Now, these are all my countrymen, sent by our Queen for the purpose of putting down the trade of those that buy and sell black men.' They replied, 'Truly, they are just like you!' and all their fears seemed to vanish at once.

"The commander allowed them to fire off a gun, and, having the associated ideas of his power, they were greatly pleased when I told them, 'That is what they put down the slave-trade with.' The size of the brig-of-war amazed them. 'It is not a canoe at all: it is a town!' The sailors' deck they named 'the kotta'; and then, as a climax to their description of this great ark, added, 'And what sort of a town is it that you must climb up into with a rope?'"

"On the 15th there was a procession and service of the mass in the Cathedral; and wishing to show my men a place of worship, I took them to the church. There is an impression on some minds that a gorgeous ritual is better calculated to inspire devotional feelings than the simple forms of the Protestant worship. But here the frequent genuflections, changing of positions, burning of incense, with the priests' back turned to the people, the laughing, talking and manifest irreverence of the singers, with firing of guns, &c., did not convey to the minds of my men the idea of adoration. I overheard them, in talking to each other, remark that they had seen the white men 'charming their demons'; a phrase identical with one they had used when seeing the Balonda beating drums before their idols."

In a subsequent journey, when exploring the route of the river Zambesi, his approach to the Portuguese settlement at Tete was announced by the natives. They had seen him taking the altitude of the sun with the sextant and an artificial horizon; and they told the Portuguese authorities, that "The Son of God had come," and that he was "able to take the sun down from the heavens and place it under his arm."

For "The Friend."

The Society of Friends defenders of Civil Liberty.

The more fully we understand the prevailing spirit of the times in which the Society of Friends arose, the conditions of social and political life that then existed, and especially the contracted limits of civil and religious liberty; the more highly do we value the bold and conscientious stand in defence of the rights of man taken by those undaunted advocates of the truth, our primitive Friends. Under the Heavenly power with which they were clothed, they were as a brazen wall against all oppression; and by their anyielding, yet meek and inoffensive firmness in suffering, they finally overcame all opposition and largely contributed to secure to the English race the degree of freedom which they enjoy, and which we believe exceeds that possessed by any other of the nations of Europe.

In examining the life of Robert Pike, of the early Massachusetts Puritans, and contemporary with the Friends who were put to death by the intolerant government, there we have been interested in the light which the work throws on this subject. The author of the book says, in speaking of those times: "The civil authority was offensively dictatorial in its commands. No individual outside of the ruling power had any rights which government could not meddle." "What we now call the rights of man were not only undefined and unrecognized, but almost unknown." "The prerogative character of even Massachusetts semi-popular government admits of no question; and to face its hostility was an act of temerity in which few engaged, and from which very few of those who did undertake it, emerged unscathed." "It was a period of history, both at home and abroad when the average citizen or subject could secure immunity only by a discreet, quiet and complete obedience." "The liberty of speech and the liberty of criticism and opposition were the precise things that were denied. The man who contended for either had to do it in the spirit of a martyr, and risk a martyr's doom."

In illustration of this despotic spirit, the book relates the proceedings against this Robert Pike, ending in a fine and disfranchisement because he had condemned a law passed by the General Court, which prohibited anyone from preaching to the people on a First-day of the week who was not a regularly ordained minister of the Puritan Church. When a subsequent petition was presented to them for a repeal of this sentence, they considered this an unwarrantable and insulting liberty, and appointed commissioners to deal with the petitioners. Robert Pike paid his fine, and in a few years had his right of citizenship restored. There is no doubt his condemnation of an unrighteous law was useful in opening the eyes of others; though in paying the fine he did not fully carry out his testimony, as would have been done by a consistent Friend. These proceedings occurred about the year 1653.

The treatment of the early members of our Society clearly evinces the despotic spirit of the magistrates above referred to, and shows how little regard was paid even to the forms of law, when the will of the officer was contravened by the sufferers. In 1655, near the same time that Robert Pike had his controversy with the Massachusetts magistrates, some Friends were brought into suffering at Barbery in Oxfordshire, England, for their religious principles; and they promptly published to the world the history of their case, in a small pamphlet or book, entitled, "The Saints' testimony finishing through Sufferings," printed by Giles Calvert, at the Black-Spread-Edge in 1655. A copy of this is now before us. It clearly exposes the illegal and unjust treatment on false accusations meted out to Anne Audland and others, compares the proceedings with Scripture records to show their inherent unrighteousness, and lays the burthen of their iniquities plainly on the heads of the transgressors; sparing none for their station or influence, but faithfully warning them to repent, lest the righteous judgments of the Lord should overtake them, and appealing to their own conscience as evidence of the truth of the statements made, and of the wickedness of their course. The old volume of pamphlets in which this is contained, has within its binding more than thirty documents, nearly all of which refer to similar cases, and which were printed at different times between the years 1653 and 1656. And this collection is a very small part of the fruits of that unwearyed perseverance in spreading the truth among the people by pen and press, as well as by word of mouth, which made our early Friends such efficient instruments not only in promoting vital religion in the world, but also in educating the communities in which they lived up to a fuller appreciation of the rights of man.

It is not surprising that such plain dealing should offend despotic magistrates, who were unused to having their acts openly criticised, and who expected humble submission to their dictates, whether right or wrong. And we can readily believe that they were not pleased when told, that they had violated the law of God as to respect of persons, and reminded that He who judgeth righteously would give unto every one of them according to their deeds, because they fined and committed a Friend to prison for coming into their presence with his hat on, while at the same time they invited two priests who were present to retain those coverings. Anne Audland in her "Warning" to the people of Barbery who were found "falsely accusing and imprisoning the servants of the Lord Jesus," thus pleads with "magistrates, people and priest:—" "If they shall depart into utter darkness that visit not Christ's little ones in prison, how shall those escape that cast them into prison? The burthensome stone which you have taken upon you, will grind you to pieces; the light in all your consciences do I speak, which will witness for God, and against all unrighteousness, in the day of the Lord, when his righteous judgments shall be revealed from Heaven against all unrighteousness of men."

As Richard Farnsworth was passing quietly along the street of the aforesaid Barbery, on his way to a meeting, a justice of the peace met him, and ordered him to be sent to jail, without just provocation or the breach of any law. When brought up to be examined the next day, no charge could be found against him, and he was told he might go out of the town if he would pay the sergeant his fees. Richard refused to do so, and was remanded to prison, "because," as the account states, "he could not be a friend to deceit, and acknowledge a false imprisonment and pay fees for the same, being taken out of the highway or street, as he was passing quietly on, and sent to prison; and to color over their deceit withal, they have added several lies in a mittimus, and here is kept in prison for standing faithful to the Lord, and cannot have any fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."

Such faithful witnesses, whom no fear of man could intimidate, and no suffering prevent from upholding the standard of truth and righteousness which they believed the Lord himself had given them to bear aloft, were exceedingly annoying to their persecutors; for they hesitated not to rebuke their evil deeds, and to throw the burthen of the responsibility on those who were violating the laws of God or man; and that, both in private and in public; to the offenders themselves, and to the world at large.

The spirit in which their testimony was borne is shown in another of the pamphlets bound up in the old volume above referred to, which narrates the persecutions in the county of Somerset—and which, the title of it says, is "Published for the Truth's defence and vindication, by a follower of the Lamb in the war against the Beast and false Prophet." The preface to this narrative states:

"Herein shall we have peace, that with faithfulness, and in singleness of heart in the sight of the Lord God, we have cleared our consciences and stood as witnesses for the living eternal Truth, in bearing our testimony against the cruelty and injustice acted by the men of this generation: and shall record it for generations to come, that they may see it and beware, and fear before the Lord; that to them it may be a warning and matter of caution, lest they also should stretch forth their hands against the Lord, his truth and faithful servants; and so bring wrath and vengeance, misery and destruction upon their heads forever. And as touching those with whom at present we have to do; (the Lord is our witness), the eternal welfare of their souls is by us desired; and their repentance and return to the Lord, by us longed for: that none of those things might come upon them, which are spoken concerning God's enemies; though from them such measure we receive, and are of them reproached and evil-spoken of, who are of the world in scorn called Quakers."

Bad Business.—It is a great mistake to expect those to be honest, who are engaged in a dishonest business. It is a common thing for the government to have trouble with distillers. Where the sale of liquors is licensed by law, probably one half that is sold, never pays the license.

The lottery is one species of gambling. It is sometimes resorted to by the church to replenish its funds. But it is bad in itself, and cannot be sanctified by any uses to which the gains made by it, may be devoted. It is dishonest, and it promotes dishonesty.

Recently the State of Kentucky had a lottery for the benefit of the library at Louisville. In giving an account of the management of this lottery, the Louisville Commercial showed that the gross sum received for tickets for the five drawings was $6,250,000. The total awarded for prizes was $3,142,500, and the library was given $424,396.32. The large remainder, of $2,683,103.68, seems to have clung to the hands of the conductors of the lottery.

Doubtless those chosen to manage this affair were gentlemen of high standing, who enjoyed, to a large degree, the confidence of the community. Yet it seems that for every dollar they raised for the library, they retained five for their services!

The church had better give no more lessons in the lottery business. Its pupils are too apt. The business is too congenial to human depravity to receive any encouragement. It should be put down by law even in the churches themselves, if they have not enough of the fear of God to abandon a business so utterly demoralizing.

"And not rather (as we be slanderously reported, and as some affirm that we say,) Let us do evil, that good may come? whose damnation is just." Rom. iii. 8.—The Earnest Christian.

Woman under Moslemism.

Some time since the National Baptist of this city contained a report of a lecture on this subject, delivered by H. H. Jessup, who for many years had resided at Beirut, Syria, and had abundant opportunities of learning the characteristics of social life in that country. The following article is condensed from the report:—

"When the disciples returned to the well at Sychar, they wondered that the Lord talked thus with a woman. The traditions of the Rabbis forbade a teacher of the law to explain the law to a female. And to-day, the whole Eastern world, both Mohammedan and heathen, wonders that Christianity cares for women.

"Moslemism prevails more or less, from Sierra Leone, in Africa, to Peking, China, over 120 degrees of longitude. It is the religion of 150 million people. It is safe to say that the position which it gives to woman, is higher and better than the best form of Mohammedanism. We can estimate a religion by the position which it gives to woman. I go into a Moslem house, no matter how high the station of the family, and I do not see a single woman. I go into the humblest and poorest Christian home, with perhaps not a pane of glass in the windows, and I see the women; and they all wear an aspect of dignity and self-respect.

"Among the Mohammedans, when a death occurs, no matter if it is at midnight, the women throw open the windows, and utter the most piercing cries. This calls in the neighboring women; the corpse is laid on the floor, and all the women stand about it wailing, tearing their hair and beating their breasts, until the body is buried. There is a similar wailing when a female child is born. The neighbors condole with the mother over her calamity. In Mount Lebanon they have a saying that, 'When a girl has been born, the stone threshold sheds tears for forty days.' Some little girls were playing and talking. One of them was telling how little something was: 'It was as small, yes it was as small as the rejoicing in my father's house when I was born.'

"There was a young man at Tripoli, north of Beirut, who became a Christian. He was married, and had a little girl. The grandmother was so angry, that she would not kiss the child for six months. This girl grew up, and married a young man who afterward became the United States Consular Agent. He had an American flag which he used to run up to the top of the liberty pole on the Fourth of July, and Washington's Birthday, and the birthday of the Sultan. When he had a daughter born, he ran up the flag. The Pasha sent his secretary to ask what event had happened in the United States. He replied, 'Nothing in the United States; but I have a daughter.' The secretary said, 'Pray give me some other reason. I cannot, carry back that answer to the Pasha. He will be angry.' But the Consular Agent would not give him any other reason. The secretary went back to the Pasha, and stood in the door, with one foot outside, and as soon as he had given the reply, he shut the door and ran. The Pasha was enraged to think that he had sent his secretary to ask after so contemptible an event as the birth of a daughter.

"It is the custom when a son is born, to send out to all the friends little cups of a confection made of rice and sugar. When my daughter was born, I told the cook to prepare these, and to carry them around. He said, 'It is not the custom.' I said, 'I know it.' When he carried them around, the persons to whom they were sent said, 'Hast thou a son born?' When he replied, 'No; it is a daughter,' they said in surprise, 'He does not understand the customs of the country.' And the cook said, 'Yes, he does; but he does this because he is a Christian.'

"In the chapel at Beirut, we were at first obliged to have a curtain drawn across, separating the men from the women; otherwise the Mohammedans would not suffer their wives to come.

"Divorce is very easy. If an Arab says to his wife, 'Go to your father,' she is divorced. If he changes his mind, and wants to take her back, she must first be married to some other man.

"A man in a moment of anger said to his wife, 'Go to your father.' The next day he regretted his temper, and went to the father, desiring that she should return. But the father said, 'You know the law.' So the man went to a friend of his, and said, 'I want you to marry this woman, so that when I can marry her again.' It was done; after the ceremony, the new husband lifted her veil, and looked on her face, and said, 'I guess I will keep her.' 'But,' said the old husband, 'you know that the understanding was that I was to have her.' It was of no use; and at last the former husband had to pay quite a sum to have her again."

ONLY.

Only a seed—but it changed to fall
In a little cleft of a city wall,
And taking root, grew bravely up,
Till a tiny blossom crowned its top.

Only a flower—but it chanced that day
That a burdened heart passed by that way;
And the message that through the flower was sent,
Brought the weary soul a sweet content.

For it spake of the lilies so wondrously clad;
And the heart that was tired grew strangely glad
At the thought of a tender care over all,
That noted even a sparrow's fall.

Only a thought—but the work it wrought
Could never by tongue or pen be taught;
For it ran through a life, like a thread of gold;
And the life bore fruit—a hundred fold.

Only a word—but 'twas spoken in love,
With a whispered prayer to the Lord above,
And the angels in heaven rejoiced once more;
For a newborn soul "entered in by the door."

ABIDE WITH US.

The tender light is fading here,
We pause to linger still,
And through the dim and saddened air,
We feel the evening chill.

Long hast thou journeyed with us, Lord,
Ere we thy face did know;
Oh, still thy fellowship afford,
While dark the shadows grow!

For passed is many a beauteous field,
Beside our morning road;
And many a fount to us is sealed
That once so freshly flowed.

The splendor of the noontide lies
On other paths than on ours;
The dews that have yon fragrant skies
Will not revive our flowers.

It is not now as in the glow
Of life's impassioned heat,
When to the heart there seemed to flow
All that of earth was sweet.

Something has faded—something died—
Without us and within;
We more than ever, need a guide,
Blinded and weak with sin.

The weight is heavy that we bear,
Our strength more feeble grows;
We wear with toil, and pain, and care,
We long for sweet repose.

Stay with us, gracious Saviour, stay,
While friends and hopes depart;
Fainting, on thee we wish to lay
The burden of our heart.

Abide with us, dear Lord; remain;
Our Life, our Truth, our Way;
So shall our loss be turned to gain—
Night dawn to endless day.

IN THE SUNSHINE.

On yesterday, my rank and name
My neighbor's garden lay beneath the rain;
The flowers, storm-beaten, hid their bloom from sight,
And not a rose-bud showed its tender stain,
Nor in the sky was one faint streak of blue
To charm my wistful eyes the long day through.

Sadly I heard the sighing wind complain,
The melancholy drops fall from the eaves;
And sick at heart, with an unuttered pain,
I looked out on the world of wet green leaves,
Longing for night to blot it all away,
And cheat me with sweet dreams of a new day.

But when night came I paced the lonesome room
Still, with impatient murmurs on my tongue;
"O heart," I cried, "why should it be thy doom
With such a sorrowful sorrow to be wrung,
And wherefore is it that for me and mine
Nor roses bloom, nor happy sunbeams shine?"

"Sweet may the dawning of a new day be;
But what delight is it for one who goes
In skaded paths and sun-dewless, to see
His neighbor's garden blossom like a rose?
No garden-ground is mine; no joy begun
Wakes to fulfillment with the rising sun."

To-day, as from my window's height I lean,
To see my neighbor's roses far below,
I wonder how such envious thoughts and mean
Thoughts (that shame me now) found ever room to grow—
So light of heart, so wholly glad an I
At the mere sight of God's fair earth and sky!

Only the same world it was yesterday—
The care, the grief, the burden, all remain;
Yet their dull discontent has slipped away,
The sun is shining where before was rain!
And in its wholesome light my heart's unrest
Turns into faith that all is for the best.

Since God hath willed that each shall sojourn at ease,
And others shall know hardness, this is sure:
The lot that fits each nature He foresees,
And wherefore murmur when we must endure?
Some day his loving wisdom will be plain
As the sweet sunshine following after rain.

Selected.

The following sweet and touching line were written by St. George Tucker, of Virginia, on being solicited to know why he had ceased to court the poetic muse.

Days of my youth, ye have glided away;
Hairs of my youth, ye are frosted and gray;
Eyes of my youth, your keen sight is no more;
Checks of my youth, are all furrowed and sore;
Strength of my youth, all your vigor is gone;
Thoughts of my youth, your gay visions are flown,
Days of my youth, I wish not your recall;
Hairs of my youth, I'm content you should fall;
Eyes of my youth, ye much evil have seen;
Checks of my youth, bathed in tears have ye been;
Thoughts of my youth, ye have led me astray;
Strength of my youth, why lament thy decay,
Days of my age, ye will shortly be past;
Pains of my age, yet awhile ye can last;
Joys of my age, in true wisdom delight;
Eyes of my age, be religion your light;
Thoughts of my age, dread ye not the cold sod;
Hopes of my age, be ye fixed on your God.

Waiting Place of the Jews.—Dr. Schaff relates that the Jews at Jerusalem assemble on every Sixth day afternoon, and on festival days, at the foundation wall of the temple, to bewail the downfall of the holy city. He says "I saw on Good Friday, a large number, old and young, male and female, venerable rabbi with patriarchal beards and young men kissing the stone wall and watering it with their tears. They repeat from their well-worn Hebrew Bibles and prayer books, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and suitable Psalms (the 76th and 79th). 'O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps. * * * We are become a reproach to our neighbors, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us.'"

The keynote of all these laments and prayers was struck by Jeremiah, the most pathetic and tender-hearted of prophets, in the Lamentations—that funeral dirge of Jerusalem. This elegy, written with sighs and tears, is read with loud weeping in all the synagogues of the Jews, and especially at Jerusalem, every year, on the ninth of the month of Ab, [7th month]. It keeps alive the memory of their deepest humiliation and guilt, and the hope of final deliverance.

The Inconvenience of too Minute Regulations.—Howitt, who lived many years in the Duchy of Baden-Baden, gives an amusing account of the inconvenience he was put to by the government system of conveying parcels. He says: "A parcel must be wrapped in a certain way. It must have so many seals upon it. Its contents and value must be written outside. If of one weight it must go by one conveyance; if of another, by a second; if of another, by a third. It must, under certain circumstances, be wrapped in an oil cloth. Failing any of these formalities it cannot go. It is returned, or sent from one office to another till more time is consumed than is necessary to take it to its destination."

A title-deed was sent to him from England to be executed. He executed it in proper time, returned it the same day in what he thought was the most expeditious and legal manner. Two months afterwards a letter was received complaining that the deed had not arrived; it had been lying all the time in an office belonging to the Rhine company, which dared not forward it because it belonged to the packet-post department, and could not be transferred from the one to the other without being returned to the original ender, and who he was the officials did not know.—Leisure Hour.

Our Defender.

A Christian has the right to claim the protection of God wherever he goes in the discharge of duty. It is not necessary, even on the frontier, that he should carry a revolver or join the Masons. While the Lord God is his shield, he is safe.

Jas. Kennedy, now of San Jose, California, crossed the plains in 1852 with his family to California. This was but a few years after the discovery of gold, and the country was full of desperadoes. For a while he worked at the mines. Then he went into the business of transporting on pack mules, supplies to the miners, he crossed the Sierras twenty-three times. Afterwards, for twenty years, he kept the toll gate at Los Gatos. During all this time he never went armed. When he kept the gate, it was well known that he had money in the house—sometimes over a thousand dollars. There was no bank near, and he made his report to the treasurer only once a month. Yet, during all this time, he was never once molested. Other buildings near him were robbed, but no one attempted to rob him. He committed himself and all his interests to the keeping of the Lord, and he was graciously preserved. Once, when the charter of the road was renewed, the people denied the legality of the act. A meeting was called to vote down the gate. They ordered him out of the house that they might burn it. But he very decidedly refused to go at their bidding. He was not molested.

Nor was his immunity due to his taking what is commonly termed a prudent popular course. He was an outspoken, aggressive abolitionist, when the most of those around him were intensely pro-slavery, and the excitement on the slavery question ran high. He was an ardent temperance man among those whose chief drink was whiskey. He refused to carry liquor, when in the transportation business, though the merchants, of whom he bought his goods, assured him that unless he did he could not make his living. At the end of the season they were greatly astonished to learn that he had cleared two hundred dollars a month when, as they said, every other man on the road had lost that year by the business.

Whenever he stopped in camp, he was always preaching his doctrines. Once he was challenged by the keeper of the station, an ex-college professor, to discuss the slavery question before his guests in an orderly manner. He accepted the challenge, and before eleven o'clock at night, so completely silenced his antagonist that, in dismay, he fled from the room and went to bed.

Many of the stockholders of the road for which he collected tolls, were fire-eaters from the South. With these he would sometimes have sharp controversies, and they would get very angry. But as they had full confidence in his honesty, they would not dismiss him.

Have faith in God. He is able to take care of you, both soul and body. Be kind to all; do your duty faithfully, and then commit the keeping of all your interests to Him who never slumbers nor sleeps, and who has all power in heaven and in earth.—The Earnest Christian.

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

1859. 12th mo. 25th.—First-day. Sat a comfortable meeting at Tunesassa with the family and the 17 Indian children who were there boarding and attending school. We visited a number of Indian families up the river to satisfaction. Truly without Divine help we can do no good thing. What an unmerited mercy it is to be accounted worthy to labor in a good cause and to be favored with ability to do all our Divine Master is pleased to require of us. Heard this evening of the death of old Governor Blacksnake.

27th. Went down to the Complanter Reservation. Met with Charles and William O'Ball and others in Charles' new house; went to Marsh Pierce's and got dinner, after which I had a very satisfactory opportunity with Marsh and (his) wife.

28th. Went over the river to Owen Blacksnake's, where the corpse of his father was. The day was cold, and the crossing of the river difficult, on which account Caroline Blackburn did not cross, but took the sleigh and two horses home. When I went into Owen's I think they were all sitting in silence. After a time the men all made speeches, one after another. Thomas Big Jacob and his son Isaac were affected to tears, and it was with difficulty they could speak. After the men got through speaking the old man's two daughters went and stood by the corpse, appeared to be looking at the face, cried and talked to him as if the spirit was there, in or about the body. It seems to have been thought by the old Indians that it took the spirit ten days to go from this world to the world of spirits. From the way the daughters spoke I supposed they thought their father held them. After they had done, an aged Indian woman and Owen's wife went up and talked to the corpse, and then the women commenced a mournful cry and continued it for a few minutes. The coffin was then closed, placed upon a sled, and taken to the council house near Cold Spring, where the little company was met by a large number of Indians from almost all parts of the reservation, where a meeting was held. When I first went into the council house they were sitting quiet; after a little time the lid of the coffin was taken off, I suppose to give the Indians an opportunity of seeing the corpse. John Ray made a speech and I left; did not go to the grave to see the body buried. I was told Isaac Halftown spoke after John Ray, and I suppose gave a short history of the old man's life. The body was interred near the river, about a mile above the council house.

29th. 5th of the week. Sat meeting with the family and children at Tunesassa and afterwards met about 50 Indians at the school house near Cold Spring. The opportunity was a comfortable one to me; one that I desire not soon to forget. Truly it is the Great Head of the Church that can qualify for every good work. May the praise be to Him who is forever worthy.

30th. Went up the river. Stopped at Jacob Tanty's, saw Julia Jimmerson, a child that I have felt much interested in; had not much opportunity of talking with her. We heard there was to be a shooting match at Great Valley that afternoon, which made the thoughts of staying at one of the public houses feel unpleasant on account of so many drinking rough people collecting there. Went up to Horse Shoe; stopped in the school taught by A. J.'s wife; it was sorrowful to hear A. had left her; one of the cases showing the unhappy effect of going out of Society in marriage, and letting his mind too much out after the things of the world. Called at George Titus'; had quite a pleasant time with him; he promised to assist in getting the Indians together that I might have an opportunity of talking with them. Met Isaac Halftown, who kindly invited me home to see his wife, saying she would not be well enough to come out to meet me. He also promised to assist in giving information to meet that evening. Went to Isaac's and was comforted in being with them. Met the Indians that evening, but the interpreter not getting there, they agreed to meet me next morning.

31st. Met the Indians at their council house; there was a good many met and I had a pretty satisfactory opportunity with them, which was a great comfort to me. There is cause for thankfulness and encouragement. The day was very cold; the river became filled up with ice so we could not cross the ferry; stayed at a public house near the edge of the reservation; the company about such places is unpleasant.

1860. 1st mo. 1st. Crossed over on the ice. Being the First-day of the week was anxious to get home to meeting. I think the meeting was a comfortable one. In the afternoon my mind was turned towards home, though I felt as if I wished to see a few more Indians, some of whom had been drinking immoderately. After a time my mind felt more easy on the subject. The next morning I thought I felt liberty to leave. Abel and Caroline (Blackburn) took me to Randolph; there I took stage for Little Valley, where I took the night express for home.

(At home.) 2d mo. I have been comforted of late at seasons with an evidence of Divine regard that I feel unworthy of; at other times much weakness.

2d mo. 7th. To-day was our Select Preparative Meeting. The answering of the Queries seemed to cause some to feel the responsibility that rested on persons in the station of ministers and elders. The meeting to me was a comfortable one.

8th. Our Monthly Meeting I trust was in measure owned by the Great Head. An unmerited favor.

16th. Our Select Quarterly Meeting. I was truly comforted in it. It is cause for thankfulness and encouragement. Oh! that I may stir me up to more faithfulness, and deeply humble me, which I feel to be much wanting.

17th. To-day was our (Cain) Quarterly Meeting, which I think was as large as usual, and I trust a precious solemn covering was felt over the meeting. When the presence of the Great Head of the Church is felt, there is light, life and strength, and He can minister to all our wants.

23d. I feel sensible of many shortcomings, unfaithfulness and unworthiness, notwithstanding through unmerited mercy I have at seasons been favored with comfortable feelings, and I trust with a degree of living faith in the Great and Holy Head. All power is his. May He do with us and for us as He sees meet, for He is worthy; life and death are in his hands. He can heal all the diseases of both mind and body, and we should be resigned to his will and trust our all with Him. Had quite a comfortable meeting to-day; feel it a great privilege to attend all our meetings for worship and discipline. May I be grateful and try to make a good use of it.

Life Begun.

The Episcopal Recorder relates an anecdote of a moral, industrious young man, who fulfilled his duties creditably, but had one peculiarity that cropped up on all occasions—a thoroughly discontented spirit. Nothing was right; no weather pleased him; no advantages gratified him; no kindness satisfied him; there was always something wanting. He and his wife were regular in their attendance at meeting, but they had no concern about their souls; and he drolly coldly, but civilly, assented to any word dropped upon the subject of religion. At the end of five years he left his situation for another of the same kind, with the addition of a little gardening, in which he took some pride. Occasionally some pretty flowers of his rearing were left at the house of his former master, and inquiries made of a kindly nature. Thus passed some years, till one day he called to leave a message. Having giving it, and about to go, a word was spoken as to the importance of eternal things over the things of time. The man's countenance lighted up at once, and putting his hat on the floor, he said, "Oh, I did so long to tell you what the Lord in sovereign mercy has done for my soul!" Seeing the surprise with which this news was received, he said, "Ah! you may well wonder, as I do, at myself. Just to think of the Lord taking me in hand, and bringing me to ~~me~~—indeed, at times I can't believe it myself." Asking for a few particulars as to this great change, the man, with much simplicity, said, "No one had any hand in it at all but the Lord. He began it and ended it. You know what a discontented creature I was. Nothing pleased me—everything was wrong. I never thought God or man did anything right, for I was always of that discontented turn. God took hold of that sin of mine, and showed me my wickedness. It condemned me day and night. For a year I had no hope, no peace; but, in the midst of all my blindness, the Lord visited me, and cleared off all my sin, and brought in such a heavenly peace that I can never describe. Oh, how different everything looked! I assure you," said the man, with energy and glistening eyes, "from that time everything has changed. The fields, and the garden, and my work, and the weather, seem quite different. I know the change is here—in my soul—and I feel it is the Lord's work, and I know to what I owe it." "And to what do you owe it?" was asked. "Why, to sovereign grace," said the man. "No thanks to me, I'm sure. It was the Lord's work, from first to last, and He well deserves the praise."

Working Tools of Great Men.—It is not tools that make the workman, but the trained skill and perseverance of the man himself. Indeed, it is proverbial that the bad workman never had a good tool. Some one asked Ogilvie by what wonderful process he mixed Ogilvie's colors? "I mix them with my brains, sir," was his reply. It is the same with every workman who would excel. Ferguson made marvellous things, such as his wooden clock, that accurately measured the hours—by means of a common penknife, a tool in everybody's hand, but then everybody is not a Ferguson's. A pan of water and two thermometers were the tools by which Dr. Black discovered latent heat; and a prism, a lens, and a sheet of pasteboard enabled Newton to unfold the composition of light and the origin of color. An eminent foreign savant once called upon Dr. Wollaston, and requested to be shown over his laboratories, in which science had been enriched by so many important discoveries, when the doctor took him into a little study, and pointing to an old tea tray on the table, containing a few watch glasses, test papers, a small balance, and a blow pipe, said, "There is all the laboratory I have." Stothard learnt the art of combining colors by closely studying butterflies wings. He would often say that no one knew what he owed to these tiny insects. A burnt stick and a barn-door served Wilkie in lieu of pencil and canvas. Berriek first practised drawing on the cottage wall of his native village, which he covered with his sketches in chalk. Benjamin West made his first brushes out of the cat's tail. Franklin first robbed the thunder cloud of its lightning, by means of a kite made with two cross sticks and a silk handkerchief. Watt made his first model of the condensing steam engine out of an anatomist's old syringe. Gifford worked his first problem in mathematics, when a cobbler's apprentice, upon small scraps of leather, which he beat smooth for the purpose; whilst Rittenhouse, the astronomer, first calculated eclipses on his plough-handle.

For "The Friend."

Free-men's Schools

In accordance with the instructions given to the Board of Managers at the annual meeting of Friends' Freedmen's Association of Philadelphia, held during our last Yearly Meeting week, the same number of schools have been reopened this year as last, and the same number of teachers are in the field, under the efficient direction of our tried Superintendent, Alfred H. Jones. Most of the schools opened on the 27th of last month, and the reports thus far have been most encouraging; the teachers are welcomed everywhere by both white and colored, and there is the same eager thirst for knowledge.

The Treasury of the Association, however, is empty, and the efficiency of the work greatly depends upon the promptness with which means are furnished to the Board. We would ask those who have so liberally contributed heretofore to this interesting concern, as well as those who have not, to consider whether there is not still a large debt due and unpaid to the Freedmen, and whether it can now be discharged in any more effective way than by furnishing to their children a good education—thus enabling them to care for themselves, and to fill the important duties which have been thrust upon them.

Contributions as heretofore should be sent to Richard Cadbury, Treasurer, at the Provident Life and Trust Company, Chestnut St., above Fourth.

ELLINGTON P. MORRIS,

President of the Board.

Awakening of Judson the Missionary.—His biographer relates a striking incident in the career of the American missionary, Adoniram

Judson. He was a minister's son, and, verily and very ambitious, was early sent to college. In the class above was a young man of the name of E—, brilliant, witty, and popular, but a determined deist. Between him and the minister's son there sprang up close intimacy, which ended in the latter gradually renouncing all his early beliefs, and it became as great a sceptic as his friend. It was only twenty years of age, and it was terrible distress and consternation which filled the home circle, when, during the recess, it was announced that he was no longer a believer in Christianity. He steeled himself against all softer influences, and with his mind made up to enjoy life and see the world, he first joined a company of players at New York, and then set out on a solitary tour. Or might he stopped at a country inn. Lightin him to his room, the landlord mentioned that he had been obliged to place him next door to a young man who was exceedingly ill, in all probability dying, but he hoped it would occasion him no uneasiness. Judson assured him that, beyond pity for the poor sick man, he should have no feeling whatever. Still it might prove a restless one. Sounds came from the sick-chamber—sometimes the movements of the watchers, sometimes the groans of the sufferer—and the young traveler could not sleep. So close at hand, with but a thin partition between us, he thought, there is immortal spirit about to pass into eternity and is he prepared? And then he thought "For shame of my shallow philosophy! Why would E—, so intellectual and clear-headed, think of this boyish weakness?" And he tried to sleep, but still the picture of the dying man rose up to his imagination. E— was a "young man," and the young student felt compelled to place himself on his neighbor's dying bed, and he could not help fancying what, in such circumstances, would be his thoughts. But the morning dawned, and when he came down-stairs he inquired of the landlord how his fellow-lodger had passed the night. "He is dead," was the answer. "Dead?" "Yes; he is gone, poor fellow! The doctor said he would probably not survive the night." "Do you know who he was?" "Oh, yes; was a young man from Providence College—a very fine fellow; his name was E—." Judson was completely stunned. Hours passed before he could quit the house; but when he did resume his journey, the words "Dead! lost! lost!" were continually ringing in his ears. There was no need for argument. God had spoken, and from the presence of the living God the chimeras of unbelief and the pleasures of sin alike fled away. The religion of the Bible he knew to be true; and turn in his horse's head towards Plymouth, he rode slowly homewards, his plans of enjoyment shattered, and ready to commence that rough and uninviting path which, through the death prison at Ava and its rehearsal of martyrdom conducted to the grave at Maulmain.—Huntton.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Candle-nut Tree of the South Pacific.—One of the most graceful trees of the island: When ripe the fruit is of an olive color. Each cell is one seed, encased in a very hard shell. These kernels, when ripe, furnish the islanders with light—indeed the only light of the past in the Hervey group. From time immemorial it has been woman's work to go to the forest to collect the ripe fallen fruits. The thick outer covering is removed by hand on the spot; at home the nuts are half cooked, or steamed in an oven; when taken out, the lightest tap of a stone cracks the hard shell, and the kernel comes out entire. It is almost impossible to get the kernel out uninjured without the application of heat. The mid-rib of a cocoa-nut from India is used to skewer some 25 or 30 of these kernels; two or three skewers tied together with a strip of hibiscus-bark, give a capital light. It is woman's work to hold the torch and carefully tend it by knocking off, from time to time, the burnt black kernel. The smell of this torch is most disagreeable.

The native name of the tree and fruit—buti—means "sown-sown," in allusion to the piercing of the baked kernel with the mid-rib of the cocoa-nut from for a torch.

From the heavy fibres of the burning kernel is collected in a broken calabash held over the torch, the fine lamplblack used in tattooing.

The oil nut was often used as food in sections of extreme scarcity. This unwholesome diet invariably produces a black ring round the eyes.

Spending a week on Tanna, on the southern coast of New Guinea, in 1872, we had at first no evening light. I luckily, however, discovered two candle-nut trees laden with ripe nuts, which we ate once utilised. The savage Papuans, who previously had no idea of the value of this tree, were not slow in imitating our example.—W. W. Gill in Leisure Hour.

The Mongoose.—This is a small East Indian animal of a bold and carnivorous disposition, somewhat like the weasel in its habits, though larger and more stoutly built. It is a deadly enemy to the Cobra and other serpents which abound in its native land; and, from the following description of a combat with one of these dangerous snakes, it appears to be but little affected by the venom of its fangs:

The Mongoose approached the Cobra with caution, but devoid of any appearance of fear. The Cobra, with head erect and body vibrating, watched his opponent with evident signs of being aware of how deadly an enemy he had to contend with. The Mongoose was soon within easy striking distance of the snake, who, suddenly throwing back his head, struck at the Mongoose with tremendous force. The Mongoose, quick as thought, sprang back out of reach, uttering at the same time savage growls. Again the hooded reptile rose on the defensive, and the Mongoose, nothing daunted by the distended jaws and glaring eyes of his antagonist, approached so near to the snake that he was forced, not relishing such close proximity, to draw his head back considerably; this lessened his distance from the ground. The Mongoose at once seizing the favorable opportunity, sprang at the Cobra's head, and appeared to inflict as well as receive a wound. Again the combatants put themselves in a position to renew the encounter; again the snake struck at his wily opponent, and again the latter's agility saved him.

The fight had lasted some three-quarters of an hour, and both combatants seemed now to nerve themselves for the final encounter. The Cobra, changing his position of defence for that of attack, slowly advanced; with equal courage the Mongoose awaited the advance. As the Cobra was withdrawing his head after he had inflicted a bite, the Mongoose instantly retaliated by fixing his teeth in the head of the Cobra. This seemed to convince the Cobra that he was no match for his fierce and watchful antagonist; and now no longer exhibiting a head erect and defiant eye, he unfolded his coils and ignominiously slunk away. Instantly the Mongoose was on his retreating foe, and burying his teeth in his brain, at once ended the contest.

The Mongoose, now set to work to devour his victim, and in a few minutes had eaten the head and a few inches of the body, including the venom so dreaded by all.

After the Mongoose had satisfied his appetite we proceeded to examine with a pocket lens the wounds that he had received; and on washing away the blood from one of these places, the lens disclosed the broken fang of the Cobra deeply imbedded in the head of the Mongoose.

We have had the Mongoose confined ever since (now four days ago) and it is now as healthy and lively as ever.—Leisure Hour.

The chameleon has long been an object of peculiar interest to scientific investigators, because of their insensibility to surrounding objects. Dr. Bachelor, of Midnapore, India, has given in the Popular Science Monthly the result of numerous observations of a family of chameleons which he has been keeping. The chameleon does not change its color always to match its surroundings; but its power to hide itself by a change of form is no less wonderful. In a normal state of rest the color is a light pea green, at times blending with yellow.

The least excitement causes transverse stripes to appear running across the back and nearly encircling the body. These stripes occupy about the same amount of space as the groundwork, and are most susceptible to change of color. At first they become deeply green, and, if the excitement continues, gradually change to black. When placed upon a tree the groundwork becomes a deep green, and the stripes a deeper green or black, and so long as they remain on the tree the color does not change. Placed on the scarlet leaves of the dracena and among the red flowers of the acacia, no change was observed. But its changes of shape are still more remarkable.

Sometimes it assumes the form of a disconsolate mouse sitting in a corner; again, with back curved and tail erect, it resembles a crouching lion, which, no doubt, gave origin to its name, chamaeleon, or ground lion. By inflating its sides it flattens its belly, and viewed from below takes the form of an ovate leaf. The tail is the petiole, while a white serrated line, which runs from nose to tip of tail over the belly, becomes the leaf's mid-rib. Still again, throwing out the air, it draws in its sides, and at the same time expands itself upward and downward till it becomes as thin as a knife, and then viewed from the side it has the form of an ovate leaf which lacks a mid-rib, but the serrated line of the belly and the serrated back simulate the serrated edges of a leaf. When thus expanded it has also the power to sway itself so as to present an edge to an observer, thus greatly adding to its means of concealment. Half a dozen chameleons placed in a small tree, not three feet in diameter across the top, are very difficult to discover, although one is certain they must be there. Dr. Bachelor used to tie bits of scarlet wool to their loins to make them visible. Concealment like this is practised by a number of our common American caterpil-lars, but its higher organization makes the fact in the chameleon far more curious.—Chris. Advocate.

Rag-Bushes.—On the west coast of Ceylon, there was a vast collection of rag offerings suspended to the bushes through which the road was cut. It went by the name of "rag-fair," and there were miles of it. They were said to be offerings to the goddess "Kali," (who in the midst of them had a temple and well), to propitiate her and obtain her protection against the dangers of the way, especially those of wild beasts.—E. Lyard, in Nature.

Bags of Spiders' web.—A large spider of a species common all over Polynesia, and here also in New Caledonia, produces a very thick, strong web. When no work is going on in the plantations, the imported Pacific Islanders amuse themselves by wandering about the bush, armed with a frame work of cane in the shape of an elongated cone, affixed to a long stick. They twist round and round in the spiders' webs till it is coated, sometimes half an inch thick with the viscous fabric. They then unroll the fastenings and draw out the strip of cane, when the bag becomes like a long night-cap. I have one before me now, over a yard long, a foot across, and pretty thick, which does not weigh an ounce! It is yellow. The New Caledonian ones are usually grey.—E. Lyard, in Nature.

Habit of Cattle.—In the colony of Natal the cattle have an extraordinary liking for bones. They will stand for hours with a bone in the mouth, quietly munching, sucking, or perhaps more correctly speaking, leivigating the bone with the tongue. I have not heard that cattle have the same habit in other colonies of South Africa, but I have been told that cattle exhibit the same taste in some parts of South Australia.

In Natal there is, I believe, a scarcity of chalk and limestone in the geological formation. Will this fact account for the habit? Do the cattle lick bones in search of lime?—H. C. Donovan, in Nature.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 15, 1879.

The Yearly Meeting of North Carolina which was recently held, commenced on the 30th of 10th month, and closed on the 4th of 11th month. The Representative Meeting [Meeting for Sufferings], and the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight [formerly the Meeting of Ministers and Elders] assembled on the day previous to the general Yearly Meeting.

Among the subjects which claimed attention was the collection and preservation of the records and valuable papers of the Yearly Meeting and its branches. These are now scattered in different places. The small fire-proof safe at the Yearly Meeting-house at New Garden was not thought suitable to place them in; and the suggestion that a brick vault be built for their reception in was referred to a committee for examination.

The condition of the Meeting-houses was reported on by a committee, who stated that 16 new houses had been built since the war, and that four others ought to be rebuilt.

Reference was made to the Monthly Meeting libraries throughout the Yearly Meeting, which it was thought would be more used, if some additions of recently-written works were made to them. The report on this subject called forth remarks from several Friends, who were desirous that the older portions of our literature should not be neglected. It was thought they equalled or surpassed in interest, instruction and edification, anything of more modern date. It was recommended that our members generally should read Sewell's History and George Fox's Journal; and Barclay's Apology was specified as a work that had been peculiarly blessed in spreading a knowledge of our principles, and convincing others of their truth.

In the Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, the importance of the ministers being sound in the doctrines of the Society was brought to view; and it was suggested that it would contribute to this if they were required to sign a written statement of doctrines, to be drawn up for that purpose. This proposition was objected to; and the experience of the Church of England was related, where elaborate provisions of that kind entirely failed to secure uniformity of doctrine. It was thought the true remedy for the difficulty that was feared, was to be found in an increased care and religious weight in the meetings which confirmed the acknowledgment of the gift of the ministry. The proposition was set aside.

The frequent instances of capital punishment in the State of North Carolina which had recently occurred were brought to notice, and the subject was referred to a committee, that, if way opened for it, they might prepare an address to be sent to other religious organizations, calling their attention to this matter.

The answers to the Queries showed an unexpected deficiency in the attendance of meetings, and to which exceptions were made by five of the eight Quarterly Meetings. The neglect in attending meetings was dwelt upon by a Friend who had recently been visiting in some parts of the Yearly Meeting, and who gave a sad picture of the smallness of the week-day gatherings in places where no notice had been given of the coming of a stranger.

The annual inquiry as to the use and cultivation of tobacco, showed that a very large proportion of their members are implicated in these practices. Some very sensible remarks on the physical and other evils resulting therefrom were made by a physician who was present.

The statistical reports gave the whole number of members as 4859, being an increase of 299 during the year. Of these 1324 were between 6 and 21 years of age—a proportion of children far in advance of what we find in some of the richer sections of our country, and where other pursuits than agriculture are principally followed.

The committee to whom had been referred the request of Friends in East Tennessee for the establishment of a new Yearly Meeting there, reported against it. It was then proposed and agreed upon that the next Yearly Meeting of North Carolina should be held at Maryville, Tennessee, commencing on the 13th of 8th month. The distance between New Garden and Maryville by carriage road—crossing the mountains—is more than 300 miles. To go by rail, one must go as far north as Lynchburg in Virginia, which requires a much longer journey.

The meeting decided to appoint a standing committee of five persons, three men and two women, to join with other similar committees in forming an "American Missionary Board."

We defer to our next number some further notice of the proceedings of the Yearly Meeting.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The ship Lady Octavia, from the Delaware Breakwater for New York, collided with the steamer Champion, from New York for Charleston, striking the steamer amidships and sinking her in five minutes. Thirty-two lives are reported lost. The collision occurred thirty-five miles off the cape, at four o'clock on the morning of the 7th.

The annual report of the Appointment Division of the Post-office Department, shows the number of post-offices in operation in the United States on the 30th of Sept. no. last, was 40,855. There were 2676 offices established, and 1079 discontinued during the year. Out of the total number of postmasters, 1711 are appointees of the President; the remainder are filled by appointment of the Postmaster General. It is estimated there are now over 100,000 persons directly connected with postal service.

D. Fischer, of the Imperial German Post-office, has recently published an interesting pamphlet, giving the letter post of the world, for 1873, at 3,300,000,000 letters; and the numbers have increased daily. Postal cards were first brought into use in 1865, and are now employed in almost every country in the world. The parcel post is stated to be in the first stage of development. The number of telegraphic dispatches sent in 1877, amounted for the whole globe to nearly 130,000,000. More than one-third of all telegraphic dispatches are private, dealing with personal concerns.

The estimates for our Consular and Diplomatic Service for the fiscal year, will exceed by about 296,000 those of the current year. An appropriation of $2,750,000 will be asked for the taking of the census in 1880, and the purchase of the steamer Nayak for Liverpool on the 7th inst., with 6,513 bales of cotton—the largest clearance ever known from that port.

A house-to-house sanitary inspection has been commenced in Memphis, under the auspices of the National Board of Health.

Wine is entirely dry at the Big Bend in the Indian Territory. The corn crop in portions of the territory is very short, and much suffering is anticipated.

A delegation of Indians, representing a dissatisfied part of the Sacs and Foxes, and Iowa tribes, visited Washington the past week, to ask permission to remove their tribes to the Indian Territory. A large proportion of these tribes cultivate the soil, own houses and fruit trees. Secretary Schurz informed them it would be foolish for them to abandon their homes, and encouraged them to habits of industry, to send their children to school, and thus become prosperous as their neighbors.

The Choctaw nation, which numbers about 47,000 people, has forty schools and 20 academies. It also pays for the college education of twenty-two students in the States. The office of Superintendent of Education is elective, and has been held by the Choctaws for four years.

There were eight yellow fever deaths in Memphis last week, a majority being lingering cases.

The steamship Nureberg arrived at New Orleans on the 8th, from Bremen, with four hundred immigrants, including eighty English farmers. Most of the immigrants are for Texas.

The steamer Edouard Petrel, from New Bedford, was wrecked at sea on the 28th inst. There were 21 persons on board, 15 of whom were lost.

Four three-story brick buildings, in Kansas City, Mo., occupied by cracker and candy manufacturers, were blown down 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 7th inst. One hundred and seven persons, mostly boys and girls, were at work in the factory, but only five were killed.

The mortality in this city for the past week numbered 27; 14 of whom were adults. In New York, for the same period, there were 492 deaths.

Markets.—The following were quotations for the 8th. U. S. bonds, 1681, 1063; 5's, 1907; 12's, 1891, registered, 1063; do, coupon, 1063; 4's, 1907; 12's. Cotton continues in fair demand and prices were steady. Sugar, 11 1/2 cts. for H; 1 1/4 cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 cts. in barrels, and standard white at 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—There was rather more inquiry, but price were unchanged. Sales of 2100 barrels, including Minnesota extra, at $6.25 a $7.75; Penna. do, $6.30 a $6.75 western do, $6.50 a $7, and patent and other high grades, $7.25 a $8.25. Corn meal, $3.15.

Grain.—Wheat is in better demand and 2 cts. per bushel. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including rejected, at $1.33 a $1.34; red, at $1.30 a $1.37; mixed $1.35, and amber, $1.38 a $1.40. Rye sold at 86 1/2 cts. Corn is firmer, but very quiet. Sales of 15,000 bushels, including mixed and yellow, at 53 a 59 cts. Oats are steady. Sales of 7,000 bushels, including mixed, at 41 a 42 cts., and white at 43 a 45 cts. The receipts to-day were as follows: 400 barrels flour, 47,000 bushels wheat, 26,000 bushels corn, 500 bushels rye, 14,000 bushels oats, 6,000 bushels barley.

Pig Iron.—There is less doing and prices favor buyers. Sales are reported as follows: for Gra. Foundry; at $27 a $28 for No. 2, do; $27 a $28 for Gra. Forge, and $25 a $26 per ton for white and mottled Iron. Steel rails have advanced. Sales at $60 a $65 per ton. Iron rails have also advanced, with sales at $50 a $5 per ton. Nails are quoted at $3.60 per keg.

Hay and straw are reported as follows: ending 11th mo. 8th. Loads of hay, 225; loads of straw, 33. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, 90 cts., a $ per 100 pounds; mixed, 75 a 85 cts. per 100 pound. Straw, $1 a $1.20 per 100 pounds.

Wool.—Receipts were dull at the different yards at 21 a 45 cts. and a few choice at 45 cts. per lb. Sheep were rather lower—17,000 head sold at the different yards at 31 1/2 cts. Lambs were inactive. Sales at 41 a 6 cts. per lb.

Hogs.—Prices were a fraction lower—6,000 head arrived, at 41 a 42 cts. per head, and 20,000 head at 30 a 31 cts. Cows were dull—25,000 head arrived and sold at $30 a $55 per head.

FOREIGN.—The Irish Land League has adopted the address drafted at the meeting of the National Land League, calling on the farmers for practical co-operation with the Government in securing the soil of Ireland for those who cultivate it, with a view to the establishment of a peasant proprietary.

A tunnel under the river Mersey, between Liverpool and Birkenhead, has been projected. Its estimate cost is $2,500,000, and will be completed in 1880. The new Harbor Board, and the railways having termini at Birkenhead, are expected to co-operate in the enterprise.

The experiment of lighting the reading room of the British Museum by electricity began on the 20th of last month, and it is quite four months. There are four lamps of 5,000 candle power, and the brilliancy of the illumination is said to exceed that of day light.

The steamer Faraday arrived at Halifax on the 4th inst., having completed the laying of the new Frenc cable from Brest to St. Pierre. She is now laying the cable between the latter point and Cape Cod.

A dispatch from Brussels to the Pall Mall Gazette says: A great improvement has suddenly become manifest in the mental condition of Carlotta, widow of the ex-emperor Maximilian, of Mexico, and the complete restoration of her sanity is now considered possible.

Among the items of Danish progress, one of the more remarkable is the rapid increase of her shipping, particularly in the building of steamers. During the last four years, there were built 180 steamers, of 43,722 tonnage, 12,340 horse power, and 100,000 cubic feet of tonnage. Twelve hundred immigrants arrived at Toronto last month, a large majority of whom either settled in Ontario, or went to Manitoba. This is an increase of 69 over the same month last year.

MARRIED, at Friends' meeting-house, Germantown Philadelphia, on the 4th of 9th month, 1879, WILLIAM I. COOPER, of Camden, N. J., to PREEBE E. H. MENDEN HALL, of Germantown.

—, at Friends' Meeting, Parkersville, Fifth-day 10th mo. 1878, HENRY MARSHALL, of Chesco, Co., Pa., and JANE H., daughter of Lewis P. Harvey, of Delaware Co., Pa.

—, 10th mo. 9th, 1879, at New Garden Meeting of Friends, Winona, Ohio, ABRAHAM, son of Benjamin I. and Ellen Stratton (the former deceased), to HANNA B. WISSELA, wife of Alfred and Ann Brantingham, all of the aforesaid place.

DIED, on the 27th of 10th month, 1879, SARA COATES, in the 83rd year of her age, a member of the Western District Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia. "Blessed be the merciful and merciful heart."

For "The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

The compiler of these extracts has thought it might be a satisfaction to the reader to know, that the selections as published are not isolated passages occurring here and there only in the diary of our beloved friend. The entries are not of daily occurrence; some times weeks, months, and even years have passed without any record appearing to have been made and preserved. They seem to have been written only under a fresh feeling of gratitude or duty at the time. The whole journal appears to be an almost continued expression of grateful feelings for mercies received. That he had trials, and some of them of a very peculiar character, his intimate friends well know; but through Divine Grace, he was enabled to bear them with patience, doubtless, however, many times wearing the sackcloth underneath when he appeared not unto men to fast.

"1860. 3rd mo. 3rd. Called to see a sick friend—was comforted in the sick room.

3rd mo. 6th. Had sore throat and some pain in my head last night. These slight dispositions seem like warnings to us; may they be received as dispensations of mercy.

7th mo. 23d. It is humbling to look back on the past and be favored to see our many shortcomings. Without the Great Head of the Church is pleased to enlighten us and show us our true state and condition, I think we cannot know them,—we are in darkness and insensibility. I do esteem it a very great favor and an unmerited mercy that He condescends to show us our true state, with kind invitations to return unto Him and be saved. I hope my trust is in my Divine Master, not in my own wisdom and strength. I think I feel encouraged to look to the blessed Master for mercy, and have at seasons of late been truly comforted in feeling sweet love to Him. Oh the necessity of being continually on the watch, lest the world and its things get it, it became our best feelings, and draw us aside from a faithful discharge of religious duty.

8th mo. 24th. May the writing down of the many blessings and kind dealings of a merciful Providence to me, a poor unworthy sinner, be of some use to myself, if I should be spared, in days to come; they are worthy to be held in sweet remembrance with deep feelings of gratitude to the Giver of all our blessings. Our meetings have been very comfortable for several weeks (past). If we are only favored to feel the Great Head of the Church to be with us to minister to us, it is all we need desire. I believe the living members of his church militant desire to hear from Him, and from such as He calls and qualifies to minister.

10th mo. 1st. I think I have been favored with a pretty satisfactory evidence that it will be right for me to attend the ensuing Yearly Meeting of Ohio, in company with P. W. R. and A. C. I esteem it a favor to have a clear sense of what is required of us, beyond doubting. The comfortable feeling I have at seasons been favored with, is encouraging. Humility and watchfulness is very necessary in seasons of prosperity.

10th mo. 4th. * * * Left home to attend Ohio Yearly Meeting. Left Downingtown half past one P. M.; were detained on account of the engine being out of order; got another at Parkeburg, took supper at Altoona, after which sleep seemed to leave me; feeling pretty comfortable and there being some moonlight, I was interested in looking at the wild mountain scenery. The works of our Divine Master (are) very beautiful and interesting when the mind is prepared to enjoy them. We were mercifully favored to arrive at the B'arding School, where we had a comfortable home during the time of Yearly Meeting; the school being vacated.

10th mo. 6th. Attended the meeting of ministers and elders; thought it was a favored comfortable meeting; P. — had some service in the meeting. The Queries were all read and answered, then adjourned till Third day morning, I think to 8 o'clock. In the afternoon of Seventh-day, attended the Meeting for Sufferings. I think about thirty-two members present. There were two memorials read for deceased Friends. Went home in the evening with N. H. First-day morning attended Harrisville Meeting; in the afternoon (that) at Mount Pleasant, which was pretty comfortable. * * * Fifth-day morning a meeting for worship was held, commencing at 10. The Yearly Meeting convened again at 3 P. M. A number of subjects were before the meeting and settled pretty satisfactorily. I thought the meeting was, in unmerited mercy, favored to close under a precious covering, which I thought brought Friends nearer together,—a favor which I hope many will remember with feelings of gratitude. Sixth-day morning took cars at Bridgeport, and was favored to get home safe, with peace of mind.

11th mo. 18th. I have (been) for several weeks favored and much comforted in our religious meetings. May there be an increase of humility and faithfulness, (it is much wanting in me), the whole surrender of the heart to Him to whom it is due, and from whom we receive every blessing.

12th mo. 14th. I changed my seat to the bench occupied by Samuel Cope, father, and

Wm. N. Scarlet, at the request of Samuel Cope. The three Friends who occupy this bench are getting old, and seem as if they might not occupy it long. It is a humbling consideration; may those who are younger be livingly concerned to take their places in the church when they are removed. I have been much less troubled with drowsiness in meetings of late; my mind less inclined to wander, and I trust I have in a degree been favored to feel something of the responsibility that rests upon persons who occupy an upper seat in religious meetings.

18th. 1st mo. 3d. Our Preparative Meeting was pretty well attended. It was a quiet solid meeting. I think those in attendance have reason to be thankful they were there. After taking my seat some of my late trials were brought to mind; it seemed to me they afforded an excellent opportunity to exercise Christian patience, which might prove of great use to us, and our example of much use to others.

1st mo. 16th. I have, I think, been favored of late to feel a quiet settled state of mind in our religious meetings, and I trust at seasons, through unmerited mercy, have felt my mind clothed with the spirit of supplication for my country on account of the truly distressing state of things between the Northern and Southern States.

1st mo. 31st. Yesterday attended Birmingham Monthly Meeting, held at West Chester, to me pretty comfortable. They read and answered the Queries, and the subject of recommending W. K. as a minister was before the meeting, united with, and the subject forwarded to the Select Quarterly Meeting. My business in going to West Chester was to meet J. S. and the Quarterly Meeting's committee which was appointed to assist in settling a case of difficulty of near nineteen years standing. I hope through Divine help we were enabled to make some progress towards a settlement of this very unpleasant difficulty. Were the pure principles of the Christian religion that we make profession of only lived up to, such difficulties, if they should at all arise, would be very short-lived. I have felt the great necessity of being more humble and watchful, a living near to the Fountain of all good, that I may be prepared, when it may please Him who made me, to take me from works to rewards.

An English paper recalls the story of Pelham, M. P. for Shropshire, in 1822, and the salt duty. Pelham was strongly of opinion that honorable members were not aware how great a punishment to the poor it was to be deprived of this condiment, so he had two great basins of gruel prepared and taken down to the House, one with salt and the other without, which he insisted on the Opposition tasting. The effect was salutary, for in the following year the tax was abated.

Witnessing the Truth.

[We find in one of the religious papers the following touching narrative, said to be written by S. H. Hammond, formerly editor of the Albany State Register. He was an eyewitness of the scene. The use of the phrase "Word of God" for the Bible, by the child, in her examination, is in accordance with common usage among the members of other religious societies than our own, but is objectionable as its confounding two distinct things—for the Apostle John expressly states that "The Word was God." It is better, therefore, to use such language as will conform to the claim which the scriptures make for themselves—that they are records which "Holy men of old wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

So also, if their eyes were not blinded by popular usage, most sensible men would see the gross inconsistency of administering an oath to the child with an open Bible before it, which condemns all swearing in the most positive and unequivocal terms—"Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old times, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths; but I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; nor by the earth, for it is his footstool; neither by thy head, for thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be, yea, yea, nay, nay, for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil."

The lesson which the child's good mother had taught her, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor;" and the responsibility which she was under to her Heavenly Father to speak the truth, would not be forgotten by her, and she would, without being accompanied by the violation of another of the Divine commands—equally binding, as it seems to us.—Eds.]

A little girl, nine years of age, was offered as a witness against a prisoner who was on trial for a felony committed in her father's house.

"Now, Emily," said the counsel for the prisoner, upon her being offered as a witness, "I desire to know if you understand the nature of an oath?"

"I don't know what you mean," was the simple answer.

"There, your honor," said the counsel, addressing the court, is anything further necessary to demonstrate the validity of my objection? This witness should be rejected. She does not comprehend the nature of an oath."

"Let us see," said the judge, "Come here my daughter."

Assured by the kind tone and manner of the judge, the child stepped toward him, and looked confidently up in his face, with a calm, clear eye, and in a manner so artless and frank, that it went straight to the heart.

"Did you ever take an oath," inquired the judge. The little girl stepped back with a look of horror; and the red blood mantled in a blush all over her face and neck as she answered, "No, sir."

She thought he intended to inquire if she ever blasphemed.

"I do not mean that," said the judge, who saw her mistake. "I mean were you ever a witness before?"

"No, sir; I never was in court before," was the answer. He handed her the Bible open.

"Do you know that book, my daughter?"

She looked at it and answered, "Yes, sir, it is the Bible."

"Do you ever read it?" he asked.

"Yes, sir, every evening."

"Can you tell me what the Bible is?" inquired the judge.

"It is the Word of the great God," she answered.

"Well, place your hand upon this Bible, and listen to what I say;" and he repeated slowly and solemnly the oath usually administered to witnesses.

"Now," said the judge, "you have sworn as a witness, will you tell me what will befall you if you do not tell the truth?"

"I shall be shut up in the State prison," answered the child.

"Anything else?" asked the judge.

"I shall never go to Heaven," she replied.

"How do you know this?" asked the judge.

The child took the Bible, and turning rapidly to the chapter containing the commandments, pointed to the injunction "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." "I learned that before I could read."

"Has any one talked with you about being a witness in court here against this man?" inquired the judge.

"Yes, sir," she replied. "My mother heard they wanted me to be a witness, and last night she called me to her room, and asked me to tell her the Ten Commandments; and then we knelt down together, and she prayed that I might understand how wicked it was that I bear false witness against my neighbor, and that God would help me, a little child, to tell the truth as it was, before Him. And when I came up here with father, she kissed me, and told me to remember the Ninth Commandment, and that God would hear every word that I said."

"Do you believe this?" asked the judge, while a tear glistened in his eye, and his lip quivered with emotion.

"Yes, sir," said the child, with a voice and manner that showed her conviction of its truth was perfect.

"God bless you, my child!" said the judge; "you have a good mother. This witness is competent," he continued. "Were I on trial for my life, and innocent of the charge against me, I would pray God for such witnesses. Let her be examined."

She told her story with the simplicity of a child as she was, but there was a directness about it which carried conviction of its truth to every heart. She was rigidly cross examined. The counsel plied her with infinite and ingenious questioning, but she varied from her first statement in nothing. The truth as spoken by that little child, was sublime. Falsehood and perjury had preceded her testimony. The prisoner had entrenched himself in lies, until he deemed himself impregnable. Witnesses had falsified facts in his favor, and villainy had manufactured for him a sham defence. But before her testimony, falsehood was scattered like chaff. The little child, for whom a mother had prayed for strength to be given her to speak the truth as it was before God, broke the cunning devices of matured villainy to pieces like a potter's vessel. The strength that her mother prayed for was given her, and the sublime and terrible simplicity—terrible I mean to the prisoner and his associates—with which she spoke, was like a revelation from God Himself.

George Fox.

The following tribute to George Fox, from the pen of Thomas Carlyle, may prove interesting to some of the readers of "The Friend."

"Perhaps the most remarkable incident in modern history, says Teufelsdröckh, is not the Diet of Worms, still less the battle of Austerlitz, Waterloo, Peterloo, or any other battle; but an incident passed carelessly over by most historians, and treated with some degree of ridicule by others; namely, George Fox's making to himself a suit of leather. This man, the first of the Quakers, who by trade a shoemaker, was one of those, to whose under ruder or purer form, the Divine Idea of the Universe is pleased to manifest itself; and across all the bulls of ignorance and earthly degradation, shine through, in unspeakable awfulness, unspeakable beauty, on their souls' sides. Sitting in his stall, working on tanned hides, amid pears, paste horns, rosin, swine bristles, and a nameless flood of rubbish, this youth had nevertheless a living Spirit belonging to him; also an antique inspired volume, through which, as through a window, it could look upwards, and discern its celestial home. The task of a daily pair of shoes, coupled ever with some prospect of victuals, and an honorable mastership in cordwainery, and perhaps the part of thirdborough in his hundred, a the crown of long faithful sewing,—was no wise satisfactory enough to such a mind; but ever amid the boring and hammering clamors from that far-off country, came splendors and terrors; for this poor cordwainer, as we said, was a man; and the temple of imensity, wherein as man he had been sent to minister, was full of holy mystery to him.

The glory of the neighborhood, the ordained watchers and interpreters of that same holy mystery, listened with unaffected tedium to his consultations, and advised him, as the solution of such doubts, to 'drink beer and dance.' Blind leaders of the blind! For whence were their titles levied and eaten: for what were their shovel-hats scooped out, and their surplices and cassock aprons girt on, and such a church-repairing, and chaffering and organizing, and other racketing, held over that spot of God's earth,—if man were but a patent digester? Fox turned from them with tears and a sacred scorn, back to his leather-parings and his Bible. Mountains of encumbrance, higher than Etna, had been heaped over that Spirit; but it was a spirit and would not lie buried there. Through long days and nights of silent agony, it struggled and wrestled, with a man's force, to be free; how its prison-mountains heaved an away tumultuously, as the giant spirit shoo them to this hand and that, and emerged into the light of Heaven! That Leicester shoe shop, had men known it, was a holier place than any Vatican or Loretto-shrine. "S bandaged, and hampered, and hemmed in, groaned he, "with thousand requisitions, of ligations, straps, tatters, and tagnags, I can neither see nor move; not my own arm I, be the world's; and time flies fast, and Heaven is high and hell is deep; man! bethink thee if thou hast power of thought! Why not what binds me here? Want, want!—Ha, what? Will all the shoe-wages under the moon ferry me across into that far land of light? Only meditation can, and devout prayer to God. I will to the woods: the hollow of a tree will lodge me, wild berries will feed me; and for clothes, cannot I stitch myself one per centual suit of leather!"

Historical oil-painting, continues Tenebröckh, is one of the arts I never practised; therefore shall I not decide whether this subject were easy of execution on the canvas. Yet often has it seemed to me as if such first outflashing of man's freewill, to lighten more and more into day, the chaotic night that threatened to engulf him in its hindrances and its honors, were properly the only grandeur there is in history. Let some living angels or Rosa, with seeing eye and understanding heart, picture George Fox on that morning, when he spread out his cutting board for the last time, and cuts cowhides by unwonted patterns, and stitches them together into one continuous all-including case,—the farewell service of the awl! Stitch away, thou noble Fox; every prick of that little instrument is pricking into the heart of slavery, and world-worship, and the mammon-god. Thy elbow jerk, as in strong swimmer-strokes, and every stroke is bearing thee across the prison-ditch, within which vanity holds her workhouse and ragain, into lands of true liberty; were the work done, there is in broad Europe one free man, and thou art he!

Thus from the lowest depth there is a path to the loftiest height; and for the poor also a Gospel has been published. Surely if, as D'Almeida asserts, my illustrious namesake, Diogenes was the greatest man of antiquity, only that he wanted decency, then by stronger reason is George Fox the greatest; and greater than Diogenes himself; for he too stands on the adamantine basis of his manhood, casting aside all props and shores; yet not, in half savage pride undervaluing the earth; valuing it rather, as a place to yield him warmth and food, he looks heavenward from his earth, and dwells in an element of mercy and worship, with a still strength, such as the cynic's did no wise witness. Great, truly, was that tub; a temple from which man's dignity and divinity was scattered all preached abroad; but greater is the leather hall, for the same sermon was preached there, and not in scorn but in love."

Living by Cheating.—A man has something to sell. He proposes to obtain for it, not what it is worth, but what any person can be deceived and persuaded to give; and the man who knows how to deceive and beguile his neighbor into paying twice the value of an article is held to be keen and shrewd. In the long run it may be fairly questioned whether any bargain is a good bargain for the seller unless it is also a good bargain for the buyer. The man who undertakes to do business on the principle of deceiving and cheating will do well to remember that it is not wise to take too narrow a view of these matters. If of fifty men in a community each contrives in the course of a year to cheat each of the others to the amount of fifty dollars, pray tell us how much better off any of them will be at the year's end? Each of them has gained twenty-five hundred dollars by his own rascality, and lost twenty-five hundred dollars by the rascality of his neighbors. But most of them expect to gain, but do not expect to lose; they regard themselves as very "smart," and in this opinion no doubt they are correct; but they make the very common mistake of supposing that because they are wise everybody else is foolish. The keenest of them in the course of a life-time find their match, and perhaps lose in a day everything which they accumulate through years of craft and guile.

All business done upon this basis of deception, cheating and rascality is every way unsatisfactory. It ruins many, it really helps none. The long lane of crookedness and craft turns at last, and turns down hill. The only safe and proper way to do business is to do it honestly; and if men are unwilling to do this, much as they think they gain, they will find in the end that their loss is greater. Absence of honesty causes loss of confidence; loss of confidence causes financial panics and disasters; swindling, stealing and defalcations rob men of their rights, and send them out into the community as tramps and beggars, enemies to society, and tempted to avenge their real or fancied wrongs wherever they can find opportunity; and finally come anarchy and revolution, in which the ill-gotten gains of generations go down in seas of fire, and blood, and desolation. The remedy for panics is confidence; the foundation of confidence is honesty and integrity; and the foundation for honesty and integrity is the fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom.—Common People.

True and False Warmth in Ministry.

Job Scott mentions in his journal, that when in New York city in 1790, he had a meeting appointed. Of this he says,— "It was large, and dear Isaac Everett, of Pennsylvania, now on his return from a religious visit into New England, was lovingly opened and favored in this evening meeting. He is indeed an eminent minister of the gospel; scarce attended with any degree of warmth or animation in his ministry, but what is purely divine. Oh! that this was the case with all. But alas! the mixtures!—the affectionate emotions!—how many take these for gospel power! The passionate preacher, said Samuel Fothergill in a letter to a friend, 'hath affected the passionate hearer; both have been in raptures and neither of them edified.' And adds, 'Mistake not the warmth of the passions for the gospel authority. The first is like the rattling thunder, which frights but never hurts; the last is like the lightning from the East, which illuminates, and, at times, breaks through all opposition, and melts every obstruction.'

"This kind of preaching has abundantly too much place among us as a people. May every hint, such passionate preachers meet with, be treasured up by them, and not soon be forgotten; seeing so great is the need of a reformation herein, even among many who scarcely suspect themselves of any fault in this respect, and yet are almost always in their testimonies putting too a little strength of their own, as if they were ashamed to appear so weak and little as truth would make them, were they reduced to an entire dependence on its holy help. And yet, this is the only way to come forth in strength and clearness, though not in such haste as active self may desire. But every creaturely addition will, in degree, prevent our arising in the life and purity of the gospel. And yet many praise this kind of animated ministry, and so hurt the poor instrument, who all the while is greatly in need of help; but alas! in the low state of things, is likely but seldom, if at all, to meet with it from any of the brethren, in some places. For, there are too few who are enough acquainted with true silence to prefer it before a noise and sound of words, in the warmth and influence of creaturely vehemence. To distinguish this from the real warmth of truth, requires a deep dwelling in the root of life, where no false heat can pass for the genuine, nor any specious mixture for the simple, unmix'd gospel ministry."

Cigarette Smoking.

BY CHAS. E. KELSEY, M. D.

It is not uncommon in Cuba where cigarette smoking is the general way of using the weed—to have a native offer you a cigar when you tell him you have smoked enough already. He does not wish you to be sick or uncomfortable, and he gives you something mild—something that can hurt nobody. He does not offer you more cigarettes, but a cigar. The fact, shortly stated, is, that there is no way in which the effect of tobacco can be obtained so quickly and powerfully as by a cigarette; and the fact has its explanation in the habit of inhaling the smoke, which is the characteristic of cigarette smoking. To a confirmed cigarette smoker a cigarette is by no means the same as a cigar. It is something more powerful, different in effect, more seductive, and it acts instantaneously. The difference may, perhaps, be expressed in the following proportion: As the number of square inches of mucous membrane in the mouth is to the 130 square yards of membrane of the lungs, so is the effect of a whiff of smoke taken in the ordinary way to the effect of one inhaled. Such a proportion is not entirely accurate, but it serves to express the idea, and overstates the difference in effect.

A man may have smoked the strongest cigars for years, and consider himself beyond the reach of any unpleasant effect. Let such an one take a strong cigarette, inhale deeply one whiff of the smoke, and in less time than it takes to write it he will be dizzy, sparks will flash before his eyes, he will stagger, and, perhaps, lean against something for support. What has happened? An instantaneous shock to his nervous system. A foreign body has been taken into the lungs, and by the nearest possible way it has come into contact with the blood on the other side of the delicate transparent lung tissue, and been carried to the heart. The membrane is formed for the passage of gases in respiration, and is the most delicate and sensitive in the body. Compared with it, the mucous membrane of the mouth bears the same relation that a heavy blanket might bear to a cobweb.

And now as to some of the growing evils of the habit. Physicians are accustomed to recognize a certain form of heart trouble under the name of tobacco heart. A man may have such an organ before he suffers in any other way, and when he gets it he thinks he is going to die. For the first time in his life he becomes conscious of time that he has a heart, and an exceedingly unpleasant form of self-consciousness it is. It beats when he goes up stairs as it never did before. He is sitting up late and comes to bed knocked at his door, or a messenger comes to him with an unexpected telegram, and an entirely new sensation comes over him, as though his very life's blood had suddenly stopped flowing. He masters himself in a moment, and by and by he wonders what could have startled him so at such a simple thing, and is inclined to be ashamed of him self for having been afraid. "It was nothing," he says to himself, and indeed, it was not very much—only his heart suddenly failed him, not only in a mental but physical sense.

It ought to have gone on quietly with its seventy or eighty pulsations a minute, but it didn't. It stopped for the fraction of a minute, and then it picked itself up again, gave one or two spasmodic throbs, and after awhile settled down to its work. If it had stopped a little longer he would have fainted. If it had not picked itself up again he would have died; but it always does.

What does this mean? In a smoker, simply that his nervous system is showing the effects of tobacco, and showing them in the organ which is, perhaps, the quickest to manifest any nervous disturbance—the heart. Fortunate is he who regards nature's warning and stops at this point; for this first fluttering of the heart is a valuable sign to one who understands its significance, and if it is disregarded worse is to follow.

There is another train of symptoms, which may come either before or after this functional heart trouble, from the same cause. A man who used to do his day's work merrily, whose body answered to every call of his ambitious spirit, whether for work or play, begins to feel that he is not the same, and to wonder why he cannot do as once he did. He never used to know what it was to be tired, except at night after a hard day's work, and then he went to bed and slept eight solid hours without a dream. Now he is tired in the morning, no matter how much he has slept; and no matter how tired he may be when he goes to bed, he is not tired at all. His work is an effort and a drag. It requires a man who lives by his brain to appreciate this, and fully understand what it means. A day laborer does not know. His nervous system is of a healthy, solid type, and is not easily deranged. But the professional man, the man who uses his wits and lives by them, either in a profession which is his business, or in a business which is not professional—the clergyman who sits down to his sermon and cannot, simply and absolutely cannot, write; the literary man, who would gladly give all he has if he could sit down to his work with his old vim and spirit; they appreciate it fully. These are the men who feel the lack of that most delicate and most complex of all the results of a perfectly harmonious working of all the vital phenomena—nerve force—most seriously. Without it they are shorn of their power; with it they are the brain and nerve of the social system. Theirs it is to plan, for others to execute; to lead, for others to follow.

When we enter a foul air from the street we feel the effect and know the cause. But when we shut up a room, and sit in it till the air becomes close, we gradually grow stupid and nervous and uncomfortable; our head begins to ache; but still we struggle on with our work, till finally it grows unendurable, and at last it strikes us that the windows are all closed, and the thermometer at eighty, and the air heavy and poisonous. We step out, get the fresh breeze, and are ourselves again. Most people are educated up to the point of knowing good air from bad, very few to the knowing of the influence of tobacco when shown in the same way.—Christian Advocate.

"She Died Free."—Soon after the war a physician was travelling in Chambers County and saw a colored woman lying a little from the road in an old unclosed field, with a boy about ten years of age sitting by her side. Said the doctor to the boy, "Who is that on the ground?" "My mother," answered the boy. "Is she dead?" "Yes," answered the boy, "but, thank God, she said she died free."

THE USE OF TEARS.

Be not thy tears too harshly chid,
Repine not at the rising sigh;
Who, if they might, would always bid
The breast be still, the cheek be dry.

How little of ourselves we know,
Before a grief the heart has felt!
The lessons that we learn of woe,
May brace the mind as well as melt.

The energies too stern for mirth,
The reach of thought, the strength of will,
Mid cloud and tempest have their birth,
Through blight and blast their course fulfil.

Love's perfect triumph never crowned
The hope unquenched by a pang,
The godliest wreaths with thorns are bound,
And Sappho wept before she sang.

Tears at each pure emotion flow,
They wait on pity's gentle claim,
On admiration's fervid glow,
On piety's seraphic flame.

'Tis only when it mourns and fears,
The loaded spirit feels forgiven;
And through the mist of falling tears,
We catch the clearest glimpse of Heaven.

HAZEL BLOSSOMS.

The summer warmth has left the sky,
The summer songs have died away;
And, withered, in the footpaths lie
The hazel blossoms of the May
With ruly and with topee gone.

The grass is brownish on the hills;
No pale, belated flowers recall
The astral fringes of the hills,
And drearly the dead vines fall,
Frost-blackened, from the roadside wall.

Yet, through the gray and sombre wood,
Against the dusk of fir and pine,
Last of their floral sisterhood,
The hazel's yellow blossoms shine,
The tawny gold of Africa's mine!

Small beauty hath my ousung flower,
For spring to own or summer hail;
But, in the season's saddest hour,
To skies that weep and winds that wail,
Its glad surprisals never fail.

O days grown cold! O life grown old!
No rose of June may bloom again;
But, like the hazel's twisted gold,
Through early frost and winter rain
Shall hints of summer-time remain.

And as within the hazel's bough
A gift of mystic virtue dwells,
That points to golden oases below,
And in dry desert places tells
Where flow unseen the cool, sweet wells,

So, in the wise Diviner's hand,
Be mine the hazel's grateful part
To feel, beneath a thirsty hand,
The living waters thrill and start,
The beating of the rivulet's heart!

Suffice me the gift to light
With latest bloom the dark, cold days;
To call some hidden spring to sight
That, in these dry and dusty ways,
Shall sing its pleasant song of praise.

O Love! the hazel-wand may fall,
But thou must lead the surer spell,
That, passing over Bacch's vale,
Reveals the oblique miracle,
And makes the desert-land a well.

SOME LITTLE FOLKS.

There are some little folks that we never can please,
They fret about trifles, they trouble and tease,
Full of discontent, even at play;
Till their friends are worn out, and are heartily glad When bedtime is come, and each lass or lad
Is quiet, and out of the way.

There are some little folks so good-tempered and sweet,
That to see their bright faces is always a treat,
And their friends can quite trust them, they know;
They amuse themselves nicely with some plan or play,
Take care not to worry, or grieve with any way,
And are welcome wherever they go.

For "The Friend."

The following expressions of Charles Marshall, one of our early Friends, uttered a short time before his death, I should like to see inserted in "The Friend," if approved of.

10th mo. 21st, 1879.

"I have two things that lie upon me, to Friends, which I desire may be communicated to them.

"The first is, That they gather down into the immortal Seed and Word of life in themselves, and be exercised in it before the Lord, and duly prize and set a value upon the many outward and inward mercies, and blessings, and heavenly visitations, that the Lord has eminently bestowed upon them, since the morning of the day of his blessed visitation; then shall they grow and be preserved in a living freshness to Him; and the Lord will continue his mercies to them, and they shall not want his divine refreshing presence in their meetings together before him.

"The second thing is, That those Friends to whom the Lord hath given great estates, ought to cast their bread upon the waters and do good therein in their lifetime; for those who are enjoyers of such things should see that they are good stewards thereof. Oh! the many poor families that such persons might be a help to! how easily might they with a little, assist many a family to live in the world! and what a comfort would it be for such to see the fruits of their charity in their lifetime."

The Indian Pantomime Language.

It is perhaps not generally known that the North American Indians, although speaking different languages, possess in common a means of communication that is intelligible to all the tribes. The rapidity with which they exchange ideas by this method is remarkable. I have seen Sioux in council with Arapahoes, Shoshones, and Crows, and perfect understanding seemed to characterize their deliberations. Not a word was uttered, but every gesture was significant, and each look as expressive as our longest periods.

In this sign language these particular tribes are represented as follows: The Sioux, by drawing the right hand across the throat, signifying "cut throats"; the Arapahoes, by touching the left breast, meaning "the good hearts"; the Shoshones or Snakes, by a gliding movement of the hand similar to that employed by the reptile whose stealthy approach they emulate; and the Absarcons or Crows, by imitating, with crooked elbows, the flight of the birds that, by their number, have given a name to the plateau east of the Big Horn Mountains, as well as to the former occupants. They were disposed by the Sioux.

Other tribes are similarly distinguished; while the whites, or "hat-wearers," are universally described by indicating upon the forehead, the supposed line of contact of that useful article of wear. The sign for a "big chief" is made by raising the forefinger, pointing upward, in a vertical direction, and then reversing both the finger and the motion. The greater the elevation the bigger the chief. An Indian tipi, or lodge, is indicated by both forefingers crossed near the nails, so as to present the general outline of a lodge; while the hands partly folded, in imitation of the corner of an ordinary rail fence, signifies a settlement or town.

The simple affirmative is signified by gesticulating, with extended forefinger, after the stereotyped manner of many elderly men in argument, and this is rendered emphatic in the sense of "I understand," by the same movement repeated, the thumb and forefinger extended, the other fingers closed, nails up. The sign of negation consists of a deprecatory wave of the hand from front to right; while doubt, perplexity, or ignorance is expressed by the combined signs "Yes—no." How significant! Again, a negative proposition is often stated affirmatively, and "no" added the reverse likewise obtains; and, generally, the opposite of anything expressed may be indicated by appending "yes" or "no" as the case may be.

For example: The sign for a woman is made by drawing the fingers through the hair as though combing it; and a man may be signified by declaring, "A woman—no." A stream is expressed by a movement of the extended hand, indicative at once of the flowing of water and the meandering of its currents; and this sign made in reference to any locality, followed by that of negation, will impart the absence of running water.

The hollowed hand presented to the lips is the symbol for a drink. Grass, undergrowth, and trees are represented by corresponding heights to which the hand, with fingers extended upward, is raised. Fire is similarly indicated, the fingers moving in imitation of tongues of flame; and a waving and constantly ascending motion means smoke. The idea of plenty is conveyed by a movement of the hands as if gathering or heaping up, while "not any" is signified by smartly brushing the right hand across the palm of the left, in the direction of the fingers. This is also a sign for cleanliness, neatness, &c. Poverty of means, of flesh, &c., is expressed by passing one forefinger over the other as if whittling or paring it; and proportionate lengths of the same finger, exposed by this means, represents the fractions one-fourth, one-half, three-quarters. The fingers of both hands are rapidly used in counting above ten. "On horseback" is signified by separating the fore and middle fingers of the right hand over the fingers of the left, extended and joined. The forefinger thrust from the mouth directly to the front, like a tongue, is a token of truthful speech. Falsehood, or the "forked tongue," is made by the same movement of the extended fore and middle fingers. "Beating the bush," or "whipping the devil round the stump," as our phrase has it, is indicated by passing the forefinger from the mouth in a course leading around the head, or in any other than the direct course. A falsehood may also be represented by "A truth—no."

The signs for articles of diet are less arbitrary. Bacon is meant when the thumb and forefinger of the right hand are separated as if to feel the thickness of the right hand. Sugar and salt are distinguished by the expression given to the face when the tip of the finger, as if conveying a small quantity of either, touches the tongue; and pepper is "salt," with the addition of a sneeze. To represent flour they go through the process of kneading dough, and bread is flour, with the sign of fire added. Coffee naturally suggests a movement of grinding, the mill for that purpose being in common use; and tea becomes, as it really is, a drink compounded of aromatic leaves.

Beauty of face or figure is signified by a caressing or stroking motion of the hand, and this sign, when not made in immediate juxtaposition to any part of the body, is a general one for complacency or satisfaction. Desire of possession is shown by working the forefinger over the nose. The forefingers crossed at right angles, means a trade or "swap."

Perhaps the most interesting signs are those relating to time and to the seasons. The fall of rain and snow is readily imitated, and the temperature is indicated by manifesting cold or heat. By this means summer and winter may also be implied; but I have seen them distinguished by indicating a greater or less meridional altitude of the sun, thus evincing observation, if not a knowledge of astronomical phenomena. Shooting grass and falling leaves are symbolical of spring and autumn. To designate an hour of the day, the thumb and forefinger approximating a circle are made to describe an arc corresponding to the supposed course of the sun, and remaining stationary for a second at the proper height. The same hour yesterday is indicated by reversing the movement from this point. An entire revolution, forward or retrograde, confined with the required show of fingers, will accurately convey any number of days, future or past, and the exact hour upon the day in question. This, of course, conforms to their belief that the sun revolves around the earth. To signify years, the recurrence of the seasons is indicated, winter being the favored one in this respect, whence their oft quoted phrase, fire, or snow, or any number of "snows."

Darkness or night is expressed by a simultaneous motion of the hands from a position at their respective sides, forearms horizontal and palms up, in a circularly approaching manner, so as to bring their palms down, one above the other, in front of the body, as though to signify that "everything is closed." Everything open, that is to say, day or daylight, is this movement reversed, and both are very significant.

I might proceed to multiply examples of this curious sign manual, but enough has been written to give an idea of its effect, and the facility with which conversations may be carried on by its means. Although ordinarily imperturbable, the Indians possess in a remarkable degree variety and power of facial expression, which added to their graceful gesticulation, makes this, as practised by them, an interesting and wonderful pantomime.—The Council Fire.

Religious Items, &c.

Plainness in Dress.—A writer in the Herald of Truth quotes from Luke vii. 24: "But what went ye out for to see? A man clothed in soft raiment? Behold they which are gorgeously apparelled are in kings' courts," and makes this comment: "This proves that it was not common in those days to wear gorgeous apparel, that this was found only among kings and rulers. If I wish to see a display of dress now-a-days I can see it in the church, and upon the preachers. 'If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.' Now, take this home and settle it as best you can."

Ministers among the Mennonites.—The same paper says: "The Mennonites oppose the paying of a stipulated salary, both because there is nothing in the Scriptures that favors the. How much will you give me to preach for you a year of the present time; and that observation teaches us, it is the means of bringing all manner of evils into the church. But they never allow their ministers nor their families to suffer for the want of anything, and whenever there is necessity for it, their members are willing and ready to help their ministers. But they are also expected to do like Paul did, labor with their hands to their necessities."

S. Green, the Episcopal incumbent at Port Adelaide, Australia, has taken another step nearer Rome. In a sermon preached recently, he boldly announced his belief in the propriety of prayers for the dead. This opinion he based, first, upon the notion held by many of an intermediate state in the next world—a sort of purgatory, without the torments; secondly, upon the practice of the Jews as indicated in the Apocrypha; and thirdly upon the silence of the New Testament upon the subject.

Education and Roman Catholicism.—In many of the countries of Europe the Papal clergy have long controlled the popular education to a large extent; and they earnestly oppose the introduction of any measures which seem likely to take out of their hands this powerful agency in influencing the sentiments of the people. In an article on the "Educational agitation in Belgium," published in The National Baptist, it is stated, that after the separation between Holland and Belgium, in 1830, the schools of the latter remained in entire subordination to the Roman Catholic Church until 1842. In that year an organic school law was passed, which promised satisfaction both to the Liberals and to the Ultra-containers. While religious instruction was continued, proper provision was made for other branches of knowledge. Wherever the Liberals were strong, the new school law was enforced, but in the rural provinces the clerical party ignored its conditions, and maintained their schools in defiance of State control.

The Liberals, alarmed at the spread of ignorance and superstition, established educational leagues in the large cities and industrial centres, collected funds, and opened private schools in opposition to the private clerical schools. In 1867, the Liberals having secured a majority in the Government took immediate action toward abrogating or modifying the law of 1842; but their rule was too short for the accomplishment of their purpose, as the clerical party returned to power in 1870. In 1873, the Liberals being again a majority in both Houses, proceeded at once to create a ministry of public instruction, of which Van Humbec was made chief. Van Humbec submitted the project of a new school-law, which the king recommended in a speech from the throne, and which became the law of the kingdom.

The following are the salient points of contrast between the two laws:

In 1842, religious instruction was made an essential part of the school course. In 1879, it was left entirely optional. In 1842, it was provided that religious instruction should be given during the school hours. In 1879, it was assigned to hours preceding or following the school session. By the law of 1842, all the religious teachers must be appointed by the clergy. By that of 1879, common teachers were authorized to give the instruction if the priest refused. In 1842, clerical inspectors were appointed for the schools. In 1879, these were abolished and lay inspectors appointed.

Such were the preliminary steps to the agitation now convulsing the entire kingdom. The clerical party resisted the law through the pulpits, the press, and the confessional, and at length a conference of the bishops was held at the residence of the Archbishop in Meelin, and a pastoral letter addressed to all pastors in the State. This letter, which was originally published in Latin, comprised the following positive commands:

1st. That every pastor should immediately open a new school in opposition to those of the State.

2d. That every pastor should announce from his pulpit that no child attending the State schools should receive the sacrament.

3d. That no teacher employed in the schools should partake of the sacrament.

The ecclesiastical pressure has already caused the resignation of 1,332 teachers out of a total of 20,000.

A Brahminic Question.—The establishment of railroads in India effected much in destroying the power and even existence of caste, and now heathenism is to receive another blow; for the Brahmins in India are divided by the question whether the water of the Ganges, their holy river, will not lose its sanctity after it has been bridged over by Europeans.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Young Soko.—"Katomba presented a young Soko or Gorilla that had been caught, while its mother was killed. She sits 18 inches high, has fine long black hair all over, which was pretty so long as it was kept in order by her dam. She is the least mischievous of all the monkey tribe I have seen, and seems to know that in me she has a friend, and sits quietly on the mat beside me. In walking, the first thing observed is that she does not tread on the palms of her hands, but on the backs of the second line of bones of the hands; in doing this the nails do not touch the ground, nor do the knuckles; she uses the arms thus supported crotch-fashion, and hits herself along between them; occasionally one hand is put down before the other, and alternates with the feet, or she walks upright and holds up a hand to anyone to carry her. If refused, she turns her face down, and makes grinnings of the most bitter human weeping, wringing her hands, and sometimes adding a fourth hand or foot to make the appeal more touching. Grass or leaves she draws around her to make a nest, and resents anyone meddling with her property. She is a most friendly little beast, and came up to me at once, making her chirrup of welcome, smelled my clothing, and held out her hand to be shaken. I slapped her palm without offence, though she wined. She began to untie the cord with which she was afterwards bound, with fingers and thumbs, in quite a systematic way, and on being interfered with by a man, looked daggers, and screaming tried to beat him with her hands; she was afraid of his stick, and faced him, putting her back to me as a friend. She holds out her hand for people to lift her up and carry her, quite like a spoiled child; then bursts into a passionate cry, somewhat like that of a kite, and wrings her hands quite naturally, as if in despair. She eats everything, covers herself with a mat to sleep, and makes a nest of grass or leaves, and wipes her face with a leaf."—D. Livingstone in S. Africa.

How Lead Pencils are made.—The ordinary lead pencil is filled with a preparation of graphite, commonly called black lead or plumbago, both of which are misnomers, as there is no lead or plumbum in it. Until quite lately it has been considered by chemists as a carburet of iron, but it is now generally acknowledged that although it shows traces of iron, this metal is only mechanically mixed with it—there being no chemical combination between the two.

Pencils were originally filled with square sticks cut from blocks of graphite found in the famous Borrowdale mine, in Cumberland, England, which contained the purest ever found, but on the exhaustion of that mine the impure materials to be found elsewhere were pressed into service, after proper purification. The process adopted by the Dixon Company at Jersey City, who use a graphite found at Ticonderoga, N. Y., is as follows: The graphite is first ground fine in water, treated with sulphuric and nitric acids, and, after washing clean, heated to a bright red. Then it is mixed with sufficient water to make it run freely, and allowed to pass slowly through a series of tanks arranged in steps, until the water leaves the last one of the series almost clear, having left the graphite deposited and graded in the tanks—the deposit in that nearest the overflow, being the purest, is used for the finest pencils. The graphite, after being taken from the tanks is dried, and then mixed with pipe-clay obtained from Rotterdam, Holland, which has been purified in the same way as the graphite, only the very finest being used for pencils, as the coarse can be utilized in the manufacture of crucibles. Upon the amount of clay used depends the hardness of the pencil—the more clay the harder the grade—about seven parts of clay to ten parts of graphite, by weight, forming a medium. The clay and graphite is thoroughly mixed with water and ground like paint, but passed repeatedly through the mills, as many as twenty-four times being considered necessary for the finest grades. When ground sufficient the pasty mass is enclosed in a canvas bag, and the water is squeezed out by a powerful press, leaving the compound in the form of a stiff dough, which is placed into a cylinder of a forming machine, and by means of a piston driven down by a powerful screw, is forced out at the bottom of the cylinder in the form of "leads" that, after being heated in a crucible to a red heat, are ready for insertion in the wooden blocks to cut into pencils.

The blocks are formed by sawing the wood into pieces as long as a pencil, six times as wide, and half the thickness, which are afterwards run through a planing machine that not only smooths them but cuts in each block six grooves half the thickness of the "leads." In the grooves in one block, the leads are laid; a second block, previously coated with glue, is laid on the first, and a pile of these compound blocks is placed in a press, where they remain until dry. The blocks are next cut apart into six pencils each, by passing through a machine like a moulding machine, having two sets of cutters operating on opposite sides of the blocks, each of which cuts half way through the wood. The cutters in these machines are so accurately arranged and run so true, that when the pencils leave the machine there is no mark to show the line of separation from the block other than the joint of the two pieces of wood inclosing the lead, and they are said to be so smooth that sand-papering would roughen them. The shaping machine turns out about seventy-two per minute, or over 43,000 per day. The pencils are then varnished or colored by another machine, at the rate of one hundred and twenty per minute, or 72,000 per day; and they are polished in another machine, at the rate of one hundred and six per minute, or over 63,000 per day; all by unskilled labor.—Scientific American.

Domestic Remedies.—Poultices.—The chief object obtained by the poultice is the retention of heat and moisture, thus hastening the occurrence of suppuration in an inflamed part. To fully accomplish this, the poultice is best made of flaxseed meal (ground flaxseed) mixed up with hot water. When thus mixed (it is not necessary to boil the meal), it should be spread with a large knife on a soft muslin or linen cloth. On this spread surface a piece of old, thin muslin or gauze should be laid. The edges of the poultice cloth should be folded over, thus retaining the gauze, and preventing the poultice matter from escaping on the clothing. This is then laid on the inflamed part, and outside of it a piece of silk or cloth, rubber cloth, waxed paper or other impervious material. This last by preventing evaporation retains the heat and moisture, and thus favors the formation of pus. A poultice without this outer covering is of but little value, as it soon becomes cool and dry and requires frequent changing. With this covering it need be changed but twice daily—in the morning and in the evening. A poultice should never be heavy, as it may give pain to a tender part by its weight. Besides flaxseed meal, bread and milk, boiled carrots and other materials are often used. So, too, soft thick cloths or patent lint wet with hot water, and covered with silk cloth may be used.

For a Sprain.—A large piece of flannee wrung out of very hot water, applied to the part and enveloped in oil silk or rubber and bunched up with a bandage, undisturbed for some hours, will be found very efficient.—Dr. J. J. L. "Not long ago," says the New York Times "we described the process by which instantaneous photographs of horses in action were taken by a San Francisco operator. The same method has been successfully applied to athletes, and now all the intricate movement, made by men when boxing, wrestling, fencing, jumping, and tumbling have been instantaneously and exactly pictured. The first experiment was in photographing a man while turning a back somersault. He stood in front of the camera motionless, and at a signal sprang into the air, turned backward, and in a second was again in his original position, but as was the time consumed in making the turn, fourteen negatives were taken, showing him in as many different positions. The camera cannot follow the rapid motions of a man turning a somersault; but the various positions assumed, were faithfully portrayed by the lightning like movements of this new system of photography."

Science and Art.—The London hospital uses telephones for sanitary reasons, as well as for convenience. By this means of communication they do away with the necessity of many messengers; and the risk of conveying infection, especially with the fever wards, is thereby greatly diminished.

A caution about Shot in game.—This being a season when game killed by shooting and probably containing the pellets, is eaten, it may be worth while to caution those who consume the flesh of birds with avidity that the proportion of instances in which shot is found is probably small in comparison with the number of cases in which the pellets are unwittingly swallowed. It is a matter of speculation how much mischief a shot may do when passed into the intestines, but the fact that anomalous diseases have been set up by the presence of very small bodies which have been entangled in folds of the mucous membrane renders it desirable to put the public on their guard. Occasionally the most disastrous results have followed such small cases. We have in recollection the case of a physician who died after prolonged and unexplained sufferings from the impaction of a very small ball which had found its way into a pudding, and was inadvertently swallowed. A little care will avoid this contingency, but, remembering that the bird has been shot, some pains ought to be taken to avoid swallowing the missile.—London Lancet.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 2ND, 1878.

In our last number there was a brief sketch of some of the proceedings of North Carolina Yearly Meeting. In that body there exists a desire to spread the influence of the Society of Friends among the people by whom they are surrounded; but there is great need of more than that, in endeavoring to accomplish this, efforts should not be sanctioned which are inconsistent with those distinguishing principles which give our denomination a right to exist as a distinct branch of the Christian Church, and which are the outgrowth of the operations of the Spirit of Truth upon the minds of its truly concerned members.

Among the practices which have latterly been introduced into North Carolina, as well as other places among those professing the name of Friends, is the custom of holding regular meetings, called sometimes "Devotional" or "Social" meetings, which are conducted in the customary manner of our meetings for worship. These meetings are usually controlled and directed by one or more persons who are appointed for that purpose, and who assume the leadership. They are opened by reading a portion of the Bible, frequently with comments on the matter read by the reader, or by others present; hymns are often sung in them; and expressions of personal feeling are encouraged; little or no opportunity is afforded for that interposition of mind, and drawing near in spirit to the Lord, in which ability is received to offer up spiritual worship. We believe they are a stepping-stone, which will be used by many, to the abandonment of our simple manner of holding religious meetings, and to the fuller adoption of the customs of other religious societies, where one man presides over and assumes to direct the devotional exercises.

In North Carolina we believe this tendency to fall into the practices of others, has been strengthened by the custom of sending and receiving delegates, with fraternal greetings, from the conferences of other religious bodies. It is desirable to maintain a friendly feeling towards all mankind; and the nearer any body of religious professors approaches in doctrine and in practice to the standard given us to maintain, the more nearly we will be prepared to recognize them as brethren of the same household. But when we receive into our meetings for business ministers of other denominations, whose views as to the exercise of gospel ministry, and on other important points, differ from our own; when we permit such freely to address our people; and note on our minutes the circumstance in terms of satisfaction; can we be surprised if many of our members should feel themselves at liberty to attend on the ministrations of such at other times; that their views as to the performance of worship should become more and more outward; and that reading the Scriptures, singing hymns, and other vocal exercises should gradually supplant that waiting on God for his help, which the principles of Friends have ever led us as a people to insist upon as the first requisite to true worship?

In connection with this subject, it may be right to refer to the dependence on outward ministry, on which some are in danger of relying to too great a degree. We all believe that a true Gospel ministry is a great blessing to the Church, and that like those things which holy men of old wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, it is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.

But let us bear in mind the testimony of George Fox, who says; "When the Lord God and his Son Jesus Christ sent me forth into the world to preach his everlasting gospel and kingdom, I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to the Light, Grace and Spirit of God, which would bring them salvation." Such is still the effect of true ministry; it does not lead the hearers to depend on the instrument, but directs their attention to the Divine Source of all true spiritual knowledge and power. When people come to sit down under the government and guidance of this Heavenly Teacher, they have no absolute need of outward ministrations; and though these and all other helps which our Father in Heaven affords, will be thankfully received, yet their hope and expectation will not be fixed on man, but in the first place and above all on Christ Jesus, the Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

In the regular meetings for worship held during the time of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, several hymns were sung, mostly if not altogether, we believe, by persons who were not members of that meeting; and the practice called forth a plain and earnest remonstrance, delivered in a business sitting by one of their own members. In the devotional meetings, much greater liberties were taken, especially in that held on Third-day night, after the close of the Yearly Meeting. This occasion is thus described in a communication received from one of the North Carolina Friends who was present:

"Although there was to me cause for sadness and uneasiness in the Devotional meetings (so called) held during the Yearly Meeting week at New Garden, N. C., yet it was not until the last evening (Third-day) after the business concluded, that I witnessed a culmination equal to if not beyond anything I had read of the extravagance into which some meetings claiming to be of the Society of Friends had been carried. After preliminary addresses had been delivered, and some feelings of excitement being engendered, [a stranger who was there] requested that all present who read the Bible daily with a devotional pause, or kept a family altar, should rise. Perceiving that several did not respond, he made some cutting remarks as to pride, waywardness, &c., and ordered all those in the front seat to clear out, as he was going to adopt another course. He then called on those who were anxious about their souls to come forward and kneel down, and others, so as to have a time for vocal prayer, during which time the excitement was fanned by groans, exclamations and words, calling on those present to open their mouths. One young woman threw up her hands and began to scream. Then hymns were sung. She came over among the men. The ministers had been passing to and fro among the kneelers and others, urging them on, sometimes kneeling beside them, and singing or praying aloud. Then another young woman began to scream, and the singing went on to allay her. Some left their seats and came over among the men, and caressed and knelt by their sides. It was a trying time to me, and I cannot describe what I passed through."

This scene of excitement might have gone to still greater lengths, if it had not been for the faithfulness of one of their members, who earnestly appealed to those present to be sober and calm, and not to follow such a spirit; and who, notwithstanding the interruption of one of the principal actors and promoters of this confusion, was enabled to bring a degree of quietness and settlement over the meeting, under which it soon after closed.

We have no doubt, that many of the members of North Carolina Yearly Meeting are grieved with such actions (principally done through the influence of strangers), and we have given place to this exposure through no unkind feeling towards them. But we believe the time has fully come in which Friends who are so situated, should be awakened to the dangers that surround them, and to the need of bearing a more faithful and open testimony to the truth. They cannot permit persons professing to be ministers to circulate through their meetings, preaching doctrines that are not in accordance with our principles, and inculcating practices that draw their members away from the right performance of true spiritual worship, without becoming responsible themselves for the evils produced. The apostle John advises that if any come who are out of the true doctrine they should not be received, "for," he adds, "he biddeth him God-speed is partaker of his evil deeds."

Where real cause for uneasiness exists, there should be honest dealing with those who are in error; the true principles of Friends should be clearly set forth for the information of the more inexperienced; and a warning should be given against inconsistent things, in the spirit of wisdom, so that the flock may be preserved from going astray, and from being injured by unwholesome food.

It will not be sufficient for Friends merely to gather into groups after meetings are over, and complain one to the other of the wrong things they have seen and heard, privately find fault with the actors and encouragers of such things, and there let the matter rest. This course savors too much of that "tale bearing" which one of the Queries is aimed against. An open and honest testimony, borne in the fear of the Lord, and in the ability which He will give, will be of far greater value in checking the spread of error, and will tend more to the maintenance of loved unity among the members.

The introduction and spread of changes in the long-established doctrines and practices of Friends have promoted disunity and alienation in other parts of our religious Society; and if these changes are not stopped by the goodness of the Lord, and the faithfulness of his servants, similar results may be produced among Friends in North Carolina. We sincerely desire that this may not be the case; but that there may be a return to first principles, and a more general awakening to the dangers that threaten our Society; and that this may be accompanied with a renewal of primitive zeal, manifesting itself in the first place in an earnest concern for individual salvation, and extending thence to families, neighbors, and to the whole human race, as the Lord opens the hearts of those who are endeavoring to walk in the Light, and who thus come to have fellowship one with another, and to know the blood of Christ to cleanse them from all sin.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The contract for the iron to be used in the Pontchartraine's elevated street road, has been awarded to the Edgemont Iron Works. The contract calls for about five and a-half million pounds of iron. The contract for the bridge over the river, has been given to Keller & Goll, of Lancaster, Penna. The bridge is to be similar to the one over the Schuylkill at Philadelphia, and is to be thirty feet wide, to accommodate three tracks, two for passenger and one for freight traffic.

The shore-end of the new French Transatlantic cable was landed on the 16th inst. This cable extends from Brest, at the extreme western point of Finistere, France, across the Atlantic nearly due west to Abiquelon, a small island belonging to France, and situated a short distance to the south of Newfoundland, thence southwesterly to United States land at Namsct. The cable is said to be one of the best and strongest ever laid.

It is stated by the Wheatmaker and Metal Worker, that fifty thousand gross of watch glasses are sold annually in the United States. One importer alone imports thirty-five thousand gross.

The Secretary of the Treasury has officially notified the Secretary of the War of the decision of the Treasury Department, prohibiting the importation of new steel into the United States from Canada, and requesting the Dominion authorities be notified of the decision.

Twenty-five barrels of the finest American winter wheat flour, made by the newly patented process, were sold recently at the New York Produce Exchange, to fill an order sent direct from the house-hold of the Queen of England. The price paid was $2 per barrel.

The ocean tonnage of Montreal during the past year has been 468,000 tons—the largest on record by 68,000 tons.

The electric light has been used in loading vessels for coal at Montreal, and by their aid the men worked efficiently in a storm of rain and sleet.

The annual report of the President of the Western Union Telegraph, shows that last year the company had $2,978 miles of line, 211,566 miles of wire, 8334 offices, and sent upward of 25,000,000 messages, on 11,000,000 telegrams, for $11,000,000, and the profits $4,500,000. The capital stock of the company is, in round numbers, $44,000,000.

Violent and destructive wind storms prevailed on the 14th, in Southern Ohio and in portions of Indiana and Illinois. Telegraph wires were levelled in various directions, and communication between Cincinnati and Chicago and the West was interrupted for some time. Much damage was done to buildings in various places, and some loss of life is reported.

The Weather Bureau, in its review of the hurricane which swept the Southern Atlantic seaboard in 8th mo. last, reports that the wind velocities at that time were among the highest, if not the highest, which have ever been recorded. At Cape Lookout, as the storm centre began to pass away, the wind rose to the estimated velocity of 165 miles per hour. At another stage of the storm, the instrument registered 138 miles. The number of deaths in this city the past week was 287—an increase of 50 over the previous week.

The total tonnage of anthracite coal from all the regions, for the week ending on the 8th, amounted to 540,480 tons, or 81,623 tons more than for the corresponding week last year. The trade continues to near a normal degree of respect.

Sheep were dull and lower; 17,000 head sold at the different yards at 3 a 5 cts., and lambs at 4 a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per 100 lbs. Dogs were rather numerous, but at the different yards, \$1 a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb., as to condition. Cows were unchanged; 250 head arrived and sold at \$30 a \$55 per head.

FOREIGN.—The Manchester Guardian states the production of pig iron at Cleveland has increased from 1,000,000 tons in 1876 to 1,500,000 tons in 1879, and has been no more than an equivalent increase in shipments.

Of 120 passengers on the steamer St. Louis, which left Liverpool on the 12th inst. for New Orleans, nearly all were bound for Texas. A number of them were farmers, some with families, others were mechanics.

Advices from Scotland afford ground for the belief, that the American demand for iron has temporarily slackened. The shipments from Scotland last week, to all parts of the world, were 10,100 tons, against an average in previous months of more than 22,000 tons weekly.

Two weeks ago, the creditors of the Glasgow Bank received their third dividend, making 134.44 on the pound out of the total. Of the total £11,000,000, £7,100,000 is paid. It is expected the whole amount will be liquidated, but the interest is doubtful.

Advices from the United Kingdom of Great Britain do not give the impression of hard times in that trade. In six months 196 steamers, of 27,436 gross tonnage, and 19 sailing vessels of 18,165 gross tonnage, were built in the Newcastle and Glasgow districts, the latter including the Clyde.

The St. Petersburg Times says: The editors of all the principal newspapers in St. Petersburg have recently been summoned to the Press Bureau of the Ministry of the Interior, and instructed with reference to the conduct of their respective papers. They were informed the frequent complaints have been received from the Imperial policy, and therefore must not be continued in the same strain. Neither Germany, nor Austro-Hungary, nor the relations of Russia with either of those Powers, nor the treaty between these two Powers, nor France, must be discussed. England may be mentioned, but only in connection with the war. The continued unity of the emperor's return to St. Petersburg, month hence.

A $3,000,900 floating dock, of capacity to accommodate eight ships of the largest tonnage, was opened on the 10th of last month at Bordeaux. The shipping of the port has greatly increased since 1857, and its steam tonnage exceeds 600,000 tons.

It is reported from Berlin that diphtheria, which for several years has made great ravages in Russia, is gaining ground. Eleven vast districts are afflicted with the disease, and the percentage of deaths for a month past has been alarmingly great. The Government has appointed a special commission to enquire into the causes of the epidemic.

The sinking of the deep artesian well near Buspesth, Hungary, is now completed. It is said to be the deepest in the world, having cost $200 feet. The yield of water was at first 272,000 gallons in 24 hours, but has since reduced to 167,200 gallons. The temperature of the water is 165 degrees.

The total exports of tea from Shanghai and Hanko to St. Petersburg, since the opening of the season, were 13,000,000 against 14,000,000 for the same period of last year. The shipments of Canton silks to Euro were 9,700 tons, against 6,900 last year.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

New Franklin, (Twenty-third Ward), Philadelphia.—The Board of Managers of the Friends' Asylum for the Insane, Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED.—At Friends' meeting-house, Springfield, Vt., on the 9th mo. 22d, 1879, ZACARIA TERRY, Winona, Ohio, to MARY B. YOUNG, of the former place.

DIED.—at the residence of his son, Seth Shaw, on the 25th of 9th month, 1879, SAMUEL SHAW, in the 69th year of his age, an elder and member of Middleton Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends, Ohio. He was a devoted member of the Society, and held by our religious Society, and concerned that the might be maintained on their ancient foundation. His example and precept he bore a testimony against extravagance in furniture or apparel, or any improper use of the means committed to his care. He bore a painful illness with patience and resignation; meekness and contrition being the clothing of his spirit; and was enabled to give suitable counsel and encouragement to a family and friends, saying in reference thereto, "I could do nothing of himself." A few days before his death he said, "I have no more to do with this world, and I trust I am in a habitu." It is the Lord, let him do as seemeth him good.

—, on the 11th of 10th mo. 1879, ABEL H. GEORGE, aged 60 years and a few days, a beloved minister and member of Middleton Monthly and Carmel Particular Meetings of Friends, Ohio. He was a diligent and faithful in the exercise of his gift for many years, and had often been concerned to advise friends to prepare for death whilst in health, and to treat them not to defer to a dying hour the great work of the soul's salvation; and she had felt the necessity of this for herself, as well as for others. When the trial and sufferings of dissolution came on, they did not find her unprepared; she said she felt nothing in her way and often spoke of the goodness and mercy of a Heavenly Father to her, a poor unworthy creature whom He had redeemed out of a world lying in wickedness. Before her decease she said to the Board of Friends: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He leadeth me beside the still waters of life. Yes, though I now walk thro' the valley and shadow of death, I fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. Inasmuch as thou art with me, and thou art the living branch of that true and living vine, O Jesus. May her bright example through life, and a triumphant death, be an incentive to us that are but a little longer, to use all diligence in works of piety and devotion. Let us always be ready, that, as we believe, and as her experience, we may be into that state where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary soul is forever at rest."

Incidents and Reflections.

DIVINE GUIDANCE.

"O house of Jacob, come ye and let us walk in the light of the Lord!" Those who heed his exhortation of the prophet Isaiah will find the Light of the Lord so to shine on the path in which they ought to walk, as to show them what to do and what to leave undone; and will be guided as to the time and manner of performing those duties which are pointed out to them.

When Anna Shipton was residing in a rural district in England, her lodgings, she says, overlooked the garden of a pretty ornamental cottage of a tradesman of the neighboring town. I had often watched with interest the young wife and children as I sat in the twilight. It took no lengthened observation to discover that Jesus had no place in the little household, and I prayed for them.

"The time arrived for me to leave the place. The night previous to my departure, soon after I had retired to rest, I was awakened by severe suffering, followed by rapid exhaustion. I lay awake marvelling how and why I should have had this sudden return of an illness from which I appeared to have recovered. The night wore away before I began to cry to Him in whose hands are the issues of life and death, and to inquire if I might know why it was thus with me.

"It was distinctly brought to my mind, that the family for whom I had prayed had never received any testimony from me that God cared for their souls.

"I had been content to believe that He would in some way bless them through my prayer; but 'faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.' James ii. 17. There had been no confession with my lips in testimony of his love and of his power to save. It was all true. I knew that I needed arousing to a sense of my negligence and carelessness in service.

"I accepted the reproof, made confession of my slothfulness, and praised the tender love that would not let me leave my place without the blessing He had ordained for me. For 'all things that are reprov'd are made manifest by the light; for whatsoever doth make manifest is light.' Eph. v. 13.

"I rejoiced in it; and to fit me to do the will of the Lord, I prayed for a deep healing sleep.

According to my prayer it was granted me. Can any one who loves the Lord believe that, after a few hours of profound slumber, I awoke refreshed and well, with no recollection of the prayer that had brought it, and the dealing of the Holy Spirit with my soul no more impressed on my conscience than a fleeting vision of the night? Delighted with being sufficiently recovered to undertake the journey, I decided to complete my arrangements for leaving in the afternoon. But God had not forgotten his faithless child. I lost all my energy; began to vacillate as to whether the journey should be undertaken at all; and became restless and distressed.

"I sat listlessly at the drawing-room window. The cottage met my sight, and that night-watch of mercy and forgiveness neglected rolled like a cloud over my desolate heart.

"The upper casements of the cottage were closely curtained. I had casually heard that there was sickness in the house. The children were at a neighbor's. I missed them from their sunny garden. The mother I had seen pass to and fro. It was, then, the husband who was laid low.

"I asked the Lord to let some one come to the door, as a sign that I should go over. The door remained closed; no one went in or out; all seemed still as death.

"I opened my Bible: it was a dead letter to me. No line of promise, no word of encouragement, beamed on my trembling soul; the shadow waxed deeper and darker. Once more I sat before the Lord and reviewed the past in his light, and then there came the conviction that I had no right to ask for any sign in a path clearly pointed out to me: the promises were for the upright and pure in heart, and not for the fool who turns aside to his crooked ways.

"'Whosoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.' It is not for us to say, 'I felt,' or 'I thought,' when God has said, 'This is the way; walk ye in it.' I threw on my shawl and walked rapidly to the cottage, rather with a dread of something befalling me than with any other impulse.

"All was quiet without and within: it would have been a relief if it had not been so. I knocked and knocked again, and was thankful for the long interval that elapsed before any one appeared. During that time the numbered mercies of my much-forgiving God flowed over my mind and melted my hard heart. I could realize his gracious care over his erring child. My courage until then had quite failed me.

"At last the servant opened the door; and I, who had tarried on the threshold as a servant who unwillingly obeys a master's command, crossed with a light, joyous step, as the privileged child of the King of heaven, the bearer of his message of grace.

"I inquired for the mistress; she came down stairs and spoke to me in the passage, evidently not expecting me to enter. She told me that her husband, who had been dangerously ill, was better. When she found that I did not leave she invited me into the parlor.

"I looked around. Everything clearly indicated that its occupants had no knowledge of Him who was so gracious to me. I had no time to lose. I spoke to her at once of the love of God to her. As I proceeded, a deeper and deeper interest was expressed in her countenance; and the tears, that started at my declaration of his love to her, fell unheeded as she sat absorbed in the one great fact that came as a startling message to her ear, that the Lord waited to be gracious to her! She was overwhelmed with awe and wonder that God could have put into the heart of a stranger first to pray for her and her children, and then to come into her house and tell her that he loved her.

"The short but dangerous sickness of her husband had softened and subdued her spirit, and thus I have opened the door of her heart for the King of glory to come in. She dried her eyes and looked in my face with a grateful smile, as she said slowly, like one awaking from a dream,

"It is as if an angel had come down from heaven to tell me all this and make me think of God."

"I walked down the garden path with a full heart; the carriage was waiting in the road to convey me to the train. Leaning over the gate, watching me to the last, stood the young mother, with one child in her arms and the other clinging to her side. She was joined by an elderly woman, to whom she seemed to be relating our interview, if I might judge by her evident emotion; and then the bend of the road hid them from my sight. I look to meet her in the land where sickness and tears have no place, and where the will of God is done perfectly.

"We hear much of 'silent testimony,' but we must not shelter our supineness and cowardice under a false name. All testimony for God must come from the Holy Spirit, and we must offer our lips for speech or silence, as he may ordain. The heart will realize that the silence is offered as service at his command, as much as when it delightedly exclaims, 'My tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise all the day long.' 'That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works.'"

As to the reality, certainty, and value of this Divine Guidance, the same writer remarks: "We cannot abide in Christ unless the Holy Spirit is abiding in us. How otherwise are we to be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding? 'What man is he that feareth the Lord? him shall He teach in the way that He shall choose.' How will He teach him? Certainly not by carnal means, but by the Comforter, who the Lord Jesus promised should lead his people into all truth."

"The work and agency of the Holy Spirit seem to be the special truth against which the wiles of antichrist are directed."

"It is one of the saddest things in our day to see those who are professedly servants of the Lord not desiring to know the power of the Holy Spirit experimentally in themselves; doubting it where it is unmi-takably before them; and lending all their influence to prevent others from seeking after the gift of God, by which alone they can glorify Him.

"Whence arises the desire of knowing the will of God? From whom the patience to suffer it? From whom the light to read therein the messages to the soul? From whom the impression on the mind, which, prayerfully and faithfully accepted, leads on to service and blessing? How is the believer to grow in grace without the power of the Spirit?"

As we come to wait for the Light of the Lord, and to walk in obedience thereto, we will find the impressions made on our minds valuable to guide us even in outward matters. Incidents of this nature are frequently met with. John Chureman relates, that when going from Horsham, in Pennsylvania, to an appointed meeting at some distance, the company of the person sent with him as a guide was so unpleasant that he persuaded the man to turn back. Not knowing the road to the house, he became thoughtful lest he might miss the way, and the Friends whom he had left be blamed for neglect of duty. He says:

"As I was thus pondering in my mind, faith arose that Providence could direct, and that moment I saw the track of a man who had crossed the road we were in, and felt a sudden turn of mind to follow the same, which made me quite easy. It brought us to a field, where we found the fence down on both sides, and led to the house where Friends were gathered; and we were not discovered to be without a guide, for which I was thankful, believing it to be the secret direction of kind Providence, and not barely chance. I relate this with a view to excite such who may meet with difficulties, to rely on Him who alone can show the way, and give faith to follow; but man must be humble and quiet in mind, to understand the inward, gentle sense that Truth favors with."

War.—C. Spurgeon in addressing an English audience, thus speaks of the recent African and Indian wars in which that country has been engaged. "We have invaded one country and then another, with no better justification than the law of superior force, or the suspicion of future danger. Disaster has followed upon the heels of disaster, and at the end of it all there are great expenses to be met. Our acts of aggression must be paid for, not only with the blood of the soldiers, but with the sinews and sweat of our working men. Results of industry which ought to have gone to support the arts and promote the comfort and advancement of the race, have been thrown away in wasteful feuds of arms. The food which should have fed our children has been flung into the mouth of the lion to be devoured by war, that its evil spirit may become yet more ravenous. Woful waste, it is to be feared, will be followed by woful want, unless God in his mercy shall interpose. We have meddled in many things, and have threatened at least three of the great quarters of the globe either with our fleet or our armies. Nothing could content us till we had drawn the sword against a brave though savage people, whose fighting may well be fierce, since it is for their invaded fatherland. These wars, whatever their issue, are serious calamities.

For "The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

1861. 2d mo. 10th. Had a comfortable meeting, though very unworthy. I felt unwell yesterday with a heavy cold, which I hope may be a blessing to me and I be more religiously guarded and watchful, which is much needed. I esteem it a great blessing that I am not forsaken; that a kind Providence, in his mercy, is still pleased to visit me; were it not for his long forbearance and great mercy, I could have no hope.

2d mo. 20th. Our Select Quarterly Meeting was held on the 15th, it was pretty comfortable. On the 16th the Quarterly Meeting was held, which I trust was favored with the presence of the great and holy Head, an unmerited favor and cause for gratitude and encouragement; may I not trifle with his mercy. I was appointed representative in each of those meetings to the Yearly Meeting; may it deeply humble me, and may I endeavor to be worthy of the trust reposed in me; may I be faithful to the Great Head of the Church, and comparable to the clay in the hands of the potter.

3rd mo. 10th. Yesterday in meeting my mind was much favored, and I hope experienced in measure a qualification to worship; and I trust I have almost daily experienced something of the blessing. Oh! the necessity of keeping the eye single, endeavoring to live near the Great Head of the Church in whom there is life, light and strength, and in serving Him there is sweet peace.

10th mo. 17th. I am quite indisposed from rheumatism in my back and hips; went to meeting, used two canes to walk from the wagon into the meeting-house; I felt almost discouraged from attempting it, but was most easy to go; had a very comfortable meeting, and returned better. I hope this indisposition may be received as a blessing, and that I may improve from it. I have in unmerited mercy been enabled to feel love to my Divine Master, and I trust been favored at seasons to draw near to Him; may I be enabled to love and serve Him better, for He is forever worthy.

1862. 1st mo. 15th. Left home to go to Tunnessassa by an appointment of the Indian Committee, having for some time past felt an increased interest in their welfare. Joseph Elkinton, T. V. and C. L., left on the 14th; C. B. joined them at Canton Corners—the latter to assist in the house at Tunnessassa—C. L. to teach the Indian children in school. T. V. expects to stay a time to assist as may be needed. The cars made their connection until we got to Williamsport, where we had to wait an hour for the train by the Catawissa road; got to Elmira about 11 o'clock at night; stopped at the Delavan Temperance House; went to bed and got a short but refreshing sleep; left Elmira about 4.40 A. M., got to Salamanca little after 11 A. M. Took cars on the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad and went to Cold Spring; met with several Indians—they seemed kind and pleased to see me; called to see Benj. Williams and wife, they have sorrowfully fallen from what they once appeared to be,—a warning to others of the bad effects of intemperance. John Ray and son Andrew, helped me across the river little below Cold Spring. I felt very anxious to get to Tunnessassa, where I could enjoy the company of my friends and the comforts of home. I was kindly received by friends, and was glad, and I trust in a degree thankful that I was favored to get away safely.

17th. Went up to Elsie Plagg's to make some inquiry in relation to what would be customary terms to let a mill to make lumber with the privilege of cutting the logs on the place. He thought we ought to get two-fifths the man who cut the logs and made the lumber three-fifths.

18th was spent in attending to business at Tunnessassa.

19th. Sat meeting with the family and Indian children. The children behaved in becoming way, and to me it was a comfortable meeting.

20th. Crossed on the ice in some fear and called at Owen Blacksnake's, Harrison Halltown's, George Jacob's, Wm. Patterson's and widow Blacksnake's, and returned home to Tunnessassa.

21st. Went across the ice on foot; got Owen Blacksnake's horse and John Jimmerson's sleigh, and went to Corplanter's; had pretty satisfactory visit at David Gordon's met Wm. O'Bail and wife at Charles O'Bail's, also some other Indians. William's wife said she remembered what I had said to her many years ago, after the death of her son. Had pleasant visit with old Charles O'Bail,—he seems an innocent old man; Jas. Cooper was my interpreter; returned home in the evening; the ice was weak to walk upon, I was good-deal afraid to cross, and was I trust thankful when I got safe over. A Blackbur crossed after me, and I felt some anxiety of his account.

22d. The ice was cut in the river for the ferryboat to cross.

23d. Sat meeting with the family, Indian children, Jas. Watt and wife, and John Watt's widow, an aged woman. I felt glad of the opportunity of sitting with them. In the afternoon, Jos. Elkinton, T. V., C. L. and myself attended a Council near Little Valley—a good many Indians attended. Joseph spoke to them on the subjects of letting their land to white men, temperance, education, &c., pretty satisfactory opportunity. * * *

27th. Started for home, did not feel quite easy in mind to leave without visiting the Indians at Horse-shoe. When J. E. and I got to Steamburg, neither of us felt as if we were clear of the Indians, and felt that it would be safest to return to Tunnessassa and stay over another day and finish before leaving. It felt to me much the most comfortable to do so. Joseph went to Corplanter's and I up the reservation. R. Blacksnake took me in sleigh or sled. Called to see Julia Jimmerson a young married woman who had been educated at Friends' school at Tunnessassa, was comforted with the visit; spent some time with Isaac Halltown, in which I felt my mind much relieved; made calls to see other Indians to comfort and satisfaction. Was disappointed in getting on the car that evening and Joseph went on to Elmira and waited for me. I have thought my disappointment was all for good. I left the reservation feeling pretty clear of the Indians.

Watch ye, stand fast in the faith.

A True History of a Converted Jew.

Some years since, a learned Jew converted to Christianity came to this country, accredited with letters of high authority as a man of piety, cast off from his people for forsaking their religion. He was unique beyond almost any one we have met; but with many allings, time proved him to be no impostor. He retained the whole family name, and greatly prized it, as indicating undisputed lineage from the patriarchs.

JUDAH-BEN ISAAC-BEN ABRAHAM.

He was born and educated among the Jews in London, and afterward took a position in the mercantile house of his uncle in Italy. His widowed mother exerted all her powers to give him a complete education. He was master of many languages, ancient and modern. The Hebrew was almost like his vernacular. In his closet devotions, earnest supplications were often overheard in that mysterious tongue. He was familiar with the Old Testament, having commenced studying it in the original as soon as he could read. When arrayed in the vestments of the synagogue—the broad hemmed garment, the phylactery, &c.—his expressive gesticulations, dark hair, eyes, and complexion, and Jewish features, represented a genuine Orientalist.

He described how, like Paul, he had been trained "an Hebrew of the Hebrews," "after the most straitest sect," with extreme contempt for the Gentile race. He was taught to spit on hearing the name of Jesus of Nazareth. In his boyhood, he had seen windows and doors thrown open at the Jewish Feasts, for the possible coming of the Son of Man. Some stray leaves of a New Testament accidentally fell into his hands, he looked over them with curiosity, and was entertained with their story—nothing more. But one day, while reading the Bible, his eyes fastened on the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. A new revelation dawned upon him. He was struck with a remarkable resemblance between the description of "the Man of Sorrows" and the half-forgotten story of the evangelists. Was it really the same? He read on. The other prophecies were invested with a new interest? He was eager to see a New Testament entire—for he could not rid himself of his impressions, and his mind found no rest. By perseverance he succeeded in stealthily securing a copy. It was a book strictly prohibited by the Jews, and he read at his peril. Open doors and windows were on all sides of the counting house, and he was never alone, day or night. The New Testament was kept concealed in his desk, and glanced at under the raised cover of the lid. Alone, without instruction, without sympathy, he came to the full belief that one "numbered with the transgressors" had been crucified on Calvary between two thieves, that the sufferer of whom Philip read to the Ethiopian, "led as a sheep to the slaughter," was the one designated by John as "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world."

His conflict was, however, severe. An avowal of conversion involved the loss of family, position, means of support, and what is perhaps hardest of all to a Jew—recognition as a true Israelite. But his sentiments could not be repressed. The "glad tidings" of great joy" must be proclaimed at all hazards. One lovely summer's evening, when he had returned to his native England, he persuaded his mother to walk with him by a hawthorn hedge, whose blossoms had put out, and filled the air with fragrance. He told his story simply, in a way he hoped might be conciliatory. But she sprang him from her, tore her garments till her cap lay in shreds upon the ground. With violent gesticulations she exclaimed: "Have I lived to see this day! I am of mine the follower of Jesus of Nazareth!" And he was banished from her companionship, exiled from all his kindred. No epithet, no term of reproach was too bitter. He left his country, and came to the United States.

The perplexities of the Jew, poring in solitude over the prophecies, remind us of the anxious throes that followed Jesus Christ as He taught in the streets or Temple, wondering if He were the true Messiah. May there not still be other Israelites desiring like him to see Jesus, and longing for a joy like Simon's—at the revelation of the Holy Spirit—when in the Temple he took the infant Saviour in his arms, devoutly blessing God, and saying: "Mine eyes have seen Thy salvation!"—"A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Thy people Israel!"—Sarah Gould.

For "The Friend."

[The following valuable letter of our late dear friend, Charles Evans, was written a few months before his decease. The recipient suggests that a part of it might with advantage be published in "The Friend," for the counsel and encouragement of others similarly situated.—EDITOR.]

Philadelphia, 1st mo. 22d, 1879.

Dear Friend,—Thy letter of the 13th inst. was handed to me a few days since. I have read it with interest, and can sympathize with thee in the tried condition thou describest thyself to be in. In the present lapsed state of our religious Society, it can hardly be otherwise than that those who feel themselves conscientiously bound to maintain the truths of the Gospel as ever held by Friends, will have to suffer with their Lord and Master; and will find it needful to carry out the injunction given to his immediate followers when personally on earth, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves." As these are watchful to keep closely under his guidance, in humility and godly fear, He will instruct them when and where to put forth a hand to steady the Ark of the Testimony, and will give them tongue and utterance which their adversaries will not be able to gainsay.

This has been the experience of the true disciples in all ages of the Church, when the multitude seemed bent on digging down the altars and slaying the anointed prophets; and the Shepherd of Israel, by his own power, has always preserved a Seed that shall serve Him, and be accounted by Him for a generation on which his blessing will rest.

As thou art a stranger to me, and I have no particular knowledge of the meeting or members in —, I have no special advice to give thee except what the tenor of that already written indicates, and to express my sincere desire that if enlisted in the Lamb's army thou may be enabled to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, and daily seek a qualification to weep as from the porch and the altar crying, Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thy heritage to reproach. Thy friend,

CHARLES EVANS.

Tyndall on Religion and Science.

[A correspondent sends us the enclosed article, cut from the North American, which appears to him to be an appropriate sequel to some former essays which have appeared in "The Friend."]—

Physical science can never satisfy the soul, and evolution is still a mere hypothesis, judging from the latest utterance of so eminent a scientist as Prof. John Tyndall. He writes thus in the last number of the Fortnightly Review: "If asked to deduce from the physical interaction of the brain-molecules the least of the phenomena of sensation or thought, we must acknowledge our helplessness. The mechanical philosopher, as such, will never place a state of consciousness and a group of molecules in the relation of mover and moved. In passing from the one to the other we meet a blank which the logic of deduction is unable to fill. Physical considerations do not lead to the final explanation of all that we feel and know. We meet a problem which transcends any conceivable expansion of the powers which we now possess."

"Having thus exhausted physics and reached its very rim, a mighty mystery still looms beyond us. We have, in fact, made no step toward its solution. We try to soar in a vacuum when we endeavor to pass by logical deduction from the one to the other. Religious feeling is as much a verity as any other part of human consciousness; and against it, on its subjective side, the waves of science bent in vain. I could see that his (Carlyle's) contention at bottom always was that the human soul has claims and yearnings which physical science cannot satisfy."

"It seemed high time to Virchow to enter an energetic protest against the attempts that are made to proclain the problems of research as actual facts, and the opinions of scientists as established science. We ought not, Virchow urges, to represent our conjecture as a certainty nor our hypothesis as a doctrine. The burden of my writings in this connection is as much a recognition of the weakness of science as an assertion of its strength. If asked whether science has solved, or is likely in our day to solve, the problem of the universe, I must shake my head in doubt. Behind and above and around us the real mystery of the universe lies unsolved, and, as far as we are concerned, is incapable of solution. The problem of the connection of body and soul is as insoluble in its modern form as it was in the pre-scientific ages. There ought to be a clear distinction made between science in the state of hypothesis and science in the state of fact. And inasmuch as it is still in its hypothetical stage, the ban of exclusion ought to fall upon the theory of evolution."

"After speaking of the theory of evolution applied to the primitive condition of matter, as belonging to the dim twilight of conjecture, the certainty of experimental inquiry is here shut out. Those who hold the doctrine of evolution only yield to it a provisional assent, and they will frankly admit their inability to point to any satisfactory experimental proof that life can be developed save from demonstrable antecedent life. I share Virchow's opinion that the theory of evolution in its complete form involves the assumption that at some period or other of the earth's history, there occurred what would now be called spontaneous generation. I agree with him that the proofs of it are still wanting. I hold with Virehow that the failures have been lamentable—"that the doctrine is utterly discredited."

How to Attract People to Christ.

A writer in The British Friend alludes to the idea, that the Divine Truth in its plainness and simplicity will not be attractive to the people, and says:—

"This sentiment is the one which leads to the abandonment of Quaker modes of action in our day. To this I answer (1), the simple, unadorned, and unadulterated truth and way of God is adapted to every class in every age, as it has been proved to be whenever men have had sufficient confidence in it to put it in practice; (2), it will offend the frivolous and self-satisfied mind, and always did; but this is the first step to healing and restoration. It is the way of the Cross; the Gospel must not comfort, but bruise and break down the natural man. Christ himself hesitated not to say such things as drove away by degrees almost all of those crowds who seemed about to become his subjects, and lost Him the adherence of most moral professors, who were beginning to follow and commend Him. His message was to be the same uncompromising one to all, though they should be offended; and the Saviour, when met with, is to the carnal mind, a stone of stumbling and rock of offence still.

The only true or lasting attractiveness of religion must be its own transforming heavenly power; where this is manifested in a meeting or a people, souls will flock as doves to their windows and there will no longer be complaints leading to the adoption of superficial, human attractions in the vain attempt to supply the felt lack of God's presence by designs of our own. These, on the other hand, will never gather a Church or revive one, though they may win a concourse for a time to listen with the outward ear and be interested or amused. The true worshippers are gathered by the Spirit himself, and meet in and look to Him, not to outward delights or vari-eties. Their peace, glory, and happiness are within, and that which attracts the senses, troubles these by drawing their spirits outwards, and so disturbing the deep rest of their souls in God. If then, any would make Christian truth and efforts "attractive," let them seek and obtain the mighty power of the Spirit, and they will become as a light upon a candlestick, and a city upon a hill.

Victorious Reading.—The unrestrained use of Public Libraries, which usually abound in novels and sensational literature, is thus commented on in Zion's Herald: "With the privilege of taking books freely from the library, young people, without properly cultivated tastes or home restraints, fall into the most shocking license as to the character and number of the volumes drawn from those free shelves. As the result of careful inquiry, in one of our best schools, young girls from twelve to eighteen have been found to take out from four to six novels a week, many of them of the most trashy, sensational and exciting character. Of course they are read upon the jump, with no awakened interest in the style of the writer or the traits of character illustrated, but simply to secure the mental excitement growing out of the story, and especially of its dramatic close. The record of the books rendered in by one school of young ladies as their reading for the previous week was really appalling.

"Any intelligent person can see how serious the injury of such a course must be to every department of the youth's being—physical, mental and moral. It must break in upon proper recreation, destroy his interest in, and ability to command attention to his studies; it must destroy his enjoyment of substantial literature and all investigations into the thousand inviting avenues of natural science; it must waste and pervert his sensibilities, give him wrong views of life, weaken his moral fibre, and expose him to many fatal temptations. One of the most faithful and conscientious of teachers, in her apprehensions of the evils involved, and her personal experience in her classes of the consequences of a free use of unselected reading, although very fond of general literature herself, said that one of the greatest evils her school had to contend with was the public library.

"The Sunday school library is a terrible embarrassment. There are some ten or fifteen thousand volumes, largely works of fiction, written for children, and found, in various proportions of religious and secular stories, upon the shelves of our Sunday school libraries. If they should all perish in one grand conflagration, it would be little loss, and a great positive gain to the world. The Sunday school aids but little in training up good readers; it rather cultivates the sensational appetite and prepares the way for exciting works of fiction.

"Outward advantages often make one less watchful; and it is not in proportion to the external, that the internal work goes on."

INDIAN SUMMER.

Softly and dreamily floateth the blue
Of the Indian Summer the atmosphere through—
Drowsily lingers on forest and hill,
The spirit of the sunset so ethereally still—
The gold of her sunshine falls mellowed in beam,
Thro' the veil that enrobes her, on woodland and stream.
The Sabbath is come of the swift rolling year;
The calm, and the rest, and the silence are here;
The worship of Nature, from leaf-covered sod,
Like incense offering, goes up into God;
Her tolling is over, her fruitage is done,
She hath gained the repose that her labor hath won;
She hath cast her abundance from mountain to shore,
The wealth of the season in basket and store;
And now, like the Christian, whose toll has been long,
Who hath valiantly battled with evil and wrong,
Pauses to feel in the quietest night,
The heavenly dew from the Day-spring on high;
Though knowing that still in the pathway before,
Trouble and danger lie waiting in store;
So the spirit of Nature seems pausing to rest,
Ere the storm-clouds of Winter swoop over her breast,
And gathers around her the warmest of beams,
The softest of lights, and the fairest of dreams.
And thus, have I thought, there are lives here below,
Whose symbol is found in this calmness and glow;
Like the Christian, whose toll has been long,
Who hath valiantly battled with evil and wrong,
The burdens that fall unto mortals a while;
Who brightly and bravely have labored to fill
Their measure of good thro' their portion of ill,
Who have shed light around thro' their long golden prime.

And hence the rich fruits in their Autumn of time;
But we find, as they draw near the close of their year,
Where the freshness and greenness of life disappear,
When the blossoms are gone, and the withered leaves fall.

The Indian Summer the glory of all—
The crown of their days, as they trustingly wait
On the threshold of Death for the open pearl gate,
Now touched with a beauty we saw not before,
A radiance cast from a far brighter shore
Serenely and peacefully passing away
Through the shadowy vale to the portals of Day.

GOD IS IN HEAVEN.

G. PARTBIDGE.

God is in heaven, and can He hear
A feeble prayer like mine?
Yes, little child, thou needst not fear,
He listens now to thine.

God is in heaven, and can He see
When I am doing wrong?
Yes, little child, thou needst not see
All day and all night long.

God is in heaven, and would He know
If I should tell a lie?
Yes, if thou saidst it ever so low,
He'd hear it in the sky.

God is in heaven, and can I go
To thank Him for his care?
Not yet; but love Him here below,
And thou shalt praise Him there.

ECHO.

I stood on the bank of a swift flowing river,
While I marked its clear current roll speedily past,
It seemed to my fancy forever repeating
That the dearest enjoyments of life would not last.
Oh! tell me, I pray, rapid stream of the valley,
That bears in its course the blue waters away,
Can the joys of life's morning awake but to vanish?
Can the feelings of love be all doomed to decay?
An Echo replied—"All doomed to decay."

Flow on in thy course, rapid stream of the valley,
Since the pleasures of life we so quickly resign,
My heart shall rejoice in the wild scenes of nature
And friendship's delights, while they yet may be mine.

Must all the sweet charms of mortality perish?
And friendship's endearments—Ah! will they no stay?
The simple enchantments of soft blooming nature,
And the pleasures of mind—must they too fade away?
The Echo slow answered—"They too fade away."

Then where, I exclaimed, is the hope for the mourner
A balm for his sorrow, a smile for his grief?
If beautiful scenes like the present shall vanish,
Where—where shall we seek, for a certain relief?
Oh! thy sad way, I pray, of thy seasons,
Believe in his mercy, for pardon now pray;
With him there is fitness of joy and salvation,
Thy gladness shall live and shall never decay.
The Echo said sweetly—"Shall never decay."

The Kinds of Custody Recognized by Roman Law.—Acts xxiv, 23.—A Roman governor on judge was bound to permit no longer delay than was absolutely necessary in the trial of a prisoner after his arrest; but it was at his discretion to fix the time and place, and also to settle in what form of custody the prisoner should be detained. Roman law recognized three forms. 1. The prisoner might be confined in the public jails (custodia publica); this was the most severe kind, the common jails being loathsome dungeons, where the prisoners were kept in chains, or even bound in positions of torture. We have an illustration of this kind of custody in the treatment of Paul and Silas at Philippi. 2. The prisoner might have some well-known person made responsible for his appearance when called on. This is like our liberation on bail, and was called free custody (custodia libera); but this kind of detention was reserved exclusively for men of high rank. 3. The prisoner might be committed to the charge of a soldier, who was responsible with his own life for the safe keeping of his prisoner. This was called military custody (custodia militaris), and was introduced at the beginning of the Imperial age. The prisoner was secured by a species of handcuff, a chain attaching the prisoner's right hand to the soldier's left. The soldiers would relieve one another and the prisoner would live with them in their guard-room, or barracks, but in some cases a private house was allowed. To this species of custody the apostle Paul was subjected at Cesarea.—Biblical Things Not Generally Known.

An Interesting Incident.

A writer in the Primitive Christian gives the following account of a Christian woman, with whom he was acquainted. She related to me on her death bed, that at eight years of age she heard the relation of a worldly transaction, an auction, in which a family of slaves were divided and sold to different purchasers. Her feelings were so overpowered that she sought the grove to give vent to them, and then she prayed that God would destroy slavery. She did not understand anything more than that a great wrong existed. God was good, and had power, and she from that moment had faith that some time slavery would come to an end. (This death bed scene occurred early in the year 1863.)

And "now," says she, "the time is coming," "this war will end slavery."

"But," said I, "dear, this war has not been instituted to destroy slavery; it is the result of angry passions; it is wickedness growing into suffering and woe; neither party is fighting for freedom of the slave." This dear old aunt lay silent a while; she was 80 years of age, and suffered much, but amid all her suffering she thought of the slave.

With emphasis, after a solemn silence, she cried, "But God will so over-rule that to end, for years I have prayed for their delivery, and now the time has come. I have sympathized deeply with the suffering during this war, and the Lord only knows what yet must be endured, but I see the deliverance of the slave in the end, and the sooner the proclamation is made, the sooner will the agony of the war be over." This dear old saint closed her eyes in the Spring of 1863 (without hearing the gracious proclamation, (the proclamation was signed in January but proclaimed in September 1863), but died with the full assurance that it would be.

A Capital Prescription.—A rather eccentric eminent physician was called to attend a middle-aged rich lady who had imaginary ills. After many wise inquiries about her symptoms and manner of life he asked for a piece of paper, and wrote down the following prescription: "Do something for somebody."

In the gravest manner he handed it to the patient and left. The doctor heard nothing from the lady for a long time. On Christmas morning he was hastily summoned to the cottage of her Irish washer-woman.

"It's not meself, doctor, it's me wrist that's ailing. Ye see, I was after goin' out into the black darkness for a few bits of wood, when me foot struck this basket. It stood there, like a big murex, as it was, full of soft flannel from — Walker. She told me that your medicine cured her, doctor. So, if you plaze to put a little of that same on me wrist, I'll be none the worse for me nice present."

"It is a powerful remedy," said the doctor gravely. And more than once in after years he wrote the prescription, "Do something for somebody."

Hard and Difficult.—How hard it is to be tolerant when others differ from us! and how difficult to be charitable when one's own view of things is not followed.

William Penn a Member of Falls Monthly Meeting.

The minutes of Falls Monthly Meeting show that Penn was an attendant and recognized as a member. At the meeting in the 8th month, 1701, John Satchar and Mary Loftis proposed their intentions of marriage with each other. A committee was appointed to make the usual inquiries as to their clearness from other marriage engagements. They were members of the governor's household. He was about to return to England, leaving them in charge of his affairs at Pennsbury. He stated this to the meeting, and further said the season and shipping required his speedy departure, and it would be a satisfaction to him to see the marriage accomplished before he went. The meeting favoring his request appointed a special adjourned meeting the next week to hear the report of the committee. The minutes further state that "the governor being present, and a member of this meeting, acquainted us of his intention to start for England in a short time: It was therefore agreed that Phineas Pemberton, Joseph Kirkbridge, Richard Hough and Samuel Dark draw up a certificate concerning him, to be in readiness against this day week."

At the adjourned meeting "a certificate on the governor's behalf was read in the meeting and approved, and ordered to be signed by those here, and the meeting being but small it was agreed that those absent Friends that were desirous to sign it should have their liberty."

John and Mary then again proposed their intentions of marriage, and produced certificates of their orderly lives before they came over. The committee reported them clear of other engagements, and they were given permission to proceed. The minutes do not show when or where the marriage took place. It was no doubt at Pennsbury, and in the presence of the governor. "The parties to it were his trusted servants, and were left in charge of the Pennsbury mansion and land on his departure for England. The next year Satchar was also granted a certificate from the meeting on an intended visit to England. Whether he went does not appear. If he did he soon returned and resumed his residence in the manor. He became an active member and an elder in the Society, and was a useful man in the community. Three of his daughters were married at Falls Meeting, and have left descendants among the present residents of the county. If Penn could have remained a member of Falls and a resident of Pennsbury, how much more comfortable and happy would have been his after life.

A meeting for worship was for many years held at the manor house. It was no doubt established by Penn himself. When it was discontinued we do not know. In the Second month, 1689, it was reported to the monthly meeting that the governor's house was likely to be given up, and few or none were there to receive the meeting, which was therefore directed to be thereafter held at the house of William Biles. But the difficulty seems to have been soon removed, for in the Eleventh month following the meeting was directed to be again held at Pennsbury. It probably was continued there until the governor's second visit to Pennsylvania, when he was a witness to the marriage of John Satchar. There for the last time he met his friends of Falls Meeting, gave them his parting advice, and went forth from thence to England, carrying with him their certificate of unity and followed by their prayers for his welfare.—Bucks Co. Intelligence.

The Writings of Ancient Friends.

These works remain monuments of the mental and physical labors performed by our forefathers in the Truth; and of the moral and religious victories which they achieved. They show the inner life and active zeal, and noble disinterestedness, of our early Friends; the principles they held; the ground-work and scriptural basis of the Quaker faith; and are a storehouse of good sense, and a fund of argument, fact, illustration, and precept. There they are, lying on the shelves unread,—often looked upon as rubbish—constantly sent to the mills to be pulped, or shipped off to America—and but seldom read and studied by modern Friends as a means of profit and edification.

These works show the stuff that composed the Ancient Friend. It is pleasant and strengthening to ponder upon the robust Quakerism of early days; it is sad and disheartening to see the emasculated Quakerism, as often seen, in these present days. Formerly truth was truth; principles were principles; and Quakerism was Quakerism. There was then no yielding first this, then the other, and again something else, for the sake of conformity to others, or being thought liberal, or because other Christians thought it right to do so. They knew the truth, and the truth had made them free; and they were bold, fearless, and prevailing, in the spreading forth of the principles of "Christianity revived." Modern doubts were excluded from their minds by the fervor of their Christian faith, and their deep-seated, heart-felt belief in the Quaker principles. Now, people are puzzled to know the distinctive views of Friends, or what we really believe in. A few weeks ago, at a distance from home, I was asked by an active Christian Professor, whether we used fermented or unfermented wine in our celebration of the Lord's Supper!

I cannot but think that the state of looseness as to principles, and inconsistency as to action, so apparent, is, to some extent, at least, to be attributed to the fact that we have practically excluded Quaker literature from our families, our tables, Quaker conversation, and our thoughts. If any Society ignores its literature, and its members will not read the convictions, sentiments, and arguments of the good men and great thinkers who, under God's providence formed it, we cannot wonder that love, veneration, and belief should gradually die out; and that in time apathy should give way to downright practical disbelief, and to an active adhesion to other forms of worship and more attractive creeds.—British Friend.

The Peabody Fund appears to be principally used in the South in the training of teachers. In speaking of it, Dr. Law recently stated, that it maintained a summer Normal School in North Carolina, paying in large part the expenses of teachers coming from a distance. At this school four hundred and sixty pupils attended last summer. It is said by some of the leading men in that State, that it was largely owing to the enthusiasm and knowledge resulting from these schools, that her school system was saved to North Carolina.

At Nashville, Tennessee, at New Orleans, and in Texas, the funds of this trust have been expended in a similar manner.

It is one of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion, that God is omnipresent and almighty: that is, present at all times and in all places. This is generally professed and believed among the sects in Christendom; but in them, it is often no more than a bare profession, a traditional and historical faith; they not being true witnesses of the same. Herein is the difference between those who do, and those who do not, witness the presence of the Lord, and the almightiness of his power; the first only know the ground and reason why Moses, that eminent servant of the Lord, said, "If thy presence go not with us, carry us not hence."

This was the delight of the soul of the righteous in all ages and generations past, and is now: to feel the comfortable presence of the Lord, and to know the light of his countenance lifted up upon them. This makes their hearts more glad than the increase of corn, wine and oil, and is better than them all.

This was the strength and encouragement of the righteous in all ages, and made them willing to suffer for his name. This carried them through the water and through the fire. This made them sing and rejoice in the prison, and in the stocks; and suffer the spoiling of their goods joyfully. And, Friends, know this living presence be felt and enjoyed, except and lived in, we are as weak as other people, and if any lose, or depart from it, such will become as wicked as others also.

Therefore it is a very precious thing for every one always to prize the riches of that grace, and glory of that light, which their minds were at first turned to: which grace and light hath led a remnant into the presence chamber, into the banqueting house, where the banner over them is love; and is leading others into the same; and would guide and direct all out of the way of evil, into the way of peace. Oh! the freeness of this love and grace, and the glory of this light which hath led a remnant, that have loved it, and followed it, into the presence chamber, into the banqueting house, and to the top of that holy mountain, where the feast of fat things is enjoyed, and the wine well refined drunk of; to the right hand where the rivers of pleasures are. This is free grace and love indeed. This love is stronger than death, and better than life. Oh! the consideration of this love is able to break the heart, to melt the soul before the Lord, and to dissolve it into an holy resignation and pure resolution to walk to the praise, and magnifying of it among the sons and daughters of men; that they may be won and persuaded to accept of its tenders, and follow its leadings; that they may know the pleasantness of its paths, and witness the virtue and operation thereof in their own souls.—William Shewen.

I think I never knew a time when watchfulness and prayer felt so needful, in order not only "to strengthen," but even to retain "the things that remain, that are ready to die." It is like contending for every inch of ground in a well-contested field, and being unable at well-to-discover where the moving's position has been maintained; so that we stand in need of the prayers of our brethren in old England, that we may be preserved watchful, humble and faithful, amidst the various snares and temptations by which we are surrounded.—David Wheeler.

Religious Items, &c.

The Prosperity of the Church.—The Mennonite Herold of Truth contains some sensible remarks on this subject, which are applicable to our own Society. While regarding accessions to membership as one sign of prosperity, it says if this is accomplished "by making the way wider, and teaching doctrines more popular than self-denial and non-resistance, the gain in numbers would be no actual advantage to the church, neither would it be any advantage to an individual to unite with this church in preference to other churches." "Gaining many members, unless they be correctly taught and brought in under proper influences, would but swell the church out into the wide channel of popularity." "Unless the new converts be properly instructed, they may be the means of drifting the church away from her original principles and the faith and practices to which she has so long strictly adhered."

Religious Progress.—The Roman Catholic Bishop of Hebron had been preaching with some eloquence, three times a week in the Church of St. Louis, in Rome, to crowded audiences. He had repeatedly affirmed that "the Virgin Mary was the Mother of God, that she saves and that she is the source of all grace." Having first obtained the sanction of the police, the Waldensian missionary posted bills in the streets to announce that a Conference would be held on "The Mother of God, or Heresy par excellence." A large audience was gathered as the result. The missionary then refuted the idolatrous discourse of the bishop. With the Bible in his hand, he proved that it was full of errors and fallacies. This led to a violent agitation in the Papists' camp. The press, the priesthood, the Cardinals, even the Pope himself, were so wrought upon that they wrote most violent articles against the Conference. Special services were appointed in all the churches, masses celebrated, relics exposed, and discourses delivered, "to atone for the outrage on the Mother of God."

The Japanese Government has separated itself, as a government, from its former idolatry and idolatrous support. Within the last year it has abolished the department of religion, which has been one of its principal instruments; and it has directed the Shintoists to elect their own chief priest. This Pope of the idol worshippers had formerly been nominated by the government, which is now quite willing that Shintoism and Buddhism should die a natural death.

A struggle recently took place in Rome, over a dying Protestant convert, between Dr. Ribetti, a Waldensian pastor, and a Catholic priest. Franceschi, the sick man, requested the ministrations of Dr. Ribetti, while his wife wanted him to have the priest. She drove Dr. Ribetti off and the priest took his place. Ribetti scolded in writing the declaration of Franceschi that he was a Protestant, and called on the city authorities for protection. The priest installed himself by the sick man's bedside, and, invoking the police, had Ribetti put out of the house. Non-Catholic journals express great indignation at this violation of the liberty of conscience.

The Presbytery of Edinburgh (Church of Scotland) has received a complaint from four hundred and seventy-nine members and adherents of the North Leith Parish Church against certain steps alleged to have been taken to introduce an organ in the public worship of that church. The complaint says that the petitioners "strongly object to the use of such an instrument in public worship as being at variance with the practice and traditions of the Church of Scotland, as offensive to the tastes and feelings of many Scotch Presbyterians, and as not conducive to the service of praise being taken part in by the whole congregation." The minister and session of the church have been cited to appear before the Presbytery and defend their interests.

Cologne Cathedral is at length near completion. The first stone of the Cologne Cathedral was laid in 1248, when the grand edifice now left, perfect or ruined, in Europe, were either just finished, or, like Notre Dame, in Paris, were in rapid progress; but while the most elaborate of them took only three centuries to bring to perfection, Cologne has absorbed more than double the time. It took nearly three centuries to complete the choir, and since that date it has required liberal aid from nearly all the sovereigns of Europe to keep the construction going. What now remains to be done is the last stage and crowning decorations of the stately towers.

A conflict between Church and State is raging in New South Wales, occasioned by the reading of a pastoral letter of the bishops in all the Roman Catholic churches, urging the faithful to withdraw their children from the public schools. A few days later Archbishop Vaughan, at a confirmation service called upon those of the candidates who attended the public schools to step forward, and then refused to confirm them, unless their parents would promise to remove them from these schools. In a single week 1500 children were removed from the schools at Sydney. Then the Archbishop preferred charges against the public schools of immorality and godlessness; and he had no sooner proclaimed them than Joseph Jeffries took up the gauntlet in the defence of the schools. From the ecclesiastical field the controversy went to the press, and then into the Council of Education, so that all parties are now discussing the question of religious instruction in the public schools.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The India Telegraph Plant.—The Desmodium gyrans belongs botanically to the Leguminosae or pea family. It was discovered in India by Lady Monson (an English lady) and was introduced into Europe about the year 1777.

It is not a vine, but stands erect and bears many elongated oval leaves on petioles half the length of the leaves. Near the base of each leaf smaller oval leaflets are formed and these have short secondary petioles for attachment to the plant. The wonderful feature about the Desmodium is the spontaneous movement of its leaves. At night the largest ones all droop and the leaf-stems fold up against the main stem, giving the entire plant a very singular appearance. It goes regularly to sleep, but it wakens when the morning light comes in the east. The smaller leaves do not sleep, but continue in motion all day and all night with a slow jerking movement, like the arms of the old semaphore telegraph, moving spontaneously and without special irritation, a phenomenon in plant life so rare, so strange, and animal like, as to fill the observer with sensations not easily deined. The plant now standing on my table has entered its winter rest. With it, as with all other organizations, life is rhythmic and moves in pulsations. It sleeps and wakes as do nerves in pulsations. It sleeps and wakes as do nerves in pulsations. It sleeps and wakes as do nerves in pulsations. It sleeps and wakes as do nerves in pulsations.

It is in vain to search for the cause of this remarkable motion. If I cut a thin section from the moving joint I see only a special cell arrangement which leaves the problem uninvolved. Something built and now moves those peculiarly active cells; moreover, they are filled with sensitive, living, liquid matter capable of rapid changes, but the life force which coordinates these remarkable movements eludes our investigation.—Dr. J. G. Hunt in Friends' Intelligence.

Crushed by a Boa Constrictor.—One of the most intrepid wild-beast tamers in Europe, Karolyi, a Magyar, of colossal stature and extraordinary physical strength, has recently fallen a victim to a dread contingency of his perilous profession. He was performing before a crowded audience in Madrid, the other day, one of his most sensational feats, which consisted in allowing a huge boa constrictor, over twenty feet in length, to enfold his body in its tremendous coils, when suddenly a piercing cry escaped him, which was greeted by the public with a round of applause under the supposition that its utterance constituted a part of the performance. It proved, however, that the gigantic snake had tightened its coils, and crushed poor Karolyi's life out of him, with one terrific squeeze. The boa did not relax his folds for more than an hour, nobody daring to approach the lithe monster, of whose power such appalling proof had been given. At length it occurred to one of Karolyi's attendants to place a bowl of milk in a cage within sight of the mighty serpent, which slowly uncoiled itself from the dead body and glided into his den, irresistibly tempted thereto by its favorite dainty. A post-mortem examination of the unfortunate athlete's remains discovered no fewer than eighty-seven fractures of his bones, effected by the constriction of the serpent's coils. His death must have been instantaneous, as the spine was disarticulated in several places.—London Telegraph.

Earth-eating.—Stifura is the name of the disease of clay or earth-eating at Zanzibar. It often affects slaves, and the clay is said to have a pleasant odor to the eaters; but it is not confined to slaves, nor do slaves eat in order to kill themselves; it is a diseased appetite, and rich men who have plenty to eat are often subject to it. The feet swell, flesh is lost, and the face looks haggard; the patient can scarcely walk for shortness of breath and weakness, and he continues eating till he dies. Here many slaves are now diseased with Safura. The clay built in walls is preferred.—D. Livingston.

Cat Killing a Snake.—A serpent of dark olive color was found dead at my door this morning, probably killed by a cat; puss approaches very cautiously, and strikes her claws into the head with a blow delivered as quick as lightning; then holds the head down with both paws, heedless of the wriggling mass of coils behind it; she then bites the neck and leaves it, looking with interest to the disfigured head, as if she knew that therein had lain the hidden power of mischief. She seems to possess a little of the nature of the Ichneumon, which was sacred in Egypt from its destroying serpents. The serpent is in pursuit of mice when killed by puss.—D. Livingston.

Fossil Forests.—Some of the Remarkable Specimens in the Yellowstone Region.—In the valley of the East Fork of the river which flows through the wonderful Yellowstone National Park of the United States, says the London Times, the group of rocks, known for want of a better designation as the "Volcanic Tertiary," is typically developed and has a thickness upwards of 5,000 feet. Its prevailing materials are fragmentary volcanic products which have been apparently redistributed by the agency of water, and now form breccias, conglomerates, and sandstones. These strata contain a great abundance of silicified wood; and in many places trunks of trees many feet in height and of gigantic proportions seem to stand in the identical strata in which they grew. Sometimes the crumbling conglomerates wither away from about these, leaving them to stand upright along the steep mountain sides. W. H. Holmes gives an account of these forests in the recently published number of the 5th volume of the Bulletin of the United States Geological and Geographical Survey. A section is given representing the north face of Amethyst Mountain. It includes 2,000 feet of strata. The summit of this mountain is 9,430 feet above the sea, and the river flowing at its base is 6,700 feet over sea level. Riding up the smooth river-bed, one has but to look to the right up the cliffs to discover multitudes of the bleached trunks of these ancient forest trees. In some of the steeper portions of the mountain's face rows of upright trunks stand out like the columns of some long since ruined temple. On the more gentle slopes lower down, but where it is still too steep to support vegetation, save here and there a few pines, the petrified trunks fairly covered the surface, and were at first taken to be the shattered remains of a quite recent forest. Sometimes the trunks were found in a fine state of preservation. Some lying prostrate measured 50 feet to 60 feet in length, and not a few of these were 5 feet or 6 feet in diameter. One indeed was found on careful measurement to be 10 feet in diameter. The woody structure was so well preserved that it could be at once declared that this giant tree was not a conifer. The strata also contain, as might be expected, many rootlets, leaves, and fruits—a collection of which have been submitted for determination to Professor Leo Loquaereux. They include an Aralia, a Magno, and a new species of a lime, an ash, an elm, and of a diospyros; also some new ferns. Some of the species are apparently identical with those described by Professor Whitney from the Elk Creek strata. But these strata are lower than the Yellowstone Park strata by fully 1,000 feet, and are separated from them by fifteen miles of broken country.

These extraordinary fossil forests add one more to the noteworthy objects to be found in the National Park of the United States, already in respect of its natural phenomena without an equal in any part of the world.—Daily Paper.

Christians of Animal Life.—From correspondence of Nature: "About twelve years ago I was residing on the coast of County Antrim, Ireland, at the time the telegraph wires were set up along that charming road which skirts the sea for twenty-five miles between Larne and Cushendall. During the winter months large flocks of starlings always migrated over from Scotland, arriving in the early morning. The first winter after the wires were stretched along the coast, I frequently found numbers of starlings lying dead or wounded on the roadside, they having evidently in their flight in the dusky morning struck against the telegraph wires, not blown against them, as these accidents often occurred when there was but little wind. I found that the peasantry had come to the conclusion that these unusual deaths were due to the flash of the telegraph messages, killing any starlings that happened to be perched on the wires when working. Strange to say, that throughout the following and succeeding winters hardly a death occurred among the starlings on their arrival. It would thus appear that the birds were deeply impressed and understood the cause of the fatal accidents among their fellow-travellers that previous year, and hence carefully avoided the telegraph wires."

* * * Here ye may see people must repent before they believe and are baptized, and before they receive the Holy Ghost and the kingdom of God. They must repent of their vain life and conversation before they receive the gospel, and must be turned from darkness to the light of Christ, from the power of Satan unto God, before they receive his Holy Spirit and his gospel of light and salvation. The Lord doth command all men every where to repent, and do works meet for repentance. They must show that their lives, conversations, and tongues are changed, and that they serve God in newness of life, with new tongues and new hearts.—Extract from an epistle of George Fox.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 29, 1879.

We have received a printed copy of the minutes of those Friends who withdrew a year or two since from the Western Yearly Meeting, and organized a body under the same name. Its annual gathering was held at Sugar Grove, near Plainfield, Indiana, commencing on the 19th of 9th month last.

The following items of these minutes may prove interesting to some of our readers:

"The committee of last year, to consider the situation of our subordinate meetings, &c., report:

"In considering the stripped and tried situation of our subordinate meetings in many of which we apprehend, but few individuals remain attached to the ancient doctrines and practices of the Society so as to maintain all its testimonies, our minds have been brought under a close and serious concern, and we have agreed to submit the following:

"That a committee of men and women Friends be appointed to have under care the subject of our subordinate meetings; to visit them as way may open for it; and to encourage the members in the support of our principles and order, and in the maintenance of meetings in conformity therewith. That Friends in each of their meetings who remain attached to the order and principles of the Society (if their number is sufficient to maintain meetings to the reputation of Truth), be encouraged to meet in the capacity of their respective meetings apart from those who have departed from our doctrine and mode of worship; and where they have not access to their meeting houses that they provide other suitable places where they can hold their meetings in quietness, consistency, and where the solemn nature of Divine worship; and where their number is not sufficient for the maintenance of such meetings, that the members be encouraged to become attached to some other meeting in unity with the Yearly Meeting." A committee was appointed in accordance with this recommendation.

The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings referred to the consideration of the Yearly Meeting the propriety of corresponding with Friends in other parts who were similarly situated with themselves; which led to the adoption by the Yearly Meeting of the following minute:

"In a deliberate consideration of the subject, we have been introduced into a feeling of near sympathy and interest with Friends (not within the limits of this Yearly Meeting) who are conscientiously concerned to maintain inviolate our ancient Christian doctrines and testimonies, and we believe that mutual benefit might arise from such communication as in the wisdom of truth may be found needful by Friends of this class, who on account of innovations introduced into the Society feel that they are much isolated.

At a subsequent sitting a committee was appointed to have charge of this service.

An epistle was received from those Friends who had withdrawn from the Yearly Meeting in Iowa. Of this, the minutes say: "Our minds have been cheered and comforted in this evidence of the unity and interest of those distant brethren, binding together as it does in gospel fellowship, members of the same household of faith." An epistle was sent in reply.

The subjects of Peace, Temperance, Books and Tracts, Education and First-day schools, were all brought to notice by the reports of committees. In that on Books and Tracts we were pleased to observe that a care had been exercised "to distribute only such tracts as would be a means of confirming the reader in the true doctrines of the Christian religion." We fear this care is much needed in some other similar committees, for we have met with tracts issued by their authority which advocate views inconsistent with those held by the Society of Friends.

The answers to the Queries, and the minute which embodied the exercise of the meeting, manifest a concern to watch over one another for good, and to uphold the doctrines and testimonies of Friends. From this minute we extract the following paragraph:

"Dear young friends, be prevailed upon to avoid all foolish or unprofitable conversation, but be willing to have your minds formed according to the plain and simple truths of the Gospel, as contained in the Holy Scriptures, which we would recommend as a means of preserving you from unprofitable reading, which tends to divert the mind from the love of virtue and the practice of true Christian morality; and above all things, give diligent heed to the voice of the Spirit of Christ speaking in the secret of your own consciences, reproving for evil and speaking peace when you do well. For this, as it is closely regarded, will not only season your minds with a fear of offending your Father in Heaven, and thereby be a means of preserving you from the vices, vanities and allurements of the world; but will also influence you to seek after and pray earnestly for that wisdom which is from above."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In a report on the treatment of live stock on the railways, the following is given relative to the great stock yards at Chicago. They have 1000 cattle-pens, 1200 hog and sheep-pens, stabling for 1200 horses. Fifteen hundred cars of stock can be unloaded and cared for daily. The system of railways extending into different parts of the Western States, center there. They occupy 350 acres of land, and cost between $750,000 and $1,000,000.

It is stated the public schools of Springfield, Ill., will be closed the remainder of this year on account of the prevalence of scarlet fever in that city.

The colored peoples' Industrial Exhibition, recently held at Raleigh, N. C., the first of its kind in this country entirely under the management of colored people, was crowned with success. An address was delivered by R. B. Elliott, of South Carolina, in which he desired his colored friends "to cultivate the amicable relations the two races are now enjoying."

Our consul at Zurich, Switzerland, reports a continued decline in the watch and silk trade with the United States, owing both to the rivalry of American goods, and the unusual lack of the custom-house in exacting full duties on importations.

Snow storms, attended with high winds, have occurred in the lake region and New England during the past week. In some places trains were delayed by the snow, and in others many disasters, with some loss of life, are reported.

The Montreal and Quebec steamers made their last trips of the season on the 22d inst. Most of the lightships on the lower St. Lawrence have gone into winter port.

There was recently launched from Cramp's shipyard, Philadelphia, for Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company, the "Chalmette," described as the largest coastwise vessel ever built in this country. She is 338 feet in length over all, 320 feet between perpendiculars, 42 feet beam, and 34 feet in depth. She has 11,000 bushels and a cargo capacity of 8,000 bales of cotton. Her appliances for handling freight are so complete, that it is claimed only thirty hours will be required for discharging a cargo and receiving another.

The exports of petroleum and petroleum products from the United States, during the 9th month, amounted to $19,076,910 gallons, valued at $3,419,180.

Markets, &c.—The following were the quotations on the 22d. U. S. sixes, 1881, 105½; 5's, 102½; 4½'s, 1891, registered, 105½; coupon, 106½; 4's, 109½, 103½.

Wool, 1881, 21¢; fair declining. Sales of maddings at 12½ to 12 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Grade, 8½ cts. in barrels, and standard white, 8½ cts. for export, and 9 a 9½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is dull but steady. Sales of 1500 barrels, including Minnesota extra, $3.25 a $6.50; Penna. do, at $6.25 a $7; and patent and other high grades at $7.25 a $8.25. Wheat is steady at $3.50 a $3.62½.

Grain.—There is in better demand and higher. Sales of 30,000 bushels, including rejected at $1.32 a $1.25; No. 1, 12½ cts. in bulk, at $1.11, and No. 2 red, elevator at $1.11. Rye is unchanged. Corn is in demand and prices are well sustained. Sales of 15,000 bushels, including old mixed, at 55 a 57 cts.; old yellow at 57 a 58 cts., and new do. do. 50 a 51 cts., according to dryness. Oats are unchanged. Sales of 7000 bushels, including mixed at 40 a 41 cts., and white at 42 a 45 cts.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week:—Prime timothy, 95 cts., a $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 a 90 cts. per 100 pounds. Straw, $1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds.

The Irish land troubles continue to attract attention, and some apprehension of serious results. The excitement in some places is said to have been equalled only by that prevailing during the Fenian rising. The recent arrest of three of the leaders of the agitation, by the Government, is strongly condemned by the farmers, who denounce it as an attempt to stifle the voice of constitutional agitation, and drive the people into acts of violence. Large meetings are being held in divers places, at which resolutions are adopted condemning the arrests. It is considered the probability of the Government being so substantially the charge of sedition. The hope is expressed that there is no considerable body on either island, who would not be glad to see an end put to the agitation.

The new French cable was formally opened on the 20th, by a telegram from the President of the Republic to the President of the United States, expressing his most cordial sentiments.

A dispatch from Geneva to the Times says, at a meeting of the cotton operatives at Wald, Switzerland, was resolved in view of the recent action of other countries, and the ever increasing competition of English manufacturers, who flood Switzerland with cheap goods, to make a strong appeal to the Legislature to increase the import duties on foreign fabrics, in order to save the Swiss cotton industry from ruin.

A Constantinople dispatch states, several members of the Porte have expressed strong displeasure to the Government, by the Turkish newspapers England. The Porte has made an important communication to the British Government, tending to prove there will be no unnecessary delay in the introduction of the reform demanded by England. Lord Salisbury has given a surance that his government understands the financial and other difficulties of the Porte, and does not wish to complicate the situation by annexes.

Two Khans who have reached Afghanistan from Candahar, report the road between Khatlat-Gheiz and Cabul is in a very disturbed condition.

During the night between the 16th and 17th instant an exceedingly violent storm burst over Odessa, causing enormous damage. Several ships were sunk in the harbor, and quays and naval establishments suffered heavily.

Returns of cholera at Yokohama show that up to this instant, 90,000 deaths have occurred during the present year. Extraordinary precautionary measures for the future are being adopted.

Great satisfaction is expressed in government circles at the friendly tone of the American press in representing the violation of quarantine by the German Envy in 7th month last.

Professor Nordenskjöld, the Swedish arctic explorer is joining his countrymen. He was received with complimentary demonstrations at Kobe and Nagasaki, and in the central and south-western open ports of Japan.

DIED, on the 19th of 9th month last, at Greenfield, N. J., HORATIO C. WOOD, in the 76th year of his age, an esteemed and valued member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. Having been convinced of the principles of the religious Society of which he made profession, he was careful to endeavor to regulate his daily life in accordance therewith. Of kind and hospitable nature, he greatly enjoyed mingling with his friends socially, as well as in services of a religious and benevolent character. He devoted much time to the cause of education, and to the help of the poor, in various ways, need the sympathy and aid of his friends. At his residence in New York City, he has an deep provings of faith and patience, which through sustaining Grace, he was favored to endure with Christian cheerfulness; giving those who are bereaved by his removal, the consoling and well-grounded belief he has entered into his heavenly rest.

He was a resident in New York City, Backs-Co., Pa. on the 28th of 9th mo. 1870, JANE PARRY, in the 81st year of age, daughter of the late Benjamin Pary of New Hope, a member of Buckingham Particular and Monthly Meeting of Friends.

At residence, near Moorestown, N. J., on the 24th of 10th mo. 1873, HENRY D. WARRINGTON, a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J., in the 76th year of his age.

Incidents and Reflections.

When our Saviour commissioned and sent forth his disciples to proclaim the glorious gospel message to the people, he commanded them to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. Down to the present day, He continues to prepare his servants for a like service, and still sends them forth to various parts of his footstool, to invite the sons and daughters of men to come unto Him and be saved. It has often been a matter of interest to notice the unfoldings of the Divine will; and the pointings to duty, sometimes in distant parts of the world: as they are related by those, who have been under the preparing hand of the Lord for his work.

Thomas Story thus describes his own experience: "In the year 1693, towards the latter end of autumn, as I was riding alone in an evening, in Cumberland, the power of Divine Truth moved upon my mind, and my heart was greatly tendered before the Lord; and the Word of the Lord opened in me, saying: 'Behold my visitation cometh over the western parts of the world, towards the sun-setting in the time of winter.' And I was greatly comforted in the words of his holiness.

"From henceforth I was often tendered in spirit, in remembrance of the western world, in a sense of the love and visitation of God to a people there, whom I had never seen; which was more and more renewed and settled upon my mind, in frequent tenderings and brokenness of heart, under the holy influence of the Divine presence, until the year 1695; when, at the house of our friend, John Whiting, at Wrenton, in the county of Somerset, upon a visit to Friends in those parts with Aaron Atkinson, looking occasionally upon a map of the world, especially upon the south-westerly parts from England, the power of the Lord suddenly seized my soul, and his love melted me into a flood of tender tears. But hitherto I knew not that the call of the Lord was to me to visit those parts; though, from henceforth, I began to be afraid of it.

"And in the time of the Yearly Meeting at London, in the Bull and Mouth, Aaron Atkinson being concerned in prayer, among other petitions to the Lord, prayed for the western countries and places beyond the seas, 'That the Lord would please to send forth his ministers in the power of his Word, to publish the day of glad tidings more and more among them.' Upon which the power of Divine life moved sensibly in my heart; and the concern secretly begotten in my soul, now began to answer and appear; and, after that, great heaviness and fear came over me.

"The same day after the meeting, several Cumberland Friends and others being together after dinner, upon occasion of mentioning some of those countries by one of the company, the Word of life moved powerfully in my soul, with open assurance of the call of the Lord to me to visit some of the American countries; but, though I was exceedingly broken, to the tendering also of most of the Friends there, yet I was silent as to the particular matter, being willing to conceal it as long as I could, since no time was then prefixed when I should move forward therein. And being young and weak in the exercise of the ministry; and having no opinion of my own abilities of any kind, I urged it before the Lord as a reasonable plea, as I thought, against it at that time.

"At London I remained for some time, and entered into some writing business for necessary subsistence; but, before the year ended, I suffered much in spirit by reason of my confinement thereby; since this calling of God could not be answered by any one too much entangled in other affairs, though the employment in itself be very lawful, and, to the reason of man, seeming needful; but, though loth to leave all, (for it was no less than life, and all that was near and dear in the world) yet, finding my concern remain and increase, I yielded at length, in the secret of my mind, to answer the call of the Lord to that part of the world."

John Churchman relates, that after returning from a visit to Friends in New Jersey, "I felt such an inward silence for about two or three weeks, that I thought I had done with the world, and also any further service in the church, and the preparing hint* was brought to my mind, with thankfulness that I had endeavored in good degree to practise it. One day walking alone, I felt myself so weak and feeble, that I stood still, and by the reverence that covered my mind, I knew that the hand of the Lord was on me, and his pres-

* This alludes to a caution received some months before, and which is thus narrated: "As I sat in a week-day meeting, in the winter of 1748, I felt great weakness and poverty attending my mind, which occasioned a deep inquiry into the cause. After a time of inward waiting, the humbling divine presence was felt in reverent profound silence, yet the gentle operation of the Divine power caused an inward trembling, and the following was uttered in a language intelligible to the inward man: 'Gather thyself from all the corners of the world, and be thou weaned from the popularity, love and friendship thereof.' I believed this to be the voice of the Holy One of Israel, as a merciful warning to prepare for my final change, or to stand ready for some service which would separate me from temporal business and the nearest connections in life; and from that time I endeavored to settle my affairs, and contract my little business as well as I could."

ence round about; the earth was silent and all flesh brought into stillness, and light went forth with brightness, and shone on Great Britain, Ireland and Holland, and my mind felt the gentle, yet strongly drawing cords of that love which is stronger than death, which made me say, Lord! go before and strengthen me, and I will follow whithersoever thou leads. I had seen this journey nearly fifteen years in a very plain manner, and at times for ten years thought the concern so strong upon me that I must lay it before my friends for their advice; but was secretly restrained; being made to believe that an exercise of that sort would ripen best to be kept quiet in my own heart to know the right time, by no means desiring to run without being sent. To see a thing is not a commission to do it; the time when, and judgment to know the acceptable time, are the gifts of God."

Job Scott at one time was brought so low with sickness, that many of his friends thought he would not recover. He says of this period, "I was, after a season of deep exercise and probation, enabled to resign up life and all into the hands of Him who made me, and to say in sincerity, thy will be done in life or death. And as I lay one night in great distress of body, and deep thoughtfulness of mind, I was drawn into an awful view of death, eternity and eternal judgment, in a manner that I never had before; but feeling my mind perfectly resigned to depart this life and launch into an endless eternity, if so the Lord my God should please to order it, and finding all pain of body and anxiety of mind removed, I lay still some time, thinking probably I might ere long be released from all the pangs and toils of time, into the glorious rejoicings of eternal life. But after a considerable length of time had passed in inward and profound stillness and adoration, large fields of labor were opened, and I saw that I must travel from place to place in this and distant lands, in the Lord's commission and service. From this time I never entertained a doubt of my recovery, although I had afterwards a return or two of the disorder more severe than before; for these openings were in the fresh evidence of divine life, which never deceived me."

On another occasion, the year before his going to England on a religious visit, Job Scott made this entry in his diary: "Riding on the road, my mind was vivaciously opened, and I beheld, in the visions of God, large fields of labor allotted me in his service. A language ran livingly through my soul, and the whole man seemed almost swallowed up in the flowings of life which accompanied the glorious prospect! The language was on this wise: 'Thou art called and appointed, and through many and deep tribulations I have separated thee a prophet to the nations. Thou hast very little more ever to do in the business and affairs of this life. Gather thy mind from all cumbering things, and stand singly and wholly devoted to my work, service and appointment. Regard not the world; thou must be about thy Heavenly Father's business; thou must attend to my directions, and submit therein to thy proper allotment. My will and purpose require and loudly call, and have called, for greater dedication of heart and singleness of devotion to my work and service in the glorious gospel. Take no thought for the morrow; do to-day what thou findest to do, in my light, and in the liberty and allotment of my Holy Spirit. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will assuredly give thee a crown of life. I will hold thee in my holy hand forever. I will provide for and take care of thy motherless, and, as it were, fatherless children, in thy absence."

The "Travelling Rocks" again.

While neither intending or desiring to continue the discussion of this question in the too valuable columns of "The Friend," I still apprehend that some reply to the single objection of their Editor to my last, on page 75, may not be deemed inadmissible.

His opinion is that the true cause may be found in the well-known principle of the expansion of freezing water—and which is, I admit, the opinion also of some other and professedly scientific writers as well. But if that law or principle proves anything in this case, it proves entirely too much. The expansion being estimated at about 9 per cent., would, in three miles, or say 20,000 feet, amount to 1,800 feet, instead of the actual 6 to 10 feet occasionally, and only occasionally, observed at all. And then that expansion must, as in fact it always does, commence with the freezing, and continue on in comparatively thin ice, which is contrary to the facts as heretofore observed, of the movement.

Again, it is well known that neither small or large bodies of ice do so expand at all, or perceptibly—that is, laterally or superficially,—but perpendicularly in the direction of least resistance, as the ground does when we say it "heaves" or rises up, in proportion to the much or little moisture or water it contains; otherwise what would become of our great reservoirs and artificial lakes of stored water, with their thin and weak walls? and the great bodies like lakes Erie and St. Clair, with hundreds of others of less magnitude, which freeze hard, and yet we hear of no 9 per cent. or any other perceptible addition to their surfaces—not even this slight but powerful movement. My position and belief is, that it is confined to those bodies of water which freeze very hard, and are subject to very considerable subsidence or fall of the water beneath, or while so frozen.

And yet other causes than that named in my last, may be found to be the true or additional ones; such as that the newly fractured ice must necessarily occupy additional space, &c., as it is objected that the former argument has a weakness in geometrical principle.

With this, and the single remark that my only object in the few observations offered has been to add something to the understanding and solution of this singular natural phenomenon, and which, I think, science has not yet correctly and fully demonstrated, for the reasons above given, I close.

For "The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

East Bradford, 5th mo. 18th, 1862.

Dear Friend, Joseph Elkinton.—Thou hast at times been the subject of my thoughts since we parted at Downing-town, and I have felt much sympathy with thee, and sincerely desire thou mayest be preserved and favored to perform the services required of thee, to the peace and comfort of thy own mind; and in other words, say, be favored with a sense of Divine approbation, which gives that sweet and precious peace that the Christian so much desires. I believe the services required by the Great Head of the Church, and faithfully performed in the ability which He is graciously pleased to give unto those who humbly look unto Him, and wait for it, will often leave behind them a sweet and precious savor, that may be long felt and remembered by those labored with. May it be so with thine. That thy Indian brethren and sisters, and all with whom thou mayest feel it right to labor, may feel the sweet savor of the Master's spirit, whilst thou art laboring with them, and feel and remember it, when thou hast returned to thy home and friends; that the fruits may be to the praise of his great and excellent Name, who is forever worthy.

Thy friend, EBENEZER WORTH.

1862. 7th mo. 13th. We have been much favored in getting in our hay; gathering (the) harvest has almost always been attended with anxiety and care; it has made me feel relieved when it is over. The charge of much goodness requires close watchfulness that the good seed be not choked. I think I have not had a more comfortable meeting for a long time, perhaps for years; what an inexpressible favor. I was favored in meeting to feel for the welfare of our country, and I trust Christian love for those who have seceded from the Union, and been in great measure the cause of the war and much bloodshed. May our Divine Master interfere in behalf of our country, and may the North and the South be united as brethren and sisters in serving Him as He may be pleased to require, and worship together in spirit and (in) truth. Oh! the precious spirit of our Divine Master, if we were only willing it should rule and reign in us, how it would remove all angry or hard feelings, and fill the hearts with love to Him and to each other; may this be the case.

11th mo. 13th. Attended Select Preparative Meeting; was favored to enjoy the meeting. Oh! what a precious privilege to feel the Great Head of the Church to be with us in our religious meetings; may we continue to be favored to feel his presence to be with us to comfort, preserve and qualify us to worship Him in spirit and in truth; but oh! our great weakness and unworthiness; it is of his mercy, unmerited mercy we are not consumed.

On the 20th of 8th month, my kind and tender father was taken from us by death, with about three weeks' sickness. I felt very anxious while he lay sick that he might be favored with a sense of preparation for the change before he was taken; to my great satisfaction he expressed to me, in a sober, calm way, that he had not felt any anxiety from the commencement of his sickness how it might terminate; he seemed resigned to the will of Providence. I think while in health he was concerned to prepare for death. What a comfort to feel an evidence that our departed friends (were) prepared for the manifestations of everlasting rest."

There does not appear to be any account in the diary of the funeral of Samuel Worth. From a letter written by a ministering Friend who was in attendance, it appears to have been an interesting and encouraging occasion. Having been allowed the privilege of making some selections from that letter, it has been thought it would not be inappropriate to include them in this narrative.

The carriages at the West Chester depot on the arrival of the train, seemed to be full or engaged. I started on foot, but was over-taken by J. S., who had his father-in-law David Cope, with him; they invited me to ride with them. David was very interesting in conversation, and said amongst other things that Samuel Worth had done a good deal of business, but he never knew a hired man to speak against him. A very large company was collected at the house, S. W. being highly respected in his neighborhood. We proceeded to the burial ground at Marshallton, and after some consultation with the elders it was concluded to hold a meeting. The house was filled to overflowing. We sat a long time in solemn silence; it did not seem as if there was much room for words. I thought if there could be such a feeling when my body was laid in the ground, it would be all that I could ask. At length Samuel Cope arose with this language, 'It is not of him that wiltheth, no of him that runneth, but of the Lord that sheweth mercy,' or words to that effect—valued elder remarked afterward, 'there was quite a savor with it.' Awbile after he was done, David Cope got up, or rather Samme helped him up, he could not stand straight but supported himself on his cane in one hand and the gallery railing in the other. It commenced with saying, it was a great satisfaction to him when he had followed the remains of one who had lived a godly life to the grave, that the company, if they were in state to worship God, should quietly gather into the house and sit awhile together, even though a word might not be spoken; he preached at considerable length and was much favored. About midway in his communication he said; my brethren, I am very feeble and must sit down, then went on speaking, from his seat. It was a tendering time; old men might be seen in tears. When David was done speaking I thought the meeting would close, for we had been together a good while. Having a little on my mind, I expressed it, desiring what all had witness might not be as the morning dew that passeth away. It is upon the tender ground that the husbandman sows his seed, and when Heaven's visitations were sighted we knew not that we should be favored with more, therefore may we co-operate with the measure of grace afforded, and thereby be led out of a error into all truth, and be prepared for that awful change which awaits us. As I cease speaking, David Cope broke forth again, in rapturous language, manifesting great interest in young people, encouraging them and de-iring a blessing for them. He said, 'I would risk for myself, a poor, feeble old man just passing from time to eternity, that God may be with me through the dark valley of the shadow of death, and may He be with you and bless you, my dear young friends, guard you and preserve you that you may join the angelic host on high when time shall be swallowed up in eternity, when all enjoyments here must cease and ye can no more be inhabitants of this earth.' This may not be exactly as he gave it, but nearly so. It seemed as if the windows of Heaven had been opened and a blessing poured out."

A Tired Mother's Victory.

A little timely gentleness sweetens a parent's recollection in after years with a thrill of gratitude; whereas the memory of hasty severity to little ones must bring a pang. This tender story of a mother's experience, published in the Christian Weekly, is a beautiful lesson in itself. The mother had laid her table with great care and pains for a company of distinguished guests, when her little girl accidentally overturned a tureen of gravy on her snowy cloth.

"What should I do? It seemed a drop too much for my tired nerves—many drops too much for my table-cloth. I was about to jerk my child down angrily from the table when a blessed influence held me.

I caught the expression on her face; such a sorry, frightened, appealing look I never saw, and suddenly a picture of the past came and stood out vividly before my mind's eye. My child's face revealed feelings which I had experienced twenty years before.

I was myself a little nervous girl, about eight years old, in the happy home of my childhood. It was a stormy afternoon in winter. It was when coal-oil lamps were first introduced, and father had bought a very handsome one.

The snow had drifted up against the kitchen window, so, although it was not night, the lamp was lighted. Mother was sick in bed up-stairs, and we children were gathered in the kitchen, to keep the noise and confusion away from her.

I was feeling very important helping get supper; at any rate, I imagined I was helping, and in my officiousness, I seized that lamp and went down cellar for some butter; I tried to set it on the hanging-shelf, but alas! I didn't give it room enough, and down it fell on the oiled floor.

I never shall forget the shock that it gave me. I seemed almost paralyzed. I didn't dare to go up stairs, and I was afraid to stay down there, and to make it worse, I heard my father's voice in the kitchen. He had cautioned us all, again and again, to be careful of that lamp; and now there it lay smashed to pieces!

But his voice seemed to give me the impetus I needed to go up and meet the scolding or whipping, or both, which I felt sure awaited me, and which I really felt I deserved. So I crept up over the dark stairway, and as I entered the kitchen, I met my father with such a stern look upon his face that I was frightened. I saw there was no need to tell him what had happened. He had heard the crash, and if he hadn't, I guess my face would have told the story. The children stood silently around, awaiting to see what father would do; and I saw by their faces that they were horror-struck, for that lamp had been the subject of too much talk and wonder to be smashed without a sensation.

As for me, I felt so frightened, so confused and sorry, that I couldn't speak. But upon glancing again at father, I saw the angry look die out of his eyes, and one of tenderness took its place.

I doubt not that he saw the same look in my face then that I saw in my child's face to-day. In a minute he had lifted me in his arms, and was hugging me close to his breast. When he whispered, oh, so kindly! "Never mind little daughter; we all know 'twas an accident, but I hope you will take the small lamp when you go down cellar again."

Oh, what a revolution of feelings I experienced! It was such a surprise to me that I was suddenly overwhelmed with feelings of love and gratitude, and burying my face, I sobbed as if my heart was breaking. No punishment could have affected me half so much and nothing can efface the memory of it from my mind.

How I loved my father to-day, as the sight of my own little girl's face brought it all freshly before me!

Will she love me as dearly, I wonder, twenty years or more from now, because, moved by the same God-given impulse that stirred my father's heart in that long-ago time, I was able to press the little frightened thing to my heart, and tell her kindly that I knew she didn't mean to spill the gravy, and that I knew she would be more careful another time? Will she be helped by it when she is a mother as I have been helped to-day?"

Religious Items, &c.

Baptism.—Dean Stanley, in an article on this subject in the Nineteenth Century, speaks of it as a symbol long known among the Jewish nations; and gives a curious picture of the ceremonies and superstitious beliefs that in a few centuries clustered around it in the professing Christian Church. He says:

"There was but one time of the year when the rite was administered—namely, between Easter and Pentecost. There was but one personage who could administer it—the presiding officer of the community, the Bishop. There was but one hour for the ceremony; it was midnight. The torches flared through the dark hall as the troops of converts flocked in. The baptistry consisted of an inner and outer chamber. In the outer chamber stood the candidates for baptism, stripped to their shirts; and, turning to the west at the region of sunset, they stretched forth their hands through the dimly-lit church, as in a defiant attitude towards the Evil Spirit of Darkness, and, speaking to him by name, said: 'I renounce thee, Satan, and all thy works, and all thy pomp, and all thy service.' Then they turned, like a regiment, facing round to the east, and repeated in a form, more or less long, the belief in the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, which has grown up into the Apostles' Creed in the West, and the Nicene Creed in the East. They then advanced into the inner chamber. Before them yawned the deep pool or reservoir, and standing by the deacon or deaconess, as the case might be, to arrange that all should be done with decency, the whole troop undressed completely as if for a bath, and stood up before the Bishop, who put to each the questions, to which the answer was returned in a loud and distinct voice, as of those who knew what they had undertaken. Both before and after the immersion their bare limbs were rubbed with oil from head to foot; they were then clothed in white gowns, and received, as a token of the kindly feelings of their new brotherhood, the kiss of peace, and a taste of honey and milk; and they expressed their new faith by using for the first time the Lord's Prayer."

"There was the belief in early ages that baptism was like a magical charm, which acted on the persons who received it, without any consent or intention either of administrator or recipient, as in the case of children or actors performing the rite with no serious intention. There was also the belief that it wiped away all sins, however long they had been accumulating and however late it was administered. * * * There was the yet more dreadful superstition that no one could be saved unless he had passed through Baptism. It was not the effect of divine grace upon the soul, but of the actual water upon the body, on which those ancient Baptists built their hopes of immortality."—London Friend.

Evidences of Declension.—The Herald of Truth (Mennonite) says: "In the few remaining plain churches there has been great uneasiness within the last two years, on account of the tendency to drift away from the original discipline and long-practised custom of plain dressing."

"Among the Friends (Quakers) there is a manifest looseness at present, and many of their members could not be identified by their appearance with Friends of a few years in the past. It is a sad circumstance in their history that they should abandon practices, founded upon deep principles, for which all good and sensible people respected and honored them.

"Among the Brethren (Dunkers) the tendency is also to act, appear and dress like the world. At the late annual meeting held at Rockingham Co., Virginia, there was, unmistakably a painful contrast between the members there assembled. Some, principally the older ones, were clad in the plain garb which graced the church in by-gone years; while the manners and apparel of many others betrayed the fact that a move or two more will send their ship out into the mighty current of fashion.

"The Mennonites have up to this time published but few of their complaints on this subject; but we have much to fear from the same evil. Let us learn lessons from the experience of others."

Selecting Ministers by Lot.—In Virginia, two ministers among the Mennonites having died, the congregation met for the purpose of proposing suitable names of persons to succeed them. The meeting was opened with prayer and the first of Acts was read and commented upon. Then followed a season of silence, during which time each person was counselled to heed the promptings of the Spirit, and to announce whatever name any one might feel constrained to regard as a person fit to minister. Sixteen brethren were nominated. A week was allowed nominees to reflect upon the question of duty. All consented to go into the lot, when the congregation met again. Sixteen copies of the New Testament, uniform in size and binding, were consented out and placed in the hands of two ministers, who retired with them into the vestry. Slips of paper were put into two of the volumes. The books were laid upon a table prominently, and left there while the two ministers should go to their places in the church. The President directed two other ministers to go and bring the books in. They went at once into the vestry, and having shuffled the books, they carried them into the main room and set them up in a row upon a long table in front of the stand. The sixteen books being duly arranged, and the candidates placed near them, prayer was offered that the Head of the Church should show which two of these sixteen brethren should be called into the ministry. Prayer ended, each of the candidates arose in order, and took down a book. And when each had taken a book the next thing was to see who had the lot. While the books were being examined the interest and suspense are almost painful to witness.

In commenting on the above description the Herald of Truth observes: "The Mennonite Confession of Faith says ministers shall be chosen 'by the united voice of the Church.' It is always very desirable to choose ministers in this way, namely, to have all the members agree upon one brother; but when this cannot be done we cast lots as described in the above article, and as the Apostles did."

Little Tricks.—We recall with satisfaction, an instance where a near relative, when brought before a court on some trumped up charge of wrong-doing, summoned an old gray-haired minister who had lived for more than forty years within half a mile of him. "How long have you known this man?" said the lawyer. "I have known him ever since he was born." "What do you know about him?" "I never knew a mean thing of him in my life." Such a testimony as that, stands out in marked contrast with many petty tricks and discreditable transactions which so often need to be explained and apologized for; the explanation being frequently more harmful than the accusation, and the apology more discreditable than the fault.—The Christian.

"GOD'S PROVIDENCE HOUSE."

In a small, quaint English city
On the banks of the River Dee,
Is a queer old wooden building
Of a style we rarely see.
Five hundred years it has stood there
In the narrow and stony street,
Carved, over its oaken doorway,
With a legend, strange and sweet.

The line has been kept so perfect
It is read at a single glance;
"God's Providence" so they say,
"Is Mine Inheritance."
And if one should ask its meaning,
He would hear this story told
Of a dreadful plague in the city
Which darkened its days of old.

It ravaged the homes of thousands,
And the people wailed and
Calling on God for mercy
While mourning their many dead.
In the street where this house is standing
No other escaped the blow,
And thanks for such special favor
The legend is meant to show.
Each house and heart in the kingdom
Interests God's eye to show.
Yet seldom it shows such record
As is carved on the cross-beam there.
Stand strong, old house, in thy glory,
Bearing witness as years advance
That Providence, caring and loving,
Is man's blessed Inheritance.

LITTLE BROWN HANDS.

Selected

They drive home the cows from the pasture,
Up through the long, shady lanes,
Where the quail whistles loud in the field,
That are yellow with ripening grain.
They find in the thick, waving grasses,
Where the scarlet-tipped strawberry grows;
They gather the earliest snow drop,
And the first crimson buds of the rose.
They toss the new hay in the meadows,
They gather the elder-blossom white,
They find where the apples grapes purple,
In the soft-tinged October light.
They know where the fruit clusters thickest,
On the long, thorny blackberry-vines;
They know where the apples hang ripest,
And are sweeter than Italy's wines.
They gather the delicate sea-weeds,
And build tiny castles of sand;
They pick up the beautiful sea-shells—
Fairy barks that have drifted to land.
Those who toil bravely are strongest,
The humble and poor become great,
And from those little brown-handed children
Shall grow mighty rulers of State.
The pen of the statesman and author,
The noble and wise of the land,
The compass, the chisel, the palette,
Shall be held in the little brown hand.

AUTUMN SONG.

Selected.

Among the stubble, dry and brown,
The leaves' red rain is falling,
While in the quiet woodland ways
The lonesome quail is calling.
The oak's red bonfire lights the hill
We weed, faintly, faintly, and
As Nature sits with folded hands,
While all her thoughts are tender
With memories of departed days,
As in this still, sad weather,
The golden-rod and aster bloom
In wayside nooks together.
The ripened nuts are dropping down,
With slow and steady pitter,
And in the chestnut nut-beech
The squirrels chirp and chatter.
They watch their harvest as it falls
Among the nooks and hollows,
And think not of the summer dead,
But of the time that follows.
The bluebird's song is sad as tears,
While plaintively the plover
To vanished lark and robin calls,
Whose summer stay is over.
The flowers of the summer time
Are dead by road-side hedges,
Save here and there a daisy bloom
Along the meadow's edges.
Oh, saddest time of all the year!
The year is dying, dying, leech
And for a world of sweet, dead things,
These hearts of ours are sighing
Oh, tell me, tell me, heart of mine,
In spring's bright, balmy weather,
Will all the things we miss so much
Come back again together.

Infidelity.—In an article on this subject in The Earnest Christian, in speaking of the causes which have led to its increase, B. T. Roberts says:

"We find one cause in the low standard of religious experience required in the churches generally. Christianity is not so much a doctrine to be believed, as a life to be lived. This life is more inward than outward. It is controlled, not so much by precepts for the regulation of the conduct, as by a supernatural change in the affections, desires, appetites and will, produced by the direct influence of the Holy Spirit upon the heart. It implies a radical change in man's moral nature. A Christian is one who not merely believes in Christianity; but, 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold all things are become new.'—2 Cor. v. 17. Where this inward change really takes place, it is always attended by a corresponding change in the outward life. When the tree is good, the fruit is good.

"But the great mass of professing Christians have had no such inward change. The majority do not observe even the outward forms of Christianity. They are Christian because it is respectable, and even fashionable. Such persons, finding that there is nothing in their religion but an empty form, and seeing none around them that have anything better, drink in infidel arguments as the thirsty land drinks in water. What is wanted to check infidelity is a living Christianity."

Divine Guidance and Protection.

The history of J. Kennedy's experience in California, as given in a late number of "The Friend," is instructive. Examples are too few in which men have been willing to trust "our Great Defender" for protection to life and property. But it were well that some well-attested cases that we have, should be held up to public notice, that the Christian may be renewedly assured "it is safe to trust in the Lord."

Dr. Livingston, the African explorer, was not a thorough nonresistant. But he had gone to that country ostensibly to preach the gospel of peace and good will, and notwithstanding the bias of his education, the essential principles of Christianity, overcoming by persuasion rather than by force, were ever manifesting themselves in his conduct.

Although armed (which was a necessity for killing wild animals for subsistence) he never used, nor does it appear he allowed his men to use, an offensive weapon against a fellow man. In these memorable journeys he passed over thousands of miles where a white man had been unknown, or known only to be mistrusted and perhaps hated. The very men who were now his peaceable companions, had been known far and wide as ruthless marauders. Sometimes when human prudence and forbearance had been taxed to the utmost, did those trained soldiers urge from him the word of command or permission to "cut their way through." But in every case, was it shown that "man's extremity was God's opportunity," and they were forward leaving friends behind, and assuring a friendly reception among tribes yet unvisited.

On one of these occasions when bloodshed seemed imminent, he says: "I resolved to wait, trusting in Him who has the hearts of all men in His hands." "At length two old men made their appearance, who said they came to inquire who I was." This being satisfactorily explained, the late hostile chief remarked, "He was sorry he had not known me sooner." "He did every thing he could afterward to aid us on our course, and our departure was as different as possible from our approach to his village."

In one place Dr. L. remarks, "Although the Mokololo were so confiding, the reader must not imagine they would be so to every individual who might visit them. Much of my influence depended on the good name given me by the Bakwains, and that I secured only through a long course of tolerably good conduct. No one ever gains much influence in this country without purity and uprightness of character."

Towards the close of the book he drops the reflection, "If the reader remembers the way I was led while teaching the Bakwains to commence exploration, he will, I think, recognize the hand of Providence. Anterior to that, when — Moffat began to give the Bible to the Behuanas, Sebittuane went north and spread the language, into which he was translating the sacred oracles, into a new region larger than France. At the same time Sebittuane routed out hordes of bloody savages, among whom no white man could have gone without leaving his skull to ornament some village. He opened the way for me — let us hope also for the Bible. And when (influenced by circumstances), I was induced to open up a new country in the north — the gracious Spirit of God influenced the minds of the heathen to regard me with favor." After a further recital of remarkable occurrences, he says: "I think I see the operation of the unseen hand in all this, and I humbly hope it will still guide me to do good in my day and generation in Africa."

For "The Friend"

¶ 26.—The words of Abern to Job (2 Sam. ii, 26), though written under a less perfect dispensation, are truly arresting and instructive: "Shall the sword devour forever? knowest thou not that it shall be bitterness in the latter end?" Well may the query be put in this nineteenth century, in professed Christian lands, and under the promised government of the Prince of Peace, "Shall the sword devour forever?" Shall the precepts of our holy Lawgiver continue to be superseded or set at naught by the customs and institutions of men? Shall man continue to murder his fellow man as if governments could give authority to kill, and as if war was not wholly forbidden, or as if with all its vices, and immoralities and horrors, it were still compatible with that religion which breathes peace on earth and good will to men? Can no substitute be found in this enlightened age for such extremity of evil? Oh, the responsibility of individuals, and no less of nations—the whole being made up of, and equal to the sum of its parts! Oh, that the eyes of promoters of such intensity of human wickedness were but anointed with the eye-salve of the kingdom, so as to see of the sorrow, the anguish, the iniquity, which this system is the parent of! Surely they would be horror-stricken and "Astonished at the madness of mankind."

Then the "bitterness in the latter end!" Look at the lives brutally sacrificed—immortal souls, for whom the Saviour died, thrust into a never-ending eternity in the heat of savage madness. Look at the desolated fire-sides—the bereaved widow, and the destitute orphan. Look at the immense expense, with the pecuniary distress, caused by war. While, says Erasmus, "War does more harm to the morals of men than even to their property and persons."

Oh, that the abolition of this fearful scourge might be hastened! Oh, that there could be that faith in the Omnipotent Arm, to claim obedience to his will! That child-like dependence upon a Power which is invincible, which could but insure the victory!

Christian Simplicity of Life.

The following is an extract from the address of W. Cuthbertson, chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, at its meeting in Cardiff, last month. Though intended for Independents, as specially applicable to them, it may be read with profit by Christians of every denomination, and some parts of it will be felt as peculiarly appropriate to the Society of Friends:—

"Our witness, however, does not end with our ecclesiastical testimony. These are but means to the end for which we live—witnessing for Christ. One part of this I venture to urge as of vital importance, and never more needed than now. I refer to Christian simplicity of life—the departure from which appears to me to be the sin and danger of the nation and the day.

"In this duty we do not stand alone. The responsibility rests on all the churches of Christ. Yet our traditions speak with special emphasis on this subject. A large part of the blessing our fathers wrought in England was, in beautifying many a home and strengthening many a life, by their enforcement, through precept and example, of what is now sometimes sneeringly called 'Puritan morals.' We may not accept all their judgments upon particular kinds of conduct, but woe to us if we have parted with their spirit and belief that the Church and the World were distinct and opposed. At all events, this history tells of them. Bearing in the very forefront of their teaching, holiness unto the Lord in each member of his Church, denouncing unsparringly every moral departure from his law, burdening themselves, as some would now say, with opposition to much that was innocent in social life, they fought a battle for liberty, for truth and goodness, against a host, in which stood arrayed in opposition, the ruler and the mob, infamous law and the fashion of society, those who should have been the pillars in the temple and those who thought they had all the wit and culture of the time; and they won it, and of their victory all society is to-day reaping the benefit.

"Those who remember the last generation, even, must be conscious of a marvellous change in our social life—we say not yet for the better or the worse—but a marvellous change at any rate. Amusements are followed without stint; a style of living is indulged in of which our fathers never dreamed; in fact, there are few amusements or indulgences which are not in themselves open violations of God's law, that would not find defenders in some who bear our name. Brethren, I speak not to offend. I speak thus plainly because I believe the love of Christ and his cause is so far in us that I cannot offend if what I say is true. And I believe what I say, that there is danger of the Church and the world becoming too friendly. There are things which cannot in themselves be said to be wrong, but which in their multiplication are pernicious. Those whose life is largely spent in this way have no reserve of strength against temptation to sin, which even the world's law calls sin; while religious contemplation, a looking to heaven as our rest and as our home, simplicity of desires and of life, and intellectual enjoyment, are seriously impeded, if they do not become altogether distasteful. If this spirit is admitted into our hearts and cherished there, we may have what outward show of strength we like, but the glory of the Lord will have left us."

Manuscripts of the New Testament.

The extant manuscripts of the New Testament are of two kinds, written in two different styles. The oldest are written in continuous capital letters, extending across the line, without any separation between the words. These are called uncial manuscripts, a word suggested by the large size of the letters. [The word uncial is derived from the Latin uncialis, signifying the twelfth part of a pound or foot. The English words inch and ounce are derived from this word uncialis.] This mode of writing was in common use until the tenth century after Christ. Of manuscripts written in this style there are about 160 extant; 153 according to Scrivener. None of these are older than the fourth century after Christ, and only two older than the fifth. The majority range from the sixth to the ninth. Most of these contain only parts of the New Testament, and many of them only small fragments. The one discovered by Prof. Tischendorf in 1859, in a convent at the foot of Mt. Sinai, is the only one that contains the text of the New Testament entire. They are written on parchment, and the page is commonly divided into three columns. Sometimes a Latin translation occupies the middle column. The manuscripts of this first kind are designated by capital letters. Those written in later times were written in small letters, with the words separated, and with pauses and accents. These are called curive manuscripts, and are far more numerous than the uncials. They are designated by Arabic numbers. In nearly all the manuscripts, of both kinds, the New Testament is divided into four parts, or volumes, the first containing the four Gospels, the second the Acts and the Catholic Epistles, the third the Epistles of Paul, and the fourth the Revelation. There is also a separate class of manuscripts, prepared especially for use in the public services of the church and called lectionaries. These contain reading lessons from the Gospels and from the Acts and Epistles.

Of both these kinds of manuscripts, the uncial and curive, those containing the Gospels are the most numerous. Of these there are between fifty and sixty uncials, though only five of them contain the four Gospels entire. Of the second and third parts, that is, of the Acts with the Catholic Epistles, and of the Epistles of Paul, there are fourteen or fifteen uncials of each; but very few of these contain the whole of either of these parts of the New Testament, while of the Revelation there are only five uncial copies extant. The exact total of this oldest kind of manuscripts is 158. The later, or curive kind are far more numerous. Of these, according to the latest edition of Scrivener's Introduction, there are 623 of the Gospels, 234 of the Acts with the Catholic Epistles, 283 of the Epistles of Paul, and 105 of the Revelation. The total number of curives, of all sorts, is 1,605. Adding the 158 uncials, we have a grand total of 1,763 manuscripts of the Greek New Testament. Deducting from these 99 which may be considered as duplicates, we have left 1,664 distinct manuscripts, reckoning the four parts separately, according to the division mentioned above.

After making all due allowance for the fragmentary character of many of these manuscripts, it will be seen, that we are abundantly furnished with materials for correcting errors and ascertaining the genuine text. And when we add to these hundreds of Greek manuscript, the early translations into different languages, and the many thousand quotations in the early Christian writers, we have a body of materials for settling the genuine text of the Scriptures, incomparably transcending the data which we have for determining the genuine text of any other ancient writings whatever. Of Homer, we have no complete copy earlier than the thirteenth century. Of Plato we have about a dozen, one of the earliest being that in the Bodleian library at Oxford, belonging to the ninth century. Of Herodotus we have not more than fifteen in all, and the most ancient of these belong to the tenth century. The Vatican Library in Rome, which is the richest of all in classical manuscripts, has one of Virgil which probably belongs to the fifth century, another belonging to the seventh; but very few indeed, of any classic author, as old as the tenth.

Skeptics sometimes make an unfair use of the fact, that there are numerous differences in the text of the New Testament manuscripts. If they do not exaggerate the number of these various readings, they commonly greatly overrate their importance. "Of the various readings of the New Testament, nineteen out of twenty are to be dismissed at once from consideration, not on account of their intrinsic unimportance—that is a separate consideration—but because they are found in so few authorities, and that no critic could regard them as having any claim to be inserted in the text." This is the testimony of a competent authority, Andrews Norton. Another, Richard Bentley, pronounced by Scrivener "at once the profoundest and most daring of English critics," says: "The real text of the sacred writers is completely exact, indeed, in the worst manuscripts. Put the manuscripts into the hands of a knave, and yet with the most sinistrous and absurd choice, he shall not be able to extinguish the light of any one chapter, nor so disguise Christianity, but that every feature of it will still be the same." We may say, then, without fear of contradiction, that with all the various readings in all the extant manuscripts of the New Testament, a candid criticism must confess, that not one important fact, doctrine, precept, or promise, is brought into reasonable doubt.—A. N. Arnold in Nat. Baptist.

Anecdote of Richard Jordan.—During one of the visits of that faithful minister, the late William Williams, of Tennessee, to Philadelphia, whilst sitting at the house of the friend where he lodged, a person present mentioned that Richard Jordan had been silent for a considerable length of time in his own meeting for worship. "Perhaps, said William, "he is making a convert." On being asked for an explanation, he stated that during the time Richard Jordan and he resided near each other, in North Carolina, a neighbor of theirs, a man of note, conceived a great inclination to hear Richard preach, and for this purpose attended several First-day meetings, but our friend was silent. Well, thought the neighbor, Mr. Jordan only preaches on week days; and on week-days he accordingly attended Friends' meeting; but Richard remained sealed. This continued for several weeks, until the neighbor found the desire of hearing that faithful servant of his crucified Lord subsiding; but another work had been imperceptibly going on, and he now felt that he was not at liberty to neglect the attendance of either First-day or week-day meetings; and he became convinced of Friends' principles. After the desire of hearing Richard had been succeeded by a willingness to listen to the "still small voice," the seal was removed from the lips of that dedicated servant, and he was permitted again vocally to minister.

Public Feeling in the Transvaal.—A few weeks ago I chanced to be riding with a man who, according to the ordinary principles, was in every way eminently respectable. He belonged to one of those Huguenot families which I have spoken of as practically identical in feeling with the Dutch on all questions of the mode of dealing with the natives. He had a grievance against the Government of Natal. "Why," said he, "would you believe it! some of my friends have recommended me to make myself scarce, and the authorities are pressing for me to enter into recognisances to secure my appearance at a trial. And what do you think all this fuss was about? I had been asked by a lady to give one of her servant-girls—Caffres, of course—a whipping. The girl had been stealing and doing other things of that sort; so I gave her twenty-five cuts with a strap like this. Three weeks afterwards the girl died, and they want to make me responsible for this. I say I have done no wrong, and I am not going to act as if I had." What I want to convey is the utter unconsciousness of the man of the kind of effect which such a story naturally has on the ears of an Englishman. To the man it was no more than if he had been a little unusually severe upon a mare instead of a horse, and the mare had died. My second story shall be a record of a rather amusing interview between Sir Garnet Walseley and a Dutch Boer, who came to see him at Conference Hill about the 8th of this month. The man explained how well he had thriven himself, and how satisfied he was with the general condition of things. "But," said he, "the thing we want is land. I want each of my sons to be able to say, 'There, all this great piece of land is mine,' and I don't care for my other possessions without that. Now look at that beautiful country over there in Zululand"—just divided from Conference Hill by the Blood River—"that's where we ought to be, and you will never have Zululand properly civilized till you have it settled by white men."

"Ah," said Sir Garnet, quietly watching him with a peculiar twinkle of the eye that must be familiar to many people in London, but speaking in the blandest possible tone—"ah, but would you explain to me why you are so deeply interested in the civilization of Zululand?" The man looked a little taken aback, but after a moment's pause, said, "Oh, because then the Zulus would work." "Work for you, you mean." "Well, yes, of course, that is what I should myself individually care about." "So then your proposition is," concluded Sir Garnet, "that first of all the Zululand shall be given to you, and then, as a great benefit to them to make up for that, you propose to make servants, practically slaves, of them, in order that they may cultivate what is now their own land for your benefit? I am sorry to disappoint you, but that will certainly not be, for it has been definitely decided that no white man shall be allowed to have land in Zululand, and that decision has been come to precisely in order to prevent the result which you think so desirable."—Ulrecht, Sept. 12.—Daily News.

Selected.

I would therefore encourage thee to diligence in the duties of the closet, to private reading of the Scriptures, to close self-examination, meditation and secret prayer, than to suffer thyself to be drawn forth into much conversation or writing on spiritual concerns. If thou look to the Lord Jesus, and desire to be his sincere, humble follower, He has promised such "shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life," and there is no teaching like his teaching.

With respect to visiting the sick and poor, thou knowest I have always encouraged thee to think of them, and to attend to their temporal wants; and if, in the course of thy visits amongst them for this purpose, thou feel inclined to read to them, it is a very useful and profitable employment for thee and them. But I need scarcely say to thee, it requires great caution and much religious experience, to speak suitably to persons who are undergoing the correcting discipline of our Heavenly Father, or whom He may be training, by many afflictions, for a better inheritance. "To speak a word in season," requires the assistance of that Spirit which only can teach us to speak aright, and I therefore would say, it is often safer, especially for young persons, to offer up a secret prayer on their behalf, than to express ourselves to them under the influence of present excitement.—Maria Fox, 1837.

The "Ordinances."

To the Editor of The [London] Friend.

Dear Friend,—On reading thy Editorial of the Tenth Month, it occurred to me that a few remarks on my personal experience might not be inopportune.

Early in life, believing I had experienced the new birth, I was full of joy and peace, till there came a test of my love to Christ and allegiance to his reign in the form of what I believed to be a call to say a few words in a meeting for worship. It appeared to me at that time an impossibility, and I so successfully resisted again and again, that, instead of peace, there was left to me a blank, which nothing I could do would fill. Years rolled on, a silent meeting became unbearable—for how can a soul worship the God whom it is disobeying?

At length I gradually withdrew myself from meetings, and ultimately was received into the communion of the Congregational Church. The minister of the church that I joined was a very enlightened Christian, and did not make baptism an essential of membership; but I would be baptized so that nothing might be lacking on my part; and well do I remember, when kneeling in the vestry, whilst the minister was pronouncing these words, "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," and as the water dropped on my head, that I expected the Heavenly Dove of Peace would descend to heal my weary soul. Alas! no change was felt. Then came the Supper—to me a solemn occasion. As I drank the wine and ate the crumb of bread, I thought, Surely now my hungry soul will be filled—but I was hungry still.

Within a year I resigned my membership with the Independents and returned to meetings. Friends, having patiently waited, never accepted my resignation or disowned me. On my remarking to a dear friend how nearly I had sold my birthright for a mess of pottage, she replied, "We would not let thee."

Another year elapsed and the test of obedience was again mercifully granted. I resisted no longer,—and to Him be all the praise.

Is it not possible that much of the restlessness within our borders is caused, not by the lack of liberty—but by want of obedience to some known command—some right eye, or hand offends, but we refuse to part with it.

Thine truly, C.

Benjamin Lay's Certificate.—The following certificate, received by the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia from Friends in England for that eccentric philanthropist, Benjamin Lay, is interesting as an illustration of the plainness of speech that characterized many of the documents of that age.

Colchester Monthly, the 4th of 12th mo, 1731: To Friends and brethren in Pennsylvania, Philadelphia or elsewhere these may come, greeting:

Dear Friends: Whereas our Friends, Benjamin Lay and Sarah Lay have declared to this meeting their intentions of transporting themselves into your Province or part of the globe—these are to certify all whom it may concern: That notwithstanding ye said Benjamin Lay hath formerly given occasion of offence to friends of Devonshire-house meeting in London, yet having given satisfaction to that meeting, as by that meeting have been in writing signified to us, and having of late behaved himself as becometh the truth, we do hereby signify our unity with him, the said Benjamin Lay, as a member of our meeting, and with his wife Sarah Lay as a minister and member, and with her also as a serviceable Friend amongst us.

We salute you with love unfeigned, and to your friends and brethren; Elizabeth Kendall, John Smith, Nicholas Bundoock, Elizabeth Bandoock, Samuel Bundoock, Jos. Sewell, Sarah Harvey, Elizabeth Dennis, Wm. Catchpole, Thomas Bandoock, Mary Bundoock, Joseph Harvey, Nicholas Bundoock, jr.

Ostrich Feathers.—The following extract is from "Ostriches and Ostrich Farming," by Julius de Mosenhal and J. E. Harting. "An eye-witness relates:—Having got with my friend into the middle of the crowd, so packed that they were unable to move, he quietly selected two or three of the best feathers, and with a very sharp curved knife in his right hand, the blade protected by lying flat against his finger, he pressed it down as near to the root as he could, and cut it off obliquely upwards. The bird was quite unconscious of the operation, standing perfectly still as he handed several to me; he then picked out a blood-feather, very beautiful, which on being cut bled a little, but the sharp knife separated it without being felt. In a month or six weeks he took out all the stumps, if they had not already fallen out. By this means the health of the bird is not impaired, no irritation-fever is produced, and you can select the feathers that are in prime condition, leaving the others to ripen in due course."

The plucking of the feathers is resorted to on a few farms, but as it injures the health of the bird, and operates against the production of good feathers, this custom is rapidly falling into disuse. The farming of ostriches for the sake of their feathers is an established trade at the Cape [of Good Hope].—T. P. Newman.

Flight of Flying-fish.—I became convinced that flying fish never leave the water for their aerial journey without some real or imagined cause of alarm; that they never fly in the air to indulge their sportive humor, or to give vent to their exuberant spirits, but solely to escape from some peril that threatens them in the sea beneath. My reasons for this opinion are, that they always rise from the ship's outwater or bow, and fly directly away from it; nor do they ever fly towards the ship unless palpably pursued by some voracious fish. A shoal will rise simultaneously from the ship's bows, and fly away in a series of straight but radiating lines, dropping irregularly into the water again, only to rise immediately once more, as simultaneously as if seized with a common panic; and thus they rise and fall two or three times, taking a course inclined about 45° to that of the ship, until ultimately a few only of the shoal may be seen emerging here and there at some distance on the ship's quarter. The only two instances in which I ever observed them fly against the ship's bows, happened when they were pursued by Bonitos or Albicores, a short distance off; when they became so terrified that they flew in all directions, blindly endeavoring to avoid their agile enemies.

Next, with regard to their mode of flight. A shoal of a hundred or so will rise simultaneously,—some proceeding a considerable distance, say from one hundred to one hundred and fifty yards, without falling into the water, while the individuals will drop after proceeding a few feet. In general terms it may be said that they leave the water at a very acute angle, and, as a rule, not more than two or three feet above the surface, rising as the crests of the wave rise, and falling with their troughs, often through the tops of the waves, without impeding their flight, lessening their speed or materially altering their course. Moreover, no difference was visible in their speed and length of flight, whether they flew in the direction of the wind or immediately against it; so that the idea of their being borne along by the wind was out of the question.

The opportunity of watching the evolutions of a larger species in the Atlantic, supplied me with the clue which I sought. I then became convinced that every flying-fish, as it leaves the water, has its wings in a state of rapid vibration, and thus it gains an impulse in a horizontal direction. As soon as it is thus fairly launched, the wings assume a state of rest, and thus they continue until the fish at length drops into the water. But when it meets and is struck by the crest of a wave, if it emerges from it immediately, as frequently happens, it does so with a similar vibration of the wings to that with which it first left the water; and each time it strikes a wave a new vibration succeeds.

Crossing the equator in longitude 22° W., I was witness to a remarkable scene, in which the poor flying-fish played a conspicuous part. The whole day long the path of the ship was beset with a number of large fishes (Albicores), which played sad havoc among them. The albicores were about 5 feet long, extremely active and bold, darting to and fro under the outwater, and raising the flying-fishes in terrific shoals. Every now and then they would leap in graceful curves 8 or 10 feet out of the water, and on several occasions one would make a succession of such leaps among the shoals of flying fish, and, singling out one, catch it in the air, the victim being distinctly seen between the jaws of the monster as he fell into the water. It was an exciting and interesting scene to witness the leaping and splashing of the great albicores, which pursued their prey with the rapidity of an arrow, and the frantic efforts of the flying fish to escape, which were often ineffectual.

On some days the shoals seen on the wing must have amounted to many thousands; and even when none were seen, proof sometimes existed of their great plenty. Thus, when lying for several days on the edge of the Pratas Reef, in the China Sea, not a single flying-fish was observed on the wing, yet when I went among the gannets' nests upon the island, I found that every bird sitting upon the nest had four or five large fresh flying-fish in its stomach, which it disgorged before taking wing.—Collingwood's Voyages of a Naturalist.

Intellect in a Cat.—Many years ago at Carne farmhouse, where relatives of mine were then living, the house-hold cat was observed to enter a bed-room in course of being spring-cleaned. The looking-glass being on the floor, the cat on entering was confronted with its own reflection, and naturally concluded that he saw before him a real intruder on his domain. Hostile demonstrations were the result, followed by a rush to the mirror, and then proceeding at obstacle to his vengeance, a fruitless cut round to the rear. This manoeuvre was more than once repeated with of course equal lack of success. Finally the cat was seen to deliberately walk up to the looking-glass, keeping its eyes on the image, and then when near enough to the edge to feel carefully with one paw behind for the supposed intruder, whilst with its head twisted round to the front it assured itself of the persistence of the reflection.

The result of this experiment fully satisfied the cat that he had been the victim of delusion, and never after would he condescend to notice mere reflections, though the trap was more than once laid for him.—Thos. B. Graves in Nature.

Mound Cultivation in Africa.—All the people are engaged at present in making mounds six or eight feet square and from two to three feet high. The sods in places not before hoed, are separated from the soil beneath and collected into flattened heaps, the grass undermost. When dried, fire is applied and slow combustion goes on, most of the products of the burning being retained in the ground, much of the soil is incinerated. The final preparation is effected by the men digging up the subsoil round the mound, passing each hoeful into the left hand where it pulverizes, and is then thrown on the heap. It is thus virgin soil on the top of the ashes, and burned ground of the original heap, very clear of weeds. At present many mounds have beans and maize four inches high. Holes a foot in diameter and a few inches deep, are made irregularly over the surface of the mound, and about eight or ten grains put into each. These are watered and kept growing till the rains set in, when a very early crop is secured."—Dr. Livingstone.

To be preserved inwardly watchful and quietly resigned to wait upon the Lord, though we partake not in immediate consolation by the renewing of life, is a great blessing, for which we ought to be thankful, as we cannot stay our own minds, nor curb our thoughts without Divine aid.—John Churchman.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 6, 1879.

It is with sincere satisfaction that we observe the action of the Post Master General, in refusing to allow the mails to be used for lottery purposes. Having ascertained that a certain party at Louisville, Kentucky, was engaged in this fraudulent business, he directed the postmaster at that place not to pay any postal money-order drawn to the order of the individual, and to return to the senders any registered letters bearing his address. We hope this action will be sustained, and that further efforts may be made to lessen this species of gambling, which is so detrimental to the best interests of all concerned.

In a lottery, whose agents in New York were recently prosecuted, 100,000 tickets are advertised, and 1857 prizes, making the chance nearly 53 to 1 against a given ticket drawing any prize at all. The number of prizes over $10 is very small and the chance of drawing one of these is proportionately less. The Times of that city in commenting on it, says: "To any estimate of mathematical probabilities, should always be added the unknown but, doubtless, formidable element of fraud on the part of the managers. On most of the patrons of these lotteries reasoning is wasted, however. An observant person will notice that sewing-girls, ill-clad and half-starved, and poor clerks, and laboring men predominate among the throngs that pass in and out of the agents' offices. These misguided people literally take the bread from their mouths to buy lottery tickets, and the mean and grasping hand of managers fattens on their misery. Over 82,000,000 a year are paid out in this city for lottery tickets, mostly by people too poor to live decently. It is a shameful waste of hard-earned money, and should be stopped."

We have received a copy of a small book issued by the Meeting for Sufferings of Friends of The Smaller Body in New England, and designed as a tribute to the memory of our beloved friend, John Wilbur. A letter from one of those interested in its publication stated in reference to it that it had been "decided to reprint the letters of our late dear friend John Wilbur to George Crossfield, with some other extracts from his writings, and a few letters, showing the estimation in which he was held by some of the most prominent and faithful ministers and elders on either side of the Atlantic;—men and women of unflinching integrity, and long and uniform adherence to principle, and to the cause of Him, whose they were and whom they served." This we regard as due to him, who for his early and innocent boldness in [exposing the errors] of innovators, had more to suffer from them and their adherents than any other one."

The letters to George Crossfield were referred to, were on doctrinal subjects, and were designed afresh to call the attention of our members to the true principles of our Society. They were published at the time (more than 40 years ago), by the Friend to whom they were addressed. The author was at that time engaged in the performance of a religious visit in Great Britain, and was greatly distressed at the evidences forced on his notice, that influences were at work which were drifting the Society away from its ancient standard of doctrine and practice. It was under a deep religious concern on this account, that the letters were written.

How fully and mournfully have succeeding events shown, that this concern was well-founded! And how nearly does the condition of some sections of our church verify the remark, as applicable to them, of one who has had unusual opportunities of observation—in substance—that the Beaconism of 1836, and the views of Elisha Bates and Dr. Ash, have become the average Quakerism of 1879!

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The mean temperature of 11th month, as appears by the Local Weather Report, was 43 degrees, which is one tenth of a degree less than same month last year, and one degree more than the average for the past six years. The highest point was 7.5, and the lowest 19 degrees. The total rainfall was 1.35 inches. The average for the past six years is 3.96 inches. Light snow falls occurred on the 6th, 20th, and 29th, amounting in all to about 2 1/2 inches.

The total number of national banks organized since the establishment of the national banking system in 1863, is 2438; of these 307 have gone into voluntary liquidation, and 81 have been placed in the hands of receivers. The capital of 2018 national banks in operation on the 1st of 11th mo, 1879, was $165,244,415, not including surplus, which amounted at that date to $114,000,000.

On the 1st of 11th month, Comptroller Knox says, the amount of currency in circulation was $1,165,555,501—or $380,000,000 in excess of the highest point reached between the suspension and the resumption of specie payment.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that over $113,000,000 has been collected during the year, at an average cost of 3.7-10 per cent. For the fiscal year the tax on distilled spirits shows an increase of $1,000,000, and on wines, an increase of $1,000,000. The enormous figure of 71,892,621 gallons, of which nearly 15,000,000 gallons were withdrawn for export. There still remains in certain districts, a degree of opposition to the collection of the revenue, which is quite formidable, and against which the commissioner recommends vigilance. The Fall River manufacturers have agreed to sign, in the prosecution of their duties.

The Register of the Treasury, in his annual report, shows the total tonnage of the vessels in this country has decreased 43,164 tons during the year. There is an increase of 8193 tons in the steam tonnage, and 16,818 in the canal and barge tonnage, and a decrease of 39,506 in the tonnage of sailing vessels.

It is said the Russian contract for the building of iron vessels in the United States has been indefinitely postponed by the rise in the price of metal.

The Fall River manufacturers have agreed to restore, on the 1st of next month, the schedule prices paid operatives in the 11th month of 1878. This represents an advance of 15 per cent.

The Switchback Railroad, at Mach Chunk, carried over sixteen thousand passengers during the year. The Fall River manufacturers have agreed to sign, in the prosecution of their duties, and it is reported that the White River Utes, including Jack, are on the way to Los Pinos to meet the commissioners.

During 10th month 154, 17,250 immigrants arrived at New York, against 13,508 in 10th mo, 1878. The whaling bark, Helen Mar, arrived at San Francisco on the 29th ult, from the Arctic Ocean, with the crew of the bark Mercury, abandoned in the ice, just north of Herald Shoals. The captain of the Mercury, thinks the steamer Jeannette may be frozen in the same spot, in which case there is a little hope of her ever getting out. The Mercury when abandoned had on board 1000 barrels of oil, 5000 lbs. of bone, and 4000 pound of ivory. She was owned in New Bedford.

Both branches of Congress met promptly at 12 o'clock on the 1st inst, about three-fourths of the members of the House were present, at a smaller proportion of Senators. The President sent in his message, which I said to be plain, straightforward and dispassionate. Outside of the suggestions about routine matters in the departments, there are but few recommendations for additional legislation.

The Committee of the National Board of Health has submitted to the local authorities and the citizen's committee of Memphis, a report on the sanitary needs of that city. They recommend among other things, the adoption of Colonel Waring's system of sewerage, to cost about $225,000.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending on the 29th ult, was 238—which is 16 less than the previous week, and 61 less than for corresponding week last year.

Markets, &c.—U. S. bonds, sixes, 1881, 106; 5's, do, 102 1/2; 4's, 1891, registered, 106; coupon, 107 1/2; 4's, 1907.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Floor.—Wisconsin and Minnesota extra, $6.25 to $6.75; Penna. do, $6.50 to $7; western do, do, $6.75 to $7.25. Rye flour, in bulk, demand; red, $1.40 to $1.44; amber, $1.45 to $1.46. Eye. 88 cts. Corn, old 60 to 61 cts.; new, 56 to 57 cts. Oats, mixed, at 41 to 42 cts., and white, 43 to 45 cts.

Hay and straw.—Prime timothy, 90 cts. at $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 75 to 81 cts. Straw, $1.10 to $1.25.

Wool.—Wool of the present season moderately active, and prices range from 3 to 6 cts. per lb. gross, as to quality Sheep, 4 to 5 1/2 cts. per pound. Hogs, 5 1/2 to 6 1/2 cts. per pound gross.

FOREIGN.—Gladstone, in a speech at the Corn Market, Edinburgh, on the 29th ult, denounced the extravagant finance management as extravagant and dishonest. The Afghan war expenses, he said, like those of the Abyssinian war, were underrated and kept secret pending the elections.

A meeting recently held in Liverpool, attended by 15,000 persons, was addressed by Farnell, who fully expounded the specialties for which the recent arrests in Ireland were made. He strongly denounced the action of the Government, which he predicted would utterly fail in its object. There was no disturbance, the committee having issued an appeal to the Irish to maintain a firm but peaceful attitude.

In the London Public Schools, the average expense of each pupil has risen from $11.25 in 1873, to $14.25 in 1878, due mainly to the annual increase of the salaries of teachers.

Nearly 5000 women and girls are employed about the coal mines of Great Britain. Of girls between 13 and 14 years of age, there are 432; of young women above the age of 16, there are no less than 4502 em. ployed.

An appeal from Cardinal Manning for subscription, to alleviate the distress in Ireland, was read in all the Catholic congregations in the Metropolitan on the 29th ult. It is stated that in the west of Ireland, such hunger and want and poverty are now to be seen, as have not been known since the great Irish famine.

The marriage of King Alfonso to the Austrian Archduchess Maria Christina, was solemnized on the 29th ult.

A dispatch from Cabul on the 29th ult, says the cold is severe, there being twenty degrees of frost. The majority of the European troops have been huddled.

Telegraphic communication from London with Cabul and Candahar, has been completed.

Under instructions from the Viceroy of India, the ex-Ameer, Yakub Khan, left Cabul on the 1st inst, for Peshawar, under charge of Captain Turner and an escort.

For "The Friend"

An Ancient Epistle.

The excellent advice contained in the following epistle is commended to the notice of the readers of "The Friend." It was addressed "To the Monthly and Quarterly Meetings, and other Meetings of Discipline of Friends in Ireland," by "The National Half-year's Meeting, held in Dublin, by adjournments from the 3rd day of the Fifth month, 1778, to the 7th of the same, inclusive."

Dear Friends and Brethren,—

We have in this our general assembly been deeply affected, and humbled under the sorrowful view and feeling of the declined state of many in our Society from the life and power of pure religion, and that humble, self-denying conversation which it leads into; and under this concern we have been afresh made feelingly sensible of the great loss and hurt that both individuals, and the Society in general, have sustained by letting out the mind and affections after great things in this life; many of the professors of Truth, as it is in Jesus, departing from under the discipline of his holy cross, have let up an high and aspiring mind, that affects ostentation and show, and seeks after many superfluities, to gratify the vain and ambitious cravings of the unmortified part in them: the noble simplicity of manners, habit, and deportment, which Truth led, and still leads into, hath been much departed from; the plainness of apparel, which distinguished our religious profession, is by too many despised, and the testimony which we have been called to bear against the unstable foolish fashions of the world has been trampled as under foot: the mind not limited by the girdle of Truth hath coveted an evil covetousness; the wedge of gold and the Babylonish garment have been the objects of its inordinate desire. And one exemplifying another, and the lesser fondly copying after the greater, an evil emulation hath gotten in, not provoking one another to love and good works, but vying with each other in the grandeur of their houses, the order and provision of their tables, the richness of their furniture, and the gaiety of their own dress, and that of their children, contrary to the self-denial, the humility and meekness prescribed by the gospel of Christ in which they profess to believe; and the constant tenor of the salutary advices of the Society they profess themselves members of, from the beginning to this very day.

Every superfluous thing occasions a superfluity of expense; and superfluity of expense requires extensive, and frequently exorbitant and precarious, engagements in trade beyond the capital and abilities of the managers to support it. And when their own fails, many too frequently keep up dishonorable state on the property of other men, till insolvency fatally ensues to the ruin of themselves and families, the loss and damage of their creditors, the reproach of Truth, and the great trouble of friends, who are concerned to keep good order amongst us.

It is an undoubted truth that the Society which doth not frequently recur to its first principles will go to decay; if then we look back to our beginning, we shall find that from the beginning it was not so. In a postscript to an early epistle from the province-meeting at Castlemdunow, we have this lively description of the effect Truth had in that day. "Then (say they) great trade was a great burden, and great concerns a great trouble; all needless things, fine houses, rich furniture, gaudy apparel, were an eyesore; our eye being single to the Lord, and the inshining of his light in our hearts, which gave us the sight of the knowledge of the glory of God," this "so affected our minds, that it stained the glory of all earthly things, and they bore no mastery with us." The divine principle of light and grace remains still the same, and would work the same effect in us, if we were obedient thereto; would even introduce gradually by the operation of its divine power, the new creation in Christ Jesus, whereby man returning from the fall, would be placed in dominion over all the creatures.

We are therefore, dear Friends, impressed with a zealous concern of mind, in this day of trial, "when the judgments of the Lord are in the earth, that the inhabitants thereof may learn righteousness;" as this is a time of danger, uncertainty, and distrust, we most earnestly desire that Friends may let their moderation in all things appear, that those who have hunched out extensively in trade, with as little delay as possible set about contracting their engagements therein into a moderate compass, and instead of risking the reputation of Truth, the peace of their own minds, and the welfare of their immortal souls, in grasping at things beyond their reach, in order to provide for superfluous expense, reduce their wants and expenses, within the limits and bounds of Truth, and then a little trade with frugality and industry will be found sufficient.

The love of money is a sore evil, "which while some have coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows." Let the Truth itself therefore, dear Friends, moderate and limit us in our pursuits; "a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." And the limitation and order prescribed by Him, who is the Truth, the Way, and the Life is this, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Many, who have transgressed this holy boundary, and reversed this heavenly order, in giving the preference to the pursuit of earthly possessions, have in themselves, or their offspring, furnished a verifying proof of the declaration of the Almighty by his prophet, viz: "Ye looked for much, and lo it came to little, and when ye brought it home I did blow upon it: Why? saith the Lord of hosts, because of mine house that is waste, and ye run every man to his own house."

And let those, whom Divine Providence hath prospered and blest with abundance of the good things of this life, ever bear in remembrance, that "the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." And that we are accountable stewards, each for his share, of the manifold mercies we receive at his hand. Let them then as good stewards use the same with a due regard to the pointings and limitations of Truth; not indulging themselves in any thing wherein is excess, and thereby setting an evil example to others, whose abilities cannot well bear the expense, and yet from the depravity of human nature may be tempted to copy after them. For those of the foremost rank in society, by the assistance of Divine Grace, may do much good, or neglecting it, by the influence of their example occasion much evil therein. We therefore earnestly desire, that those who are thus favored may seriously co-operate with our concern in setting a good example, and we hope it will have a happy influence on others, who may be discouraged from aiming at expense unbefitting their circumstances, when they behold those, who have it in their power, decline it through their regard to Truth, and for preserving inviolate the testimony of a good conscience toward God: the experienced apostle very pathetically in his direction to Timothy, points out the particular duty of this class of Christians, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."

Finally, Brethren and Sisters, as example must accompany precept if we be sincere toward God, we desire especially that ministers, elders, overseers, and other active members in the Society, may seriously in the first place set about this necessary work of re-tenching and reformation, where needful: that their nearest connexions, their children and families, in regard to the point of view in which their partners in life and parents are placed, may lay to heart the evil consequences of their deviating from the simplicity of Truth, and the pernicious influence of their evil example; that these, and the children the Lord hath given them, being as signs and good examples from the Lord of hosts, they may grow forth strengthened by the cleansing of their own hands, and those of their families, and so be enabled to say to the flock, "follow us as we follow Christ." And that parents, heads of families, and all friends, each in their proper places, may be engaged to wash their hands in innocency, and be qualified to encompass the Lord's holy altar, that the offering of Judah and Jerusalem may be pleased to the Lord as in the days of old, and as in former years."

In the extendings of that real affection, which desires your present and everlasting well-being, we salute you, and conclude

Your Friends and Brethren.

Signed on behalf of our said meeting by JOHN GOUGE, Clerk.

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

1862. 12th mo. 21st. I have of late been much favored at seasons to feel love to my Divine Master, and I trust a degree of resignation to his Divine will; may this in-umerated mercy be continued to me, that I may bear some fruit to the praise of his great and excellent name; may this fruit increase as I increase in years.

1863. 1st mo. 15th. Had a comfortable meeting; I hope it was so to most in attendance. While I feel a privation (of this comfortable feeling) I hope it is for my good. I have been comforted in believing I am not forsaken; what an unspeakable favor.

1st mo. 21st. I have, in unmerited mercy, been spared to advance thus far in the new year, while a number have been called within the last year from works to rewards; may I be favored to feel a sense of the obligations I am under to my Divine Master, and be preserved in the line of my duty to Him,—that I may not become comparable to the barren fig tree, or the salt that has lost its savor, and become good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men; truly a sorrowful state to be in, and from which we are only preserved by Divine Grace.

1st mo. 24th. In company with M. F., visited some of our members to make inquiry in relation to the use of ardent spirits; we were favored to sympathize with them, and to labor to discourage the use of intoxicating drink, and to encourage them to a regular attendance of all our religious meetings.

1st mo. 26th. Visited more of our members in regard to the use of intoxicating drink; were favored, I trust, to labor to some advantage, and I think, in good degree to the comfort of our own minds. It is the blessing of the Great Head of the Church that can alone make (it) fruitful of good. May I dwell low at his holy footstool, and reverence and serve Him. What a mercy I am not cast off and forsaken, and that so unworthy a creature is favored to feel a sense of his loving-kindness. May my love to Him, and faithfulness in serving Him, increase.

2d mo. 7th. I have at seasons felt much anxiety and some discouragements, at other times comfortable and precious feelings. In-quietude and inward retirement seem necessary.

3d mo. 12th. Attended our week-day meeting, in which I thought we were favored with a precious, quiet, solemn covering. In the evening of yesterday I got hurt by a cow; I hope it may be a blessing to me, to humble me and prepare me for what my Divine Master may be pleased to require of me; how great are his mercies, and how low He bears with his poor unworthy creature man. Oh! may we be more fruitful, to the praise of his great and holy name.

1863. 7th mo. 5th. Attended our meeting; we were favored with a quiet covering, and I hope a number clothed with a qualification to worship in spirit and in truth; what an inexpressible favor to be enabled to perform worship acceptably. The last week has been a very exciting time. Last First day evening I was told the cars were stopped running on the Pennsylvania railroad about Harrisburg, and there was a great many cars standing on the track above Downingtown. The Governor had made a call for men to guard Harrisburg against an attack of the rebel army, which was supposed to be advancing toward that place. Many thought it was their intention to pass down through Chester county to Philadelphia. I think many have been in much trouble on account of danger to their persons and property, and I hope some have been humbled, feeling the necessity of having their trust in that Divine Power that can alone preserve us in the midst of danger. Through unmerited favor I was enabled to feel a hope and trust in our Divine Master, without which I must have been very much cast down. Oh! the sad and distressing effects of war; I am afraid too many of our members partake of its spirit."

Few, perhaps, would have more sensitively shrunk from public notice than the subject of these extracts,—retiring, watchful, and humble as his walk was pre-eminently among men,—and it is, we trust, with no desire to exalt the creature that they are now published; but it is hoped with the single object of exalting that Power by yielding to which, and faithfully following its pure dictates in the secret of his heart, he became what he was, an exemplary Christian. The period of time to which we have now arrived in the diary, was one of great anxiety to the inhabitants of this section of the country, a time when "men's hearts were indeed failing them for fear."

There appeared a great probability that the rebel army, in its onward progress towards Philadelphia, would pass through this fair part of Chester county, leaving behind it a wide-spread scene of destruction of property if not of life. The writer well remembers meeting, about this time, one of our more prominent citizens on the streets of West Chester, one who in earlier life had been a military man, and whose connexions were military men. After conversing upon the very threatening aspect of affairs, he remarked, with much seriousness of tone and manner, "Well! it will be just as the Lord pleases." It was apparent he had no confidence in the arm of flesh to stop their march. It is said our friend, Ebenezer Worth, was spoken to about this time, and representations made, what destruction was likely to come upon property, &c., his buildings would probably be burned, fields laid waste, crops destroyed, &c., when he made this memorable answer, "Oh! they are not mine;" no doubt experiencing as he expresses it, "Through unmerited favor, I was enabled to feel a hope and trust in my Divine Master, without which I must have been very much cast down."

Although he took no part in public affairs yet all may well believe his spirit was fervently engaged to embrace every right opening to ask of Him, "Before whom the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance," and who "taketh up the isles as a very little thing," that He would, if consistent with his holy will, spare this portion of the land, and its people, from the desolating and demoralizing effects of an invading army. No allusion is made in the diary of a covenant solemnly entered into, we may believe, with his Divine Master, that if He would in his great mercy, arrest the onward progress of the rebel army, and not permit it to cross the Susquehanna river, he would devote the whole of his crop of corn, then growing, for the benefit of the poor and suffering. We know not the extent and effect of this covenant and prayer, but this much we do know and believe, that the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much, and that the army was not permitted to cross the river, although close upon its western banks. This covenant was faithfully kept; the crop of corn amounted to some ten or fifteen hundred dollars—one thousand dollar of the proceeds was sent to the Treasurer of the Friends' Freedmen's Association, and we know of his having purchased woolen yarn, which was given to women needing work to be knit into stockings, that were sent South for the benefit of the Freedmen. So careful was our dear friend not to let his left hand know what his right hand did, that it was with difficulty his many acts of charity could be ascertained.

Be Faithful.

"There is that withholdeth more than it meet, and it tendeth to poverty. There is that scattereth abroad, and yet increaseth."

An interesting illustration of the truth of this proverb is furnished by the experience of John Churchman as related in his journal. May the instruction it contains be blessed to those who are tempted to shrink from such services as are required of them by the Head of the Church! It is the blessing of the Lord alone that enriches any of us with spiritual possessions; and we cannot hope that it will be liberally poured out upon us, unless we yield faithful and simple-hearted obedience to Him in whatever duties He lays upon us John Churchman says:

"In 1733 I accompanied Friends on another visit to families, wherein, at times, I felt the opening of truth in the love of it, and a few words to speak to the states of some, though in great fear, lest I should put my hand to that weighty work without the real requiring of duty. At one family, I thought it would be better for the whole family, in a religious sense, if the heads of it were more zealous in attending meetings. I saw the necessity of being examples to children and servants, by a careful attendance of meetings for worship on the first, and other days of the week; but I was so weak and poor, that I doubted whether it was my duty to mention any thing thereof to them, so concluded to omit it; by which I hoped to judge of what I had been about before, and so grew easy in my mind. On the way to the next house, I began to judge that I had no business to say any thing at any house; and having forborne in my own will, I was now left to my own judgment for a time. At the next house, Friends were tenderly concerned to speak to several states, and of several matters which I thought instructive; but I sat dry and poor, and so remained during our passage to the next house; where I fared no better, but worse. My feeling and judgment being quite gone, as to the service in which we were engaged; and though I did not say any thing to the other Friends how it fared with me, yet they were affected therewith as I apprehended. I was in great darkness and distress, and sometimes thought of leaving the company privately, and going home, but concluded, that would not only be a disappointment to my friends, but dishonorable to truth, which made me determine to go forward, and endure my own pain, as much undiscovered as possible. My companions, as I before observed, were affected, and all save one seemed closed up from the service, and in the evening of the same day at the last house, all of them were silent. There was a school near, the master of which was a Friend, and the children mostly belonging to Friends, whom some of our company appeared willing to visit, but others being doubtful, we omitted it, which now some thought was not right, and that therefore this cloud of darkness and distress came upon us, and we were willing to meet at the school-house next morning, to try if we could recover our former strength in the openings of truth. This being agreed to, each took his way home, and it being now night, and I alone, I rode slowly, under a deep exercise of mind, and humble inquiry into the cause of my own distress; and after some time, being favored with great calmness and quietude of mind, I was inwardly instructed after this manner: Thou sawest what was wanting in a family this morning, and would not exhort to more diligence in that respect, and therefore if they continue to do wrong, it shall be required of thee; on which I became broken in spirit, and cried in secret, may I not perform it yet, and be restored to thy favor? Oh Lord! I am now willing to do whatsoever thou requires of me, if thou wilt be pleased to be with me. Blessed be his name, in mercy He heard my supplication, and I was fully persuaded that I must go to the house again; which I concluded to do next morning, and went home with a degree of comfort, and being weary in body and mind, slept sweetly, and awoke in the morning quiet and easy in spirit, and now began to conclude that I might meet my company and be excused. But my covenant was brought to my remembrance, and I was given to believe, that peace was restored on condition of my performance; therefore I went to the house, though several miles distant, before sunrise, the man of the house was up, he invited me in, and I followed him, and sitting down by the fire, being cool weather, with my mind retired, I felt that I must not speak before the rest of the family, but rather in private, yet was fearful of calling him out, being unwilling to discover any thing to them. In the mean time, he went out, and walked the way I was to go, I followed, and told him how I felt when we were at his house the morning before, and could not be easy without exhorting him to be more careful in several respects, and a better example to his family in his attendance of meetings. He seemed affected, and said he hoped he should mind my advice. I then left him, and met my companions at the school-house, and enjoyed great peace. I leave this remark, to excite all to dwell in meekness and fear, and to beware of the will of the creature, and the reasonings of flesh and blood, which lead into doubting and disobedience. They who are faithful in small things, shall truly know an increase in that wisdom and knowledge which are from above."

British Guiana.

C. B. Brown, who held the position of Government Surveyor in this part of South America, has published in book form his observations on the natural history of the country, and the incidents of his various journeys of exploration. These journeys were principally along the various rivers which find their way from the elevated land of the interior to the ocean. On one of these, the Potaro, a branch of the Essequibo, our author discovered a magnificent fall, called by the Indians Kaieteur, which he subsequently revisited, and measured. The river was about 400 feet wide, and was slightly contracted at the spot where it plunged over the precipice, making a perpendicular fall of 741 feet. At the time of the visit the Potaro was swollen by rains, and poured over the edge of the rocks a vast volume of water, which, as it reached the basin below, "sent up great creamy spurts of foam with a steady thundering roar. A dense mass of mist rose from the western side of the foot of the fall, which, whirling upwards above the top, was caught by the wind, and blown like a cloud-scud over the savanna, while a smaller one rose from the eastern edge. The precipices on either side curving round from the fall to the sides of the valley were of gray and reddish colors, with patches of shrubs and mosses clinging here and there to their faces. On the western side a mass of enormous rocks, sloped to the basin's edge, almost meeting with a smaller similar mass in front of the basin, coming from the eastern side. The outlet, therefore, from the basin appeared to be constricted, but vast quantities of water find their way in channels beneath these confused heaps of rock.

It was with difficulty that I could stand near the precipice edge, a little to one side of the fall, and gaze down past the rush of water to the foot, the downward movement of the white mass producing a sensation of giddiness. One could see the dim outlines of the entrance to a great cave behind the water, in and out of which through mist and spray a number of large black swallows wheeled and circled.

On another visit, the author says: "We watched with great interest the 'swallows' homeward flight to their roosting places in the great cave behind the fall. Late on each afternoon, these birds were observed coming in large flocks from all quarters of the compass towards our vicinity, and there wheeling round in great circles at different altitudes. Gradually one flock amalgamated with another, till at last near sundown they had gathered into two or three immense bodies, which kept wheeling round in a compact mass, about one hundred yards above us.

Whilst we were wondering how the birds proposed to get into the cave from their awkwardly chosen position above it—feeling almost sure that they would have to get gradually into the valley in front, and then fly straight towards their roosts—the question was solved by a portion of the mass swooping down, with extraordinary velocity, to the edge of the fall, seemingly close to the face of the column of water, and then being lost to our view. The rushing sound of their wings in their downward flight was very strange, and produced the feeling that birds of ill-omen were about. Approaching the edge of the precipice, we waited to see the next lot go down, so as to observe how they managed to get behind the water. We had not yet to wait long before down dropped a cloud of them over the edge, past the face of the fall, for about one hundred feet; then, with the rapidity of lightning, they changed their downward course with a quick turn to one at right angles, and thus shot through the mist on either side into the gloomy cave. Their motions were so rapid that we could hardly make out how they were executed."

Guiana abounds in reptile life,—and the book contains many notices of snakes and caymans and other lizards, one species of these, the Iguana, is hunted for food, and is thus described:

"We were frequently amused with the manner in which the iguanas (Iguana tuberculata), alarmed by the noise produced by the boat's paddles, threw themselves from the overhanging branches of trees into the river, many coming down broadside on the water. These reptiles, when full grown, attain a length of between three and four feet, including the tail, which is long and pointed. Their flesh resembles that of a chicken in flavor and quality, and is very good when properly cooked. They are exceedingly numerous on this river, where they dig long underground chambers in the sand-banks at the ends of islands, in which they deposit their eggs. Near the foot of a cataract, where there was a high beach, our men dug up the sand in order to trace out some of these chambers for eggs, and succeeded in capturing four iguanas, which they dragged out by their tails and then seized by the back of the neck and secured. They had to be pretty quick, for the iguana can turn round suddenly and give a fearful bite. An iguana must be drawn from its hole with rapidity, for, if it has time to think, it lets go its tail at the base, leaving it in the hands of the would-be capturer, and thus escapes."

Teaching of the Spirit.—Free Ministry.

Frequent insinuations have been thrown out by those pretending Friends, of the new views; concerning the uncertainty of the immediate direction, and preaching of the Holy Spirit; the want of which in themselves is no doubt caused by unfaithfulness thereto, and by the setting up, in the stead of a ministry which proceeds therefrom, a ministry which is exercised in the time and will of man. The early views of Friends on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and of a paid or hiring ministry, are so clearly delineated in the concluding part of our friend Thomas Story's dialogue with a Roman Catholic, that the writer would be glad to see it inserted in "The Friend." He says: "My opponent by this time being weary of the subject, (viz., the eating and drinking of the flesh and blood of Christ,) advanced a question concerning the Spirit itself, viz., "How do you know that Spirit from another Spirit, since Satan is transformed into an angel of light, may it not be that evil one, and not the Spirit of Christ?" I replied that the Divine essential Truth is self-evidencing, that the quickened soul is assured of Him by his own nature and quickening power and virtue, as saith the apostle, "Hereby we know that He abideth in us;" 1 John iii. 24, (or to this effect) by the Spirit which He hath given us; and he that is in a state of doubting is in a state of condemnation and reprobation, and hath not yet known the Spirit, but is yet in death and darkness, and ignorant of God and Christ, and in such and not in the quickened or regenerated, Satan is transformed; for such as wanted a proof of Christ speaking in and by the apostles, were by Paul referred back to themselves; "know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?" and again, "the Spirit itself helpeth our infirmities with sighs and groans which cannot be uttered, and searcheth all things, even the deep things of God." He then said, no doubt I had a good intention when I did, in travelling so in the world; but said I must have some good consideration for it (meaning as their priests had gold and silver.) I told him no; we whom God had raised up and qualified in some degree, in this age to that service, were advanced above any such mean, base, and mercenary considerations as to take anything from men for this labor, which we bestow freely and in the love of God, and by his commandment for the common good of men. Why, said he, the apostles were but poor men, and wanted necessities, and must have received of the people or wanted. True, said I, then they say having food and raiment, let us therewithal be content, and where that is the case, such as are poor among us, we should not begrudge them that; but it is seldom, or never among us, but rather with Paul we can generally say, "These hands of mine have ministered to my necessities," having no desire that any such thing should be done to us, and we generally have sufficient of our own. Then said he, but in case your Friends, after some very good sermon that pleased a great congregation well and generally, should offer you a purse of two or three hundred guineas, would not you accept it, being freely offered? I replied no; I hope it would be no temptation, if so it were, which never can be as long as they and I abide in the truth we profess, either to give or receive that way; I should rather be greatly troubled to see so great a degeneracy as to subject them to so great an evil. Well, said he, you say well, and I am apt to believe you; but if you would not, there are many would be glad of the offer, and receive it with both hands. I believe it, said I, for there are too many mercenary hirelings in the world, who, though they pretend a mission to "Go teach and baptize all nations," yet as unfaithful servants, if they were sent at all, sit down where they can have the first maintenance and never move till the voice of a better cry in their ears, and then and not till then, they run where God does not send them.

Oh! that the Lord may raise up amongst us again other such faithful rulers as these were. I have no doubt that there are those prepared and preparing for the great work, and that the places of the unfaithful will be filled by such as will count nothing too dear to part with for the work's sake; the cause of Truth has stood for more than two centuries, it has been tried, yet never gave way and never will, for it is immutable; the religion of Fox, Barclay and Penn will flourish when the innovations of the present time will not be found.

AUTUMN LEAVES.

Purple, and yellow, and scarlet,
The trees in their autumn array,
Are lighting the fields and woodlands
With their coloring rich and gay.

Standing in sunlight and shadow,
Bright leacons of beauty and cheer;
But telling, leaflet by leaflet,
The pulse of the dying old year.

Purple, and yellow, and scarlet,
They are fluttering gaily down,
And decking the grave of summer
With a gold and jewelled crown.

When the autumn of life approaches,
As at last it must to us all,
Oh, then may we have the beauty,
The glorious tints of the fall!

The purple of resignation,
The yellow of hope and of cheer,
And the rich, enduring scarlet
Of the love that "casteth out fear."

MY GUIDE.

I stood in life's fair morning hours,
My hand upon the door,
And from the threshold onward looked
And scanned the pathway o'er;
A little way through pleasant fields,
Through meadows fair and sweet,
Where one might walk with joyful heart,
And light and careless feet.

And then more narrow grew the path,
And rougher grew the way,
Beset by dangers, and overthrow
With shadows cold and grey,
"Ah! me!" I said, "life is so long,
So full of hopes and fears,
With much to do and much to bear
For many days and years.

"With joys that I must have or give,
And tears that I must weep,
And many foes to meet and fight
Before death's quiet sleep;
And I must journey all alone
This rough and darksome way;
Alas! alas! before the end
My feet will go astray."

But while I troubled at the door,
And murmured in my fear,
A tender voice of wondrous power
Fell on my waiting ear—
"Fear not, my child, but take my hand,
And journey by my side;
I know the way, I am thy lead,
Thy Counsellor, thy Guide!"

And so I started on life's way,
Clinging to his hand,
And He has led me safe along,
My Leader, great and grand!
And when dark clouds encompass me,
My heart is brave and strong,
And I can sing through life, in death,
Faith's glad triumphant song.

GRATEFULNESS.

Thou hast given so much to me,
Give one thing more, a grateful heart.

Not thankful, when it pleaseth me,
As if Thy blessings had spare days,
But such a heart, whose pulse may be Thy praise.

UNDER THE UMBRELLA.

Selected.

Coming home from school together,
In the cold and rainy weather,
Marion, with her nut-brown hair,
Bonnie Grace, so sweet and fair!
Just behind them, I, while walking,
Listened to their childish talking;
First of lessons learned that day,
Then of recess and their play;
Then a little chat on dolls,
And then of "brother's cricket balls";
Of this and that as children will,
Whose little tongues are never still.

"How it rains!" cried Grace, at last,
As the drops fell thick and fast.
"We don't care, though, for you see We're under shelter, you and me."
Then said Marion, "Sister dear,
There's room for one more under here,
And do you think another would care,
If we should call that poor girl there,
And ask her—shall I, or will you?—
To come in under shelter too?
She looks so sad; and then I know
She's cold, because she shivers so."
A moment more, and presently
The large umbrella sheltered three.

Oh little kind Samaritan!
Sweet, thoughtful little Marion!
Remember as you older grow
That many a heart so filled with woe
May flatter by the roadside drear,
Bowed low with grief and many a fear.
Then from the shelter of God's care
Stretch forth your hand and gladly share
The haven of your pitying love,
To save from angry clouds above,
Ope wide, dear child, sweet Charity's door,
Where there is always room for more.

Baptismal Regeneration.

To one who is not blinded by the prejudices of education, and who has come to a real experience of the transforming and regenerating power of the Holy Spirit, by which men are washed, are sanctified and are justified and made partakers of that forgiveness of sins which the obedient disciple receives through the merits of our blessed Redeemer,—the notion that any spiritual benefit is to be derived from sprinkling the body of an unconverted infant with water, or from plunging an adult into that fluid, is felt to be very fallacious and unsafe.

The writer has recently met with a narrative, which shows in an instructive manner, how even well-disposed and serious people may grow up with very superficial views on this important subject, and may rest easy relying on outward ordinances, without knowing that thorough change of heart, spoken of as being born again, without which our Saviour assures us we cannot enter the kingdom of Heaven. The authority for the truth of the narrative is not given, but it bears on its face some evidence of being a recital of events that really occurred. It says that "in one of the villages of the 'hill country' of the East Riding of the great county of York, lived a good old woman, known throughout the neighborhood by the style and title of 'Good old Methodist Mary.' 'Walking in the fear of the Lord all the day long,' her very humble cottage was a habitation of the just. Mary could read; and having constitutionally a ready mind, what she read she understood and easily remembered. Her means of knowledge, however, were limited by her circumstances. The Holy Bible, John Wesley's hymn-book, and the 'Christian Miscellany'—the cottage library of many a poor but pious family sent-red in all directions over the Wolds of York-ire—was Mary's library.

Mary's good sense and Christian consistency had great influence with her neighbors, and the power of that influence reached even to the family inmates of the hall, (the late Mr Tatton Sykes, and his wife, Lady Sykes, Slesmere, England.) Her ladyship's of the mansion was a lady indeed, and thought herself a Christian indeed. Easy and affable in her manners, noble and generous in her disposition, large-hearted and liberal in her charities, she literally revelled in the luxury of doing good to the poor, influenced mainly by the idea that heaven would be the result and the reward. A name once on her ladyship's bill, nothing short of proved immorality could make it off.

Once, on a day when her ladyship was about to take a walk among the poor cottagers of the several villages which belonged to the estate, an attempt was made from an unexpected quarter to lessen good old Mary's estimation of her ladyship. At her usual interview with the clergyman of the parish, when she inquired into the general conduct and necessities of the poor, he abruptly, and in a tone that could not be mistaken, exclaimed, 'Your ladyship is not sufficiently discreet in the distribution of your charities.'

'How so?'

'I think character should do much more than it does in determining the difference here is in the merits of those whom your ladyship relieves.'

'Character is every thing, and does every thing,' was the spirited rejoinder.

'How is it, then, that your ladyship's dole to that "old Methodist Mary" is so liberal?'

'Because I believe her to be a very good woman.'

'Your ladyship, surely, cannot be aware that she keeps a disorderly house, inviting young men and women, servants of both sexes, into it, allowing them to stay to a late hour of the night. Serious evil must be the result.'

'No, indeed, I am aware of nothing of the sort. My knowledge of Mary goes far back into the past; but no breath has ever whispered into my ear evil tidings of her. This is the first time of its being done, and you are the first to do it. I must see her,' said her ladyship gravely, 'and tell her what you say.'

With a light and nimble step did her ladyship pace over the distance between the rectory and the cottage, quickened by the sad character of the tale that had been told her.

Properly impressed with the rank and character of her ladyship, the venerable old woman respectfully received her into the cottage—a cottage always clean and neat—and listened to the communication her ladyship had to make.

With a heart at ease, and a countenance indicative of the undisturbed serenity of her mind, Mary said, 'I have great pleasure in informing your ladyship that there is not the least truth in the sense intended, in the report of which your ladyship has so condescendingly made me acquainted.'

'Well, Mary, I did not believe it, I do not believe it; and nothing short of positive proof of its correctness could induce me to believe it.'

Overcome with emotion, Mary arose, and stood before her ladyship silently for awhile

—then said, 'I am thankful to God that, by the assistance of his heavenly grace, I have so conducted myself as to win the confidence and good opinion of your ladyship; and so long as I "keep myself pure," I believe I shall never lose it.'

'Never, no, never!' was the tender and touching reply.

'I do not blame the rector,' continued Mary, 'only in as far as he may have lent a willing ear to the voice of slander; but I blame those who have distorted and misrepresented facts in their communications with him.'

She then told her visitor, that it had been a time of revival the religious interest among her people—the Wesleyan Methodists—and that the assemblies at her house had been for devotional purposes; and added this suggestive remark: 'When masters and mistresses themselves are brought under the converting power of the Holy Ghost, they can easily tolerate irregularities of this sort in the servants, who are being made partakers of 'like precious faith.'

'Deeply serious, as if pondering in her heart all the words she had just heard, her ladyship arose and left the cottage. Ere she had got over half of the way between it and the rectory, she stood still, as if some startling thought had suddenly arrested her attention. The pause was brief, and resulted in her instant return to the cottage.

On opening the door, almost before she had crossed its threshold, her ladyship, in sentences short, unconnected, and rapid, said, 'The words "convert," "converted," and "conversion," Mary, which you used in our conversation this morning, I do not understand. What do you mean by them? I have been taught to believe that I was converted and regenerated in my baptism.'

'Indeed!' exclaimed Mary; 'then your ladyship has needed conversion many a time since then. Baptism cannot wash away the natural depravity of the human heart.'

'But there is the sacrament, Mary, the efficacy of which, I am told, is saving and sanctifying, and I rest in that efficacy.'

'My lady, excuse me; your ladyship is in the utmost danger of being deceived.'

'Do you really think so?'

'I do, indeed,' said Mary.

'With deep emotion her ladyship exclaimed, 'I hope not! I can assure you, Mary, I wish it to be right.'

'Your notions of conversion being so much at variance with what God's holy book says about it, your ladyship cannot be right. O, if I could but induce your ladyship to read carefully and prayerfully the third chapter of St. John's Gospel, and the eighth chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, God, by his Spirit, would give you to see the true nature of conversion, and to feel it too!'

'I will do so,' was the prompt promise of her ladyship; 'and if I am not converted, I will give myself no rest till I am.' Mary's advice was taken by this noble heir of immortality; and Mary's prediction was fulfilled; for in reading the specified portions of Holy Scriptures she was convinced that she was not truly converted to God. Being thus instructed in 'the way of God more perfectly,' and being 'fervent in spirit,' she was made a 'new creature in Christ Jesus,' and became a Christian indeed, in whom there was no guile.

This change was very shortly before her ladyship was seized with her death-illness. She summoned her husband and children to her bedside, and most affectionately and effectively 'witnessed a good confession' before them; so effectively, indeed, that her husband, venerable in years, overpowered with emotion, fell on his knees and prayed for mercy.'

Deliverance from Shipwreck.

In the Atlantic Monthly, S. L. Clemens repeats "a true story, true in every detail," told by a minister on board the ship where they were sailing.

'Captain Ronnevaille's vessel was lost in mid-Atlantic, and likewise his wife and his two little children. Captain Ronnevaille and seven seamen escaped with life, but with little else. A small, rudely constructed raft was to be their home for eight days. They had neither provisions nor water. They had scarcely any clothing; no one had a coat but the captain. This coat was changing hands all the time, for the weather was very cold. Whenever a man became exhausted with the cold, they put the coat on him and laid him down between two shipmates until the garment and their bodies had warmed life into him again.

'Among the sailors was a Portuguese who knew no English. He seemed to have no thought of his own calamity, but was concerned only about the captain's bitter loss of wife and children. By day he would look his dumb compassion in the captain's face; and by night, in the darkness of the driving spray and rain, he would seek out the captain and try to comfort him with caressing pats on the shoulder. One day when hunger and thirst were making their sure inroads upon the men's strength and spirits, a floating barrel was seen at a distance. It seemed a great find, for doubtless it contained food of some sort. A brave fellow swam to it, and after long and exhausting effort got it to the raft. It was eagerly opened. It was a barrel of magnesia!

'On the fifth day an onion was spied. A sailor swam off and got it. Although perishing with hunger, he brought it in its entirety and put it into the captain's hand. The history of the sea teaches that among starving, shipwrecked men, selfishness is rare, and a wonderful compelling magnanimity the rule. The onion was equally divided into eight parts, and eaten with deep thanksgivings.

'On the eighth day a distant ship was sighted. Attempts were made to hoist an arc, with Captain Ronnevaille's coat on it for a signal. There were many failures, for the men were but skeletons now, and strengthless. At last success was achieved, but the signal brought no help. The ship faded out of sight, but left despair behind her. By-and-by another ship appeared, and passed so near that the castaways, every eye eloquent with gratitude, made ready to welcome the boat that would be sent to save them. But this ship also drove on, and left these men staring their unutterable surprise and dismay into each other's ashen faces. Late in the day still another ship came up out of the distance, but the men noted with a pang that her course was one which would not bring her nearer. Their remnant of life was nearly spent, their lips and tongues were swollen, parched, cracked with eight days' thirst; their bodies starved; and here was their last chance gliding relentlessly from them; they would not be alive when the next sun rose.

"For a day or two past the men had lost their voices; but now Capt. Rounceville whispered, 'Let us pray.' The Portuguese patted him on the shoulder in sign of deep approval. All knelt at the base of the oar that was waving the signal-boat aloft, and bowed their heads. The sea was tossing; the sun rested, a red, rayless disk aloft, and bowed their heads. When the men presently raised their heads they would have raised a hallelujah if they had had a voice; the ship's sails lay wrinkled and flapping against her masts; she was going about! Here was a rescue at last, and in the very last instant of time that was left for it. No, not rescue, yet—only the imminent prospect of it. The red disk sank under the sea and darkness blotted out the ship. By and by came a pleasant sound—oars moving in a boat's row-locks. Nearer it came, and nearer, within thirty steps, but nothing visible. Then a deep voice; 'Hol-lo?' The castaways could not answer, their swollen tongues refused voice. The boat skirted around and round the raft, started away—the agony of it!—returned, rested the oars, close at hand, listening, no doubt. The deep voice again; 'Hol-lo? Where are you shipmates?' Capt. Rounceville whispered to his men, saying; 'Whisper your best, boys! now—all at once!' So they sent out an eight-fold whisper in hoarse concert: 'Here!' There was life in it if it succeeded; death if it failed. After that supreme moment, Capt. Rounceville was conscious of nothing until he came to himself on board the saving ship." Said the minister, concluding:

"There was one little moment of time in which that raft could be visible from the ship, and only one. If that one little fleeting moment had passed unfruitful, those men's doom was sealed. When the sun reached the water's edge that day, the captain of the ship was sitting on deck reading his prayer book. The book fell; he stooped to pick it up, and happened to glance at the sun. In that instant that far-off raft appeared for a second against the red disk, its needle-like oar and diminutive signal cut sharp and black against the bright surface, and in the next instant was thrust away into the dusk again."

It is an high and heavenly state, for any one to witness within themselves, that self is made of no reputation. Those who are in this state have their minds turned to the light of God within, and are exercised thereby; which alone discovers and makes self manifest in all its appearances, thoughts, ways, imaginations, and leads those that walk in it, to the true self-denial, without which there is no salvation.

For the destruction, loss and misery of all mankind, came in at this door, when he gave heed, credit and reputation to his own selfish desire, thought, reasonings and imaginations; and would know of himself, be wise of himself, &c. Then the serpent, which spoke of himself, prevailed over him; then he entered into the temptation of the devil, and lost his dwelling-place in paradise. Thus the enemy of man's happiness, under a pretence of advancing him and bettering his state, and making him of some account and reputation, drew him into a state of loss and misery. Self-reputation was the first bait of the enemy, and will be the last; therefore watch diligently against it, for herein his power stands, and by this bait he overcame the first Adam; therefore it is a blessed thing to live in the power of the second Adam, which makes self of no reputation. For as sin and the Devil entered and prevailed by reason of some self-reputation, so shall he be cast forth and overcome by the power of God, in all those in whom it makes self of no reputation.

This is a principal lesson of Christianity, which all of necessity must learn in some measure, before they can be so much as disciples of Jesus; as himself teacheth, "If any man will be my disciple, he must deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me." Denying of self, and taking up the cross, are inseparable, and must precede discipleship; yet this state is short of being a friend of God, and co-heir with Christ: bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh; and short of sitting down with Him at the right hand of God in the kingdom of heaven; and of knowing the Son to surrender the kingdom up to the Father, and God to become all in all; short of knowing it meat and drink to do the will of God, and his fruit sweet to their taste, and to sit under his shadow with great delight, glorified with that glory which Christ had with the Father before the world began. In this state, self is made truly of no reputation; the first birth is slain, the serpent's head is not only bruised, but broken and subdued; the second birth rules; the elder serves the younger, who delights naturally to do the will of God; and it is not a cross to do it, neither is the cross to be taken up by it; this is the sheep that knows Christ's voice, and followeth Him with delight, and a stranger it will not follow.—William Sheven.

For "The Friend."

Heavenly Discipline.—"When the Lord is pleased to withhold from us the sweet enjoyment of his love, although we may be sensible of the want of it, yet we cannot reach it for ourselves, and therefore we ought to bow in reverence before him. He deals with us as a tender father may do with his child, who may see meet to withhold food from him for a time, that he may learn subjection to his father. So the Lord sees meet to hide his face at some times from us, as he did from his servants of old, who said, Thou hidest thy face, and I am troubled. Although but a little before, he was so favored with the Divine presence, that he thought thereby his mountain was made to stand strong; yet there was soon an alteration in his state. When the Lord hid his face, he was troubled; and so it may be with us. And when the Lord doth withdraw from us, let us examine ourselves, that we may come, by that (light of Christ) which shows unto men what their states are, to discern whether there is any thing amiss in us, that we might give the Lord just cause to withdraw from us."—Mary Lamley, 1722.

Herish and keep close to that which visits.—"How have I desired that every awakened mind would keep close to that which visits it, and in the day of its blessed power and heart-softening influence, adopt the conduct of the holy Apostle, who tells us, he went not to that which were anointed before him, but, bowing before his great Master, was only concerned to know his will; putting up this petition, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"—William Lewis.

"The God of Israel is He that giveth strength and power unto his people."—The Psalmist.

The Danger.

The great danger to the cause of Christ found, not in the infidelity of the day, but in the lack of vital godliness in the churches. There is a rapidly growing tendency to supplant the religion of the Holy Ghost with religion of forms and ceremonies. Most of the churches are unconsciously adopting customs and acting from principles which, logically carried out, must land them at Rome. They are abandoning the distinctive feature upon which they were founded. They are substituting natural religion for the supernatural—the observance of forms and ceremonies for the power of the Holy Ghost. Christianity, instead of being to the "Greeks foolishness and to the Jews a stumbling-block, but to them which believe the power of God unto salvation," is in a fair way to become one of the fine arts. In the New Testament we read that God gave apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry—for the edifying of the body of Christ; but in the modern systems for building up the church, large dependence for success is placed upon the architect, the painter, the chure decorator, the tailor, and the music-teacher. Prayer-meetings are neglected; but religious shows attract a large congregation. The exhibition of Christmas trees, and evergreen and Easter flowers, and the charms of music draws the people.

But this substitution of religious display for righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, does not, naturally, lead men "churchward," and leave them quietly there. To such pilgrims the Protestant church is not a resting place for a long journey. He who gives up spiritual religion for one of tradition and forms cannot consistently stop this side of the Roman Catholic church. Of all the sects which seek the friendship of the world she is the mother. So we understand the Scriptures. (See James iv. 4. and Rev. xvi. 5.) If confidence is to be placed in forms imposing in their character and venerable from their antiquity, of all the churches in this country, the church of Rome must claim the pre-eminence. In church architecture she is acknowledged to take the lead. None of the church edifices of this age can bear any comparison to those which she erected in the midnight gloom of the dark ages. Her form, are, many of them, not only as old, but much older than Christianity itself. They date back to the period when paganism held imperial sway at Rome. Mosheim, the Church historian, says, "The rites and institutions by which the Greeks, Romans and other nations, had formerly testified their religion, veneration for fictitious deities were now adopted, with some slight alterations, by Christian bishops, and employed in the service of the true God. These fervent heralds of the Gospel, whose zeal outran their candor and integrity, imagined that the nations would receive Christianity with more facility, when they saw the rites and ceremonies to which they were accustomed, adopted in the church and the same worship paid to Christ and his martyrs which had been formerly offered to their idol deities. Hence it happened, that in these times, the religion of the Greeks and Romans differed very little in its external appearance from that of the Christians. They had both a most pompous and splendid ritual (Gorgeous robes, mitres, tiaras, wax-tapers, croters, illustrations, images, gold and silver vases, and many such circumstances of pagantry, are equally to be seen in the heathen temples and in the Christian churches. No sooner had Constantine abolished the superstitions of his ancestors, than magnificent churches were everywhere erected for the Christians, which were richly adorned with pictures and images, and bore a striking resemblance to the pagan temples, both in their outward and inward form."

Here we find the true origin of many of the forms that are again coming into fashion. They were idolatrous in their origin, and they are idolatrous in their tendency. But when un sanctified taste, instead of the Bible, made the criterion, these earth-born forms take the precedence of the simplicity of the Gospel. Paul told us it would be so. He said, The natural man receiveth not the things of God. Then these forms and shows that are adopted professedly to please natural men, cannot be the things of God. So the Bible firms. So says common sense. Can any one suppose that God is worshipped by the singing of holy songs by a half-dozen graceless men and women, while the congregation listens in silence? Is it to be presumed that Deity is pleased with wreaths and vestments and religious services that He has not ordained? The true worshippers worship God in spirit and in truth. The offering which they bring is a broken heart and a contrite spirit. Our only safety is to see that we ourselves are "led by the Spirit," and then we must do all that we can to spread spiritual religion in the world. Forms are but husks, upon which the soul starves. Give men of the bread of life and they are satisfied. A deep and genuine religious experience, a life hid with Christ in God brings peace and rest and security to the soul. For the want of this, many Protestants, persons of culture and refinement are seeking homes in the Roman Catholic Church. The Protestant churches must insist upon a deeper tone of spirituality or demonism and Romanism will cover the land. We do not wish to cast any reflection upon any body of Christians. If we ever mean to do so, it is not designably. Our only aim is to do all we can to secure a return to Gospel simplicity and purity wherever there has been a departure from them. O, Lord, revive thy work. Restore unto us the joy of thy salvation, and uphold us by thy free Spirit.—The Earnest Christian.

The maxim sometimes uttered by politicians, "Our country, right or wrong!" is so immoral, that the writer is pleased to meet with the following condemnation of it by C. I. Spurgeon: "Will there be a general desire to do that which is just and right between man and man? Will there be a declaration that England's policy is never to trample on the weak, or pick a quarrel for her own aggrandizement? Will there be a loathing of the principle that British interests are to be our guiding-star instead of justice and right? Personal interests are no excuse for doing wrong; if they were so we should have to exonerate the worst of thieves, for they will not invade a house until their personal interests invite them. Perhaps the midnight robber may yet learn to plead that he only committed a burglary for fear another thief should take the spoil, and make worse use of it than he. Does the footpad stop a passenger on the road for any other than his own interests? When our own interests are our policy, nobility is dead and true honor is departed."

Religious Items, &c.

Anti clerical Agitation in France.—The French politicians in their addresses to the people in different parts of the country, are following the same method of creating a popular sentiment in favor of their measures as has been practised in America. Recently Louis Blanc spoke to a large concourse of people at Marseilles, in favor of the bill which takes the public schools out of the hands of the clergy. In his speech he exposed in strong terms the arrogance and cruelty of the Papacy, and denounced the pilgrimages to Lourdes and the worship of the sacred heart, as appeals to ignorant credulity. He spoke of the dogmas of Papal Infallibility and the Immaculate Conception; of the Spanish Inquisition, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the blood shed by the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands, and of those put to death in England during the reign of Mary. He advocated the separation of Church and State, and putting the clergy under the government of the same laws as other citizens.

The Christian Reformed Church of Holland, which was founded in 1834 as a protest against the rationalism of the State Church, has 300 ministers and 350 congregations.

Methodist Extension.—The General Committee have authorized appropriations for erecting and repairing meeting-houses, in 1880, to the amount of $140,550. In addition to this, an effort is being made to build 400 places of worship in Colorado and other parts of the newly settled regions of the West, the money to be provided by special subscriptions.

The Priest under the Bin.—The building of the bridge across the Tiber at Rome, and its public opening without the presence of Pope, cardinal or priest, is a striking incident in the secularization of the old city. It is said that for a thousand years no new bridge has been built in Rome; but in the new order of things, which is bringing the modern spirit into that cloistered atmosphere, five new bridges are projected, and it is proposed to bring Rome into conformity with the new industrial life which is springing up in Italy. In the old time the Pontifex Maximus would, as the name implies, have been the very first figure in such a celebration. To-day he is not even invited to be present. And we trust the progress will continue until not one citizen of Rome can be found who will perform the office or assume the title of priest. It was this name, as expressive of order, function, claim, and office, which made the soul of Bishop Cummins shudder and shrink from all contact with it. Around this fundamental and essential principle that the minister of the Gospel is not a priest in any other sense than that in which every disciple of Christ is a priest, all his plans and projects for reform clustered and crystallized. He cast away every epithet, every symbol, every badge and garment which had been used or abused for the purpose of signifying the priesthood.—Epist. Recorder.

Tolerance in Russia.—A law has been promulgated in Russia, a supplement to the existing code, giving permission to Baptists to profess their religion unhindered, and to celebrate the worship of God in the houses which, with the approbation of the Governor, have been set apart for that purpose. Moreover, the marriage of Baptists is entered on the civil register, on the presentation by the married couple of the written or verbal statement of the officiating Baptist minister, when and where the marriage took place.

Conflict between Church and State Laws.—The rules of the Roman Catholic Church forbid the interment in burial grounds "consecrated" according to its ritual, of members of secret societies and of non-catholics. A case recently occurred, in which a person who had purchased a lot for burial in such a cemetery, and who wished the funeral services of the Protestant Episcopal Church and of the Masonic Society to be performed over his body, was refused interment. The matter was brought into court, and Judge Westbrook decided that the trustees of the ground could not legally so refuse unless the deed for the burying lot contained in its terms such restrictions, specifically stated, and a mandamus was issued compelling them to open the grave.

Joseph Parker, a Catholic, and a hackman at Holyoke, Mass., some four years ago attended a lecture by a man named Chinguy, who had been a Catholic priest, but had embraced Protestantism. For this offence he was excommunicated, and the priest on different occasions forbid any of his congregation from employing Parker in a business way, and on one occasion refused to officiate at a funeral because the company rode in carriages belonging to him. The result was a serious injury to his business, for which he claimed damages and brought a suit to recover them. The priest contended that what he had done had been simply in the lawful exercise of his ecclesiastical authority. In his charge to the jury before whom the case was tried, Judge Bacon said: "It is not lawful for a man to interfere with another's business by fraud, or by threats and intimidation against those who trade with him. Any person who is deprived of his livelihood by such threats has a remedy against the party who makes them. If you are keeping a store, and a man threatens your customers with injury of some kind, and so frightens them that they dare not trade with you, he lays himself liable to an action. There is no ecclesiastical authority to be recognized under our Government which allows a wanton and unreasonable interference with a man's private business, not connected with the Church from which he has been excommunicated. Our institutions and our law recognize no such power. The Church may excommunicate him, but they must not pursue him further and interfere with his private business." The jury gave the plaintiff a verdict for $3,433.

Unspeakably wise is the conduct of our Heavenly Father toward his children, though we may at times injudiciously repine when some of his choicest blessings are handed out, under the form of adversity.—S. Fothergill.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 13, 1879.

We have received the first number of a new periodical entitled "Western Friend" to be published monthly at Baxter Springs, Kansas, "by an Association of Friends." The motives for publication, and the objects aimed at, are thus described in the introductory editorial: "Those who have been isolated either by withdrawing from that with which it was not possible to work conscientiously, or as a suffering, hopeless minority in the meetings where divisions have not occurred, have long felt the need of a paper wherein their views could be expressed.

"It is the purpose of the Editors of the 'Western Friend,' to supply this need. We now have a press and material to publish such a paper, and enter upon the work with full confidence, that Friends will sustain our enterprise. We solicit subscriptions and correspondence, advice and counsel. We believe that the truth ought to be told with reference to the unsound teaching now current in Society, also in regard to practices, innovations, and departures which are being fostered in Society.

"The 'Western Friend' will be devoted to this work, to the maintenance of the ancient faith of Friends, and to giving full information of the condition of work and the needs of the small bodies of Friends, who have felt it right to withdraw from the confusion, dissension, and unsoundness in doctrine and practice of our once favored Society."

"Our feelings in looking over this sheet and reflecting on the fact that such a publication has been deemed expedient, have been of a mixed character. We write in the sentiment "that the truth ought to be told with reference to the unsound teaching now current in Society, also in regard to practices, innovations and departures which are being fostered;" and we can wish success to all honest efforts for "the maintenance of the ancient faith of Friends," but it is cause for mourning that any under our name can say that "it was not possible to work conscientiously" with, or should feel themselves "a suffering, hopeless" portion of the meetings to which they belong. We have heretofore repeatedly stated our conviction that the responsibility for such a disorganized condition of our religious Society rests primarily on those who have departed from those doctrines (and the practices resulting from them) which as Robert Barclay states, "are as it were the terms that have drawn us together, and the bond by which we become centered into one body."

We can truly sympathize with members of meetings, who are often subjected to the trial of listening to doctrines at variance with our fundamental principles; and whose seasons for public worship are disturbed by unsavory communications, the formal singing of hymns, and other hindrances to a drawing near in spirit to the common Father of all. We appreciate in measure the anxious thoughtfulness which must clothe the minds of parents who are so situated, and who dread the effect on their children of being brought up under influences which may either lead them away from the true principles of Friends, or develop a criticising spirit unfavorable to their religious growth, and tending to scatter them from our fold. The danger of this is shown by a letter recently received from a deeply concerned Friend in a distant meeting, where no separation has occurred, which speaks of the "devastation" among them caused by the introduction of new things, and says, instead of their "once large and solemn assemblies where 200 or more would be present," those who now convene "can be numbered by the dozen and half dozen." "When seated in meeting, I could but feel that our young people are being scattered abroad by what they see and hear in our meetings, and some will be gathered into other societies, and some run to ruin and infidelity."

"Yet we believe it is right for Friends to consider also the evils which almost inevitably flow from a disruption of religious organizations. These are so serious in their character that those who are looking towards such a remedy for their present sufferings, have need to move with great caution. If it is their right place to abide longer in the furnace, the Lord is able to preserve their spiritual life, and to make their testimony for the truth effective in promoting his cause in the meetings to which they belong. A faithful, honest and continued testimony, borne in a proper spirit, may be a means of settling in the right way the minds of some, who, through inexperience or lack of spiritual discernment, are in danger of being drawn into error. We must be especially on our guard, not to be influenced by any wounded self-love raised by slights received from others, nor by any heated or partizan feeling. Those actions and movements which purely flow from the fear of the Lord, and a sense of Divine requiring, and those only, will stand the test of time and the proving seasons which try every man's work of what sort it is. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his," and He knoweth also, what works those are that are performed in obedience to his commands.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Philadelphia mint is coining eagles and half eagles at the average rate of $200,000 daily. It is expected the total coinage of present month will reach $10,000,000. During last month three million one cent bronze pieces were coined; but the number fell short of the demand by ten to twelve thousand dollars worth. The mint is working on these coins, as far as its other business will permit, and it is expected in a short time the demand will be met.

The production of precious metals in the United States, during the year 1873, is said to be considerably less than the preceding year,—resulting principally from the diminished yield of the mines of the Comstock lode. The total production was $79,712,000, of which a little more than half was silver. Nearly all the gold and a large portion of the silver, was coined at United States mints, or used in the manufactures, arts, and ornaments of the country. The annual consumption of States of precious metals in all forms for manufacturing purposes, now averages $7,000,000 gold, and $5,000,000 silver.

From the annual report of the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, it appears that the exports from the United States to foreign countries, for the year ending on the 30th of June, amounted to $711,657,293, and the imports $445,777,775. The total trade is larger than during any year, except 1872—3 and 1873—4. About three-fourths of this trade was carried in foreign vessels. The wheat crop of the United States, for 1873, is placed at 425,000,000 bushels, leaving 17,500,000 bushels for export. The deficient wheat crop in Europe this year makes the demand there about 300,000,000 bushels, two-thirds of which will be required in France and the United Kingdom.

The testimony of the Iles before the Hatch commission at St. Louis closed on the 5th inst., and a demand was made for the surrender of the Indians recognized at the massacre at the agency, including chief Douglas.

A fire occurred at Troy, N. Y., on the morning of the 7th inst., which destroyed several factories and team-houses, and causing a loss of $350,000. Eighteen hundred persons are thrown out of employment by the fire.

Markets.—U. S. bonds, 6's, 1881, registered, 106 do. coupon, 106 1/2; 7's, 1881, 103 3/4; 1891, 105 1/2; 4's, 1007; 5's, 1007; 102's do. coupon, 103 1/2.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings at 13 1/2 a 13 1/4, per lb. Petroleum.—Crude, 81 cts. in barrels, and refined, 87 cts. for export, and 9 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—Minnesota extra at $6.40 to $6.75; Penna. C. do., $6.50 to $7; western do. do., $6.75 to $7.25; patent other high grades, $7.50 to $8.50. Rye flour, $5. to $5.50.

Grain.—The wheat market active, and prices a little higher; red, $1.50; amber, $1.51. Corn, 60 to 62 c per bushel. Oats, mixed, 45 to 46 1/2 cts.; white, 48 1/2 cts.

Hay and straw.—Prime timothy, 90 cts. a cwt; 1st 100 pounds; mixed, 80 to 90 cts. Straw, $1.10 to $1.25 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—The market during the week was dull and prices declined 1/4 c per pound; 3,250 head arrived and sold at 25 to 24 1/2 cts. condition. Sheep, 44 to 45 cts. to quality. Hogs, 6 1/2 to 7 cts. per lb. From the Philadelphia Stock-yards and Abattoir, 30th S. above Market, there have been slaughtered and exported to England, during the present year, 12,710 cattle, 5738 hogs, and 4199 sheep.

The no. do. does not make fortunes there in order to found families, and the consequence is, that possessors of large fortunes more often devote them to the public welfare. The mass of the people are more sober, and therefore, able to work more continuously, if not hard, than our own people."

The Observatory on Mount Etna almost completed, but the large quantity of snow which has already fallen, will prevent the iron cupola and telescope from being fixed till next summer. The total cost will be about $12,500. It is about 9000 feet above the level of the sea.

A line of railroad up the slopes of Mount Vesuvius from the level of the Neapolitan Bay, to the very edge of the crater, has been completed. The track is laid upon a solid pavement of masonry, believed to be perfectly secure from the overflows, on either side, of lava.

The New Berlin correspondent estimates that there are 100,000 persons suffering from famine in Upper Silesia. They are mostly Poles. The Government working energetically for their relief.

It is stated that the ex-Empress Eugenie will proceed direct from Spain to Zuluand.

A dispatch from Pesth reports that the Koros river has risen rapidly in consequence of severe snow storms and has inundated the city of Gosswarden, Hungary. Thousands of the inhabitants are fugitives in need of shelter. The neighboring villages are threatened with destruction.

From Cairo, information is received that war is expected between Egypt and Abyssinia.

The obelisk for New York, has been successfully lowered to a horizontal position, and preparations for its removal to the vessel are proceeding.

For "The Friend."

Outwardness in Religion—The Kingdom Within.

The Society of Friends was planted a noble vine; and designed by its adorable Head, to represent and uphold doctrines and testimonies more real, more industrial, more self-denying, and, withal, more spiritual and living, than professors of that day generally held. Its members were gathered from the various societies then existing, to maintain a standard of orthodox less outward, formal and lifeless, and more inward, experimental and vital; even obedience to the light of Christ in man, as our promised Comforter and guide unto all truth. Thus the light within, the life within, the kingdom within, and "Christ within the hope of glory," was fundamental doctrine with them, and formed much of their teaching and ministry. Not that they in any wise by this more full recognition of the dear Saviour by his living presence in the heart, intended to, or did reject, overlook, or ignore his no less indispensable outward manifestation, that He might destroy the works of the devil, and reconcile us to his Father. But this latter doctrine being more fully received and believed by other professors, Friends consequently dwell more upon, and pointed to that which, while alike essential, had been too much lost sight of, unequally upheld, or had not given to it its deserved place and prominence. For both being absolutely requisite to salvation, it is good to remember the injunction:—"What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder."

Seeing, then, that the ministrations and labors of the early Friends—while alike accepting the dear Son and Sent of God in his first and second Advent—were designed to draw the attention of the people more to Christ in his second coming as an inward and spiritual Teacher in their own hearts; to a warfare within; to a religion based not only on a belief in his outward coming as a propitiation for our sins, but no less upon that which He came to introduce through his anointing power and saving grace in the heart. And seeing too the stir, as in the camp of Dan, even by the Spirit of the Lord, this had upon multitudes in that day, bringing them not only into "the valley of decision," but into the obedience which is of faith in Christ, how careful should we be not to depart from the ancient paths so well proven; neither settle as on the lees, in a form of godliness without the life and power. Not to be believers only, nor tremblers only, as the devils formerly were represented to have been, without witnessing "sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth." In a word, not to merit the language uttered concerning Jerusalem of old: "I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed; how then hath thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?" "The Lord hath rejected thy confidences, and thou shalt not prosper in them."

Is it not plain that a change has come over us? That a flood-tide of outwardness, of conformity, of world-mindedness, has so set in that we are in imminent danger of losing our distinguishing characteristics, our vantage ground, our spirituality? Is there not cause for grave apprehension lest we be unconsciously beguiled? Lest almost insensibly a linsy-woolsey garment be thrown over us? Lest a modern and modified Quakerism take the place of the old, the good, and the true? Have not some of us in fact taken more steps in worldly compliance or toward the "beggarly elements"—from which our forefathers came so nobly out—than remain to be taken, to place or leave us about where our Society commenced? Have we not, on the all-glorious ground of spiritual renovation and reform, sacrificed much that is vital? and have superinduced innovations, customs, creeds and traditions which cannot stand; but will, like the image of iron and clay, though "its brightness was excellent," be broken to pieces by "the stone cut out without hands;" or like, as "the stone cut out without hands" (Matt. ix. 16), in the parable of the Saviour, "which is put in to fill it up *take*th from the garment, and the rest is made worse."

It is not worth while for us to conclude that the Quakerism of the early day can be other than that of the present. That "Religion has softened her features." That the path to the kingdom is more smooth and easy, and less hard to flesh and blood than used to be the case. Or that the way, declared by the Redeemer, to be straight and narrow, has now expanded into space. "There is no other way," writes Francis Howgill, "that shall prosper than that which the holy men of old walked in."

Nothing can be more certain than that our falling in with the apparent pious activity of more demonstrative sects, if it involves a compromise of the principles and testimonies committed to us, and thence leads to an aping of their forms and usages, will greatly balk the testimony of Truth in the minds of the lovers of consistency and good order; show that the faith of such members, instead of overcoming the world, is, on the contrary, being overcome by the world; and will invoke the reproving language of our blessed Lord to Peter upon the latter's querying relative to another's duty, "What is that to thee? Follow thou me."

True faith is a living, operative fruit of the Spirit, which works by love to the purifying of the heart, and which is "able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked." But a kind that is prevalent in these days, and which claims "If I believe, I shall be saved," professes to depend upon what Christ has done for us, without us, and which we plainly see all around us succumbing to the spirit of the world; having fallen back into the ways, the worship, the ceremonies and fashions of the world.

This is nothing less than conformity to that which our Society was brought out from, and is alien to us; a compromise of principle; a return to the flesh-pots and bondage of Egypt; a removing of the ancient landmarks which our fathers have set; a lowering the standard entrusted to us; a putting our light under the bushel or bed, instead of upon the candlestick that all may see it and be helped to turn to the Lord; a showing that the love of other things has captivated and weakened us; a proof that we have become marred on the wheel; and that instead of plants of the Lord's right hand planting, as in the early day, we have too much forgotten "the kindness of our youth, the love of our espousals," and "have changed our glory for that which doth not profit." THE UNWARRANTING THIS SENTENCE PICTURE, we believe that there are left more than the "seven thousand," who have not bowed to this compromising reflex course, from a more perfect to a less perfect state; a course reminding of

"The hollow roar

Of tiles receding from the insulted shore."

The spirits of these, on the contrary, are often prostrated before the Omniscent Holy One, pleading that He would pity his heritage and spare his people; that He would turn his hand again upon us for good; that He would purely purge away our dross and tin and reprobate silver; and, in undeserved loving-kindness and tender mercy, again build up the waste places; again magnify his inspeaking word of saving grace; again restore judges as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning. May He, in his own time, hasten what the longing eye so desires to behold. Secures,

"Which who can see,

Though but in distant prospect, and not feel

His soul refreshed with forestage of the joy?"

This good time has again and again been prophesied of, as in the more or less remote future. A great cloud of witnesses confirmatory of such a testimony could be adduced, if time and limit would admit of their insertion. One must suffice. Joseph Whittall, of Woodbury, N. J., as is recorded of his last public testimony at his own meeting, upon appearing to take a final farewell thereof, remarked, "Although our Society seemed, as it were, stripped and peeled, yet he was firm in the persuasion that a brighter day was advancing; and believed there were those now born who would live to see it." In view of this we are assured that there never was a time when Christendom stood more in need of just such practical, heart-stirring doctrines as our early Friends were the zealous exponents of:—the universal and saving light of Christ; his second and inward coming, as the promised "Another Comforter," or Spirit of Truth, who was to guide into all truth, and to abide with us forever. This distinctive, scripturally-based root of the Quaker faith, or, as William Penn calls it, "the corner-stone of their fabric, their characteristic, or main distinguishing point or principle," is that which men seem now to stand so much in need of. A remedy within them—a healing and balm where the disease is—an unction from the Holy One, by and through which we are to know all things—the anointing which abideth in us and teareth as never man taught—the grace of God that bringeth salvation—the engrained word which is able to save the soul—the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which setteth free from the law of sin and death—the Day-spring from on high which, through the tender mercy of our God, visits us to give light to our dark hearts, and without which illumination all must be night there. We repeat, that such a Saviour—Christ within, the hope of glory—is that to which Christendom so much needs to be directed, for comfort, for establishment, for settlement in the Truth as it is in Jesus. It was this, again writes Wm. Penn, that the ministry of the Friends of his day directed people to, even "the light of Jesus Christ within them, as the Seed and Leaven of the kingdom of God; near all, because in all, and God's talent to all. A faithful and true witness," he continues, "and just monitor in every bosom."

...Obt. that we, as a Society, may never turn our backs to the light of the Truth, but be duly anointed for it, promoting and proclaiming this gospel of the grace of God. May we never attempt to mix up the mystery with the history—the well spring of the water of life, with any school-taught knowledge of the letter that describes it. May we never flinch from "the offence of the cross," when obedience calls to boldly testifying to the inward coming, government, and kingdom of Christ Jesus as that which is to be set up within man; where, "not with observation" or outward show, but in living power, his kingdom must come and will be done.

British Guiana.

The interior country is thinly inhabited by tribes of Indians who principally reside along the water-courses. Near the coast there are more European settlements.

The Indians obtain their living by hunting and fishing, and the cultivation of a few varieties of vegetables. The Cassava plant is one of the most important of these. C. B. Brown thus describes the manner of preparing food from it.

"On supply of farinaceous food had by the time we reached the mouth of the Appa river decreased considerably in quantity, and it became necessary to purchase all we could get, in the shape of cassava bread, from the Indians living in the neighborhood. Therefore, when we arrived at a landing place a little beyond the Maripa river, we proceeded to the village to induce the people to prepare some for us. On arriving at the place we found only two temporary huts, situated in an old plantation, partially overgrown with shrubs, vines, and weeds, and occupied by one man, four women, and five children. This man had come from his place higher up river to gather the remaining cassava roots (Jatropha Manihot) in this old plantation. His wife spoke English, having been brought up at Bartika Grove, and wore clothing in the shape of a loose cotton gown. She said that her husband's name was Edward and her's Caroline. One pleasing feature in the British Guiana Indians is that, as a rule, they treat their women well, evidently looking upon them as equals, and not making slaves of them as is the custom of many other wild tribes. These people promised to make us some cassava bread, for which we had to remain a day, the process of manufacture of that article being a rather slow one. The Indians take the roots of the cassava, peel them, and then grate them on boards called Tamaries, into which small sharp angular pieces of felstone have been inserted. After this, they place the grated mass in a long thin cylindrical basket-work tube, called Tenge or Matapi, by which all the poisonous juice of the cassava is got rid of, leaving a white coarse meal behind. This meal is sifted through a basket-work sieve, then spread upon a large flat stone or iron pan placed over a fire, and baked. Only half an ounce is taken to bake an eke two feet in diameter and a quarter of an inch thick—the usual size of cassava bread of Indian manufacture. The heat has the power of making each grain adhere to those around it, thus forming a firm and exceedingly nutritious cake. Eaten just after it is cooked—when still warm—it is palatable, but, if kept till the following day, it becomes tough and hard. If, however, it is exposed to the sun for a few hours in the sun upon the same day that it is cooked, it becomes hard and crisp, has a sweet nutty flavor, and will keep for months."

"The bark canoes used by Indians are called 'woodskins' by the Creoles, and are made of one piece of bark, stripped from a tree called the purple-heart, (Copaifera pubiflora). The bark of the least tree or similar (Hyemeuxa corbairi) is also sometimes used. This bark is from one-eighth to one fourth of an inch in thickness, and very heavy, being of greater specific gravity than water; so that in the event of the canoes shipping water to any extent, it sinks immediately, leaving its occupants to find their way ashore.

They are ticklish things to travel in at first, and to stand up in one, until acquainted with its freaks, is a dangerous experiment, ending in an undignified exit over one side, the canoe shooting away in the opposite direction.

To make one of these woodskins, a large purple-heart tree is cut down, and the bark of the requisite length taken off. A wedge-shaped piece is then cut out of the trough-shaped bark, from the top downwards, at a distance of three feet or so from both ends on each side. The ends are then raised till the edges of the cuts meet, when the holes are pierced on either hand, at a distance of six inches from the cut, and numbers of turns of a strong wire or liana, called Mamurie, passed through them and made fast in a neat manner to a small round stick placed along the inside. Two strong pieces of wood fastened across at the splits prevent the sides from closing in. The ends are then trimmed down level with the sides, and a ticklish but serviceable little craft is turned out. The seats are made of curved pieces of the same bark, and are very low. The whole process of making one of these woodskins, including the drying of the bark, occupies a space of three weeks. In this period must I think, be included some loss of time from laziness on the part of the Indian canoe builder. Woodskins vary in size, but usually are from fifteen to twenty-five feet in length, and an ordinary sized one will carry three or four people with their hammocks and provisions."

The fish, which form an important part of the diet of the Indians, are often procured by shooting with a bow and arrows; and sometimes by the use of poison. This process is thus described:

"I set out at an early hour one morning, in a woodskin, for a place where the Indians were going to poison a pool so as to obtain its fish. After about two hours' hard paddling we arrived at a large estuary, and, taking our canoe into smooth water above, found the Indians, eleven in number, busily engaged in beating bundles of a soft yellow root with sticks. These Haiarie roots were each about two inches in diameter, and of a light yellow color, containing a yellow creamy juice, having a disagreeable, raw smell. Each bundle was about a foot in diameter and two feet in length. When thoroughly pounded into pulp they were thrown into canoes, in which a little water had been previously placed, and then the juice was wrung from them. The enclosure to be acted upon was of an irregular shape, occupying about two acres of river, and formed by dams of rock, built into the spaces between rocky areas and small islands. In building this the Indians had left two large gaps, the purpose one being where the greatest body of water ran in and the other where it flowed out. When we arrived they had closed these gaps with a wattle arrangement, so that all chance of escape for the fish was cut off.

Three canoes, containing the juice of six bundles of Haiarie, were then taken to the upper end of the enclosure, and the subtle poison discharged from them. It was borne down by the slight current, and mingled rapidly with the pure dark water. Most of the Indians then got into their canoes and pushed out, bow and arrows in hand, into the middle of the enclosure, while the remainder, with my men, also furnished with the same weapons, stood upon the rocks at the edge. In ten minutes time numbers of small fish came to the surface, and swam uselessly about, trying to rise above water; these soon were floating about quite dead. After an interval of five minutes more, a single paen showed its back fin, and also tried to raise its head above water. An instant more, and the whole place seemed alive with large fish, Paen and Carabae, all struggling and flapping at the surface or whirling round and round. Many tried to force themselves out of the water up the sloping surface of the rocks, and two were successful in this, dying on the strand. From the excited manner in which they struggled, it seemed to me as if the poison had an intoxicating effect upon them. It might have been that the contact of the poison with their gills had produced a feeling of suffocation—hence their endeavors to escape from their native element.

It was a most exciting scene for a time, as the Indians shot arrow after arrow into the bewildered dying fish, and banded them ashore or into the canoes. In about an hour the murderous work was over, and 150 fine Paen and Cartabac were lying dead upon the rocks around the pool, the victims of Indian prowess and poison. During the whole preceding I stood on the rocks at the upper end of the pool and had a fine view of the scene, the finest part of which was to see the naked savage, in all his glory, drawing his bow with strength and ease and letting fly his arrows with unerring aim.

How curious it is that this poison, which kills the fish, should not have a deleterious effect upon its flesh. That it has not, is proved by the fact that fish procured by its aid are as good and wholesome food as when merely shot with the arrow or caught with hook and line. The process of cooking probably drives out or destroys the bad properties of the poison, as it does with the yam, which is said to be injurious if eaten uncooked. Boiling down the poisonous cassava juice likewise renders it innocuous. It may be, however, that this poison acts in some peculiar way without entering the tissues of the flesh."

Gospel Ministry.

A living gospel ministry is a great blessing to the church, and a chosen channel through which comfort is often administered to weary souls, by the accompanying of the Divine life, which is the source from which all gospel ministry springs. Somewhere in Pennsylvania a minister once lived that believed it right for him to pay a religious visit; but the monthly meeting could not see it right to liberate him for that purpose. He was very much discouraged and mounted horse to go home. As he rode along he crossed a brook, and it came into his mind that he could build across the water, and stop it all; but after while the dam would get full and the water would again run down the stream, and he rode home comforted. After a time he again believed it right to pay the visit. The church was now prepared to liberate him in the true unity which stands on the sure foundation; and he had learned the lesson that the prophet was subject to the spirit of the prophets. The Lord careth for all his children that look to Him in full faith, trusting and confiding in his power and direction, in that faith which He gives as an anchor sure and steadfast. May all who are thus exercised, abide in the patience, enduring close provings and fiery trials which the Lord may see meet to bring on them for their refinement and further qualification to stand before Him with words He may give for the people. As Job Scott says: "Minding the stepping stones as they are cast up in the way and in the life at the time." Here is the only safe abiding place for any minister. None are greater than our great High Priest who said, "My Father gave me a commandment which I should say. As I hear, so I speak."

As there is an abiding in the gift, none need study the matter beforehand what they will say. We are sometimes sweetly exercised in silent meditation before the Most High, and feel a command to stand up and say something to the people, and think that this sweet exercise which has been right in its place, in silence, may be the theme; but as we proceed, other words will be brought from the Divine treasury of wisdom, power, strength and might, sometimes not knowing what word will be next, standing in simple faith and firm reliance on the bare arm of the Most High. "Who putteth forth his own and goeth before them." We may rely on the Lord, who will support and bring one word after another to the relief of overexercised minds, and comfort of the hearers. Truly who is sufficient for these things, when a mighty angel had to fly through heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach.

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth. (Continued from page 138.)

7th mo. 31st, 1863. We have been favored to collect our hay and wheat harvest without much injury to either, although the weather has been changeable. The wheat good.

On the 22d, our Meeting for Sufferings met on the subject of the draft. A comfortable and interesting meeting, in which our young men were much felt for.

29th. Attended Calm Meeting with Samuel Cope, to talk with some of the members in relation to the draft—feeling interested for our young members who are liable to it, and that our Christian testimony against war may be supported.

On the 6th of 9th month, Isaac Phillips and I went to Robeson on account of J. S., Jr. having been drafted; staid at E. S.'s over night; had in the evening the company of E. S., his wife and their four children. The opportunity was a pretty comfortable one, feeling for the parents and children on account of the draft.

6th.—First of the week.—We attended Robson Meeting; to me it was a comfortable meeting; it was much favored generally there. After meeting had another opportunity with J. and J. S., Jr., on the subject of our testimony against war. Called at J. S., Sen., got dinner and returned home feeling satisfied that we went.

20th.—First day.—Was much favored at seasons to feel my mind clothed with a qualification to perform the service for which we meet together, and felt, I trust, concerned for the welfare of others; may I be more watchful.

10th mo. 13th. Left home to go to Tunesassa; got to Harrisburg about 4 o'clock in the afternoon; put up at the U. S. Hotel; walked out to the Public Building, had a fine view from the top of it (the Capitol) of the town and country around. (Left) at 3 o'clock next morning; got to Williamsport to breakfast; Elmira about 12, (where) the trains not connecting on the N. Y. and Dunkirk road, so that we could get to Tunesassa that night, and not wishing to stay at a tavern in the reservation, we left about 4 in the morning. Before leaving home and since starting, have been favored to feel love to and trust in Providence. Met at Hornersville with Andrew John, from Cattaraugus reservation; had considerable conversation with him on the subject of renting land on the reservation to white men. He said some of the white tenants at Salamanca had sold liquor to the Indians, and that the Indian women had requested the officers of the nation assembled in council, to put a stop to the sale of intoxicating drink on the reservation. The council concluded to inform the whites that if they sold intoxicating drinks, they would forfeit their leases in ten days. Andrew John informed the whites of the conclusion of the council, and it was stopped. The whites at Salamanca petitioned the Legislature of the State of New York to extend their leases to twenty years, instead of eight or ten; or perhaps liberty to lease lands from the Indians for twenty years. Having passed one of the Houses (of the Legislature) it was stopped. It appears that the Indians have been holding a court preparatory to petitioning Congress to do away with the present form of government, and re-establish the old form of governing by chiefs. Arrived at Tunesassa about dusk, somewhat fatigued.

19th. Went to the barn and gave Abner our views in relation to business on the farm yesterday. Last night and this morning was much favored to trust in the Great Head of the Church that He would help me this day.

Went up to the council-house to meet the Indians; after waiting awhile a good many collected. Peter Crouse was interpreter. I think I was much favored to feel for them, and raised above the force of man in expressing my feelings, and was truly comforted, hoping I had, in unmerited mercy, been enabled to discharge my duty; they felt like brethren and sisters to me; the praise be to Him the Great Head of the Church, who is worthy. Wm. Patterson spoke in council, he (expressed) satisfaction with what had been said to them, and thanks for the labor Friends had bestowed in teaching the Indians and encouraging them in such things as would promote their happiness. Owen Blacksnake spoke—I think expressed his satisfaction with what had been said to them, and on behalf of the women, he said they wished some assistance in putting a stop to the sale of intoxicating drink to the Indians by white men living on the reservation. They would give to assist in enforcing the law against those persons.

20th. Attended a meeting at Jimmerson-town; there were a number of Indian collected; they expressed their satisfaction in seeing us; and the kindness of Friends in supplying them with seed. James John spoke of the whites coming in and settling on Indian lands, and that a majority of the Indians were opposed to it. On my way home from this council, through Cold Spring, I saw two men stripped to fight, and heard them using very profane language, I was truly distressed with seeing (such) a sight; when I came up they quieted off—one was an Indian—both somewhat intoxicated. I took an opportunity with the Indian and three other young Indian men; spoke to them of the danger of using intoxicating drink.

21st.—Fifth of the week.—Sat a very comfortable meeting with Abner Woolman and the rest of the family at Tunesassa, worthy to be remembered to the praise of the great and holy Head, who can make the barren wilderness become a fruitful field. After dinner A. W., R. B. B. and myself went over the river to Old Town. I stopped with the Indians at that place, who met us in their school-house. A. W. and R. B. B. went on to Corydon to see a white man who had been charged with selling and trading intoxicating drink to the Indians; they saw him and labored with him. I feel a hope we were all in our proper places. I have been favored with very comfortable seasons while on my bed, to my encouragement and strength."

Our dear friend arrived safely at home on the evening of the 23d, when he makes the following acknowledgment: "I have much reason to be thankful for the unmerited favors bestowed upon me, a poor unworthy creature."

For "The Friend."

Teachings of the Spirit.

Jesus Christ, the great minister of ministers, came personally among men, preaching the everlasting gospel in the name of his Father, and the men of the world received him not; but he said to them, "If another should come in his own name, him ye will receive." How is it now, in this our day of boasted enlightenment? If one should come amongst us in the name of the Father, have we not, many of us, become so assimilated with the world, that we hardly receive him? But if another shall come in his own name, preaching in the enticing words of his own intellectual wisdom, do we not receive him? Jesus said to his disciples: "If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." This hatred of the world is so repugnant to our natural feelings, that we have a strong propensity to conform to that very friendship of the world which is said to be enmity against God; and like the carnal mind, is not subject to his law. The men of the world, by all their keen-eyed wisdom, know not God, nor the things of God, nor the doctrines of God; neither can they know them, because they are spiritually discerned; and because they are hid from the wise and prudent of this world and revealed only to the little ones in Christ.

But there is a path which leads from earth to heaven, "that no lowly knower, and which the culture's eye hath not seen; and the lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it;" but the redeemed of the Lord walk safely there, and return through this highway to holiness, from the corruptions of the fall, to Zion, the city of our solemnities, being crowned with songs of everlasting joy. But let us remember that the unclean shall not pass over it; and that no lion shall there be, nor any of the vicious or beastly nature be found there; all having been cleansed and overcome by and through our following the teachings and leadings of the redeeming power of Him who "is come in the flesh," to make an end of sin, and to bring in everlasting righteousness to every humble, obedient, seeking soul.

But in order to this, and to our becoming wise in heavenly things, we must have faith in the heavenly teacher, and have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto us and unto the churches. He that is thus taught, and walks in obedience to it, will find his light to break forth as the morning, and his spiritual health to spring forth speedily, his peace to flow as a river, and his righteousness as the waves of the sea. But if our faith stands more in the wisdom and eloquence and teachings of men, than in the power of God; if we lean to our own understanding; if we forsake the teachings of the Spirit and turn to the letter, preferring it, and seek to be "made perfect by the flesh," God will leave us to our choice, but send leanness into the soul.

It is only those who are led by the Spirit of God, that are the sons of God. And that more we are led and taught by his Spirit, the more life and immortality will be brought to light in us by the gospel. If we have not the Spirit of Christ we are none of his, let our name to religion be ever so high. A mere historical faith or head religion will never cleanse us nor save us. We must be born again. And if we, through the assisting grace of God, follow the teachings of his Spirit in all things, and walk in the light as life is in the light, it is then that we shall have fellowship one with another, and witness the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin.

A VISIT TO COWPER'S GRAVE.

William Cowper, the author of so many of our best sacred hymns, died at Dereham, England, in 1800. The unknown writer of the hymn below weaves into his (or her) verse strands from several of Cowper's familiar hymns. It was written after a visit to the poet's grave.

I went alone, 'Twas summer time;
And standing there before the shrine
Of that illustrious bard,
I read his own familiar name,
And thought of his extensive fame,
And felt devotion's sacred flame,
Which we do well to guard.

"Far from the world, O Lord, I flee."
How sweet those words appeared to me,
Like voices in a dream!
"The calm retreat, the silent shade,"
Describe the spot where he was laid
And where surviving friendships paid
Their tribute of esteem.

"There is a fountain," As I stood
I thought I saw the crimson "blood,"
And some "beneath the wave"

I thought the stream still rolled along,
And that I heard the "nobler song"
Of Jesus "power to save."

"When darkness long has veiled my mind,"
And from these words I feel inspired,
In spirit ready to wait

But "snoiling day" has dawned at last,
And all his sorrows now are past;
No tempoer now, no midnight blast,
To spoil the poet's sleep.

"Oh for a closer"—even so,
For we who journey here below
Have lived too far from God.

Oh, that I had his life I could
Which Ebene, Noah, Cowper, led!
Oh, for that "pure light" to shed
Its brightness on "the road."

"God moves in a mysterious way,"
But now, the poet seemed to say,
"No mysteries remain.

On earth I was a sufferer,
In heaven I am a conqueror;
God is his own interpreter,
And he has made it plain."

HIDDEN LIFE.

Buried in darkness, and hard, and dry,
Silently by the golden grain,
From clouds low-hung in the arching sky,
Gently dropped the mellowing rain;
And it felt around for the hidden seed,
As the loving word and merciful deed
Tenderly come to the heart of pain,
The fevered pulse and the throbbing brain.

The generous sun from his far-off throne,
Kindly smiled on the lowly bed;
And a feeble life crept out of the dust,
And a green spire timidly raised its head.
The cheerful light and the balmy air,
Waxed it, and kissed it; and wondrous fair
It grew till the seed that seemed so dead
Gave to the world a harvest of bread.

The earth holds many a hidden life.

That needs the sympathy love can give,
To bring it out from its solitude.

And warm and strengthen and help it live.
But often, it may be, a thoughtless deed,
Falls like a shadow upon the mold
Where lies the precious and buried seed,
And it slowly dies in the dark and cold.

Alas! if our life has come between
The cheering light of a Father's love,
And the seed that should make the golden sheaves
For the angel-reaper to bear above.

A cruel word or a selfish deed
May kill the life of the rarest seed,
And the earth will mourn and heaven complain
For a harvest lost from the wasted grain.
Indianapolis. F. A. P.

Mohammed once said: "When a man dies, men inquire what he has left behind him; angels inquire what he has sent before him."

When quiet in a darkened room,
A form lies cold and chill,
To whom the solemn voice of death
Has whispered, "Peace be still!"
They who survive will linger near,
And ask with anxious mind,
How much of gold the dead man had,
What has he left behind?

The angel who with glistening wings
Is hovering round the bed,
Still bending with inquiring look
Above the silent dead,
Demands, "what was the life he led?"
And scans the records of
"What treasure has he now in heaven,
What good deeds sent before?"

Incidents and Reflections.

TEMPERANCE.

The Apostle Paul in one of his epistles, uses this suggestive language: "I keep my body under and bring it into subjection, lest by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should become a cast-away." Of the need of such watchful care, and the sad consequences which flow from its neglect, we have thousands of mournful proofs, in the multitudes around us who are ruined by indulgence in the use of spirits. We believe there are few, if any, of these victims of a depraved appetite, but have heard the warning voice in their souls, which would have saved them, if it had been heeded. We believe also, that there are few, if any, true Christians, but have known the cross to be laid on their appetites, and have felt that it was necessary for them to follow the example of the apostle, and bring the body "into subjection;" and this not only with reference to the use of spirituous liquors, but in all things.

William Bray thus relates his own experience as to the use of tobacco:

"I had been a smoker as well as a drunkard, and I used to love my tobacco as much as I loved my meat, and I would rather go down into the mine without my dinner than without my pipe. In the days of old the Lord spoke by the mouth of his servants the prophets; now He speaks to us by the Spirit of his Son. I had not only the feeling part of religion, but I could hear the small still voice within speaking to me. When I took the pipe to smoke, it would be applied within, 'It is an idol, I lust, worship the Lord with clean lips.' So I felt, it was not right to smoke. The Lord also sent a woman to convince me. I was one day in a house, and I took out my pipe to light it at the fire, and Mary Hawke—for that was the woman's name—said, 'Do

"on not feel it is wrong to smoke?" I said I felt something inside telling me it is an idol, lust; and she said that was the Lord. Then said, "Now I must give it up, for the Lord is telling me of it inside, and the woman outside; so the tobacco must go, love it as I may." There and then I took the tobacco out of my pocket, and threw it into the fire, and put the pipe under my foot, 'ashes to ashes, dust to dust.' And I have not smoked since. I found it hard to break off old habits; but I cried to the Lord for help, and He gave me strength, for He has said, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee." The day after I gave up smoking I had the coughache so bad I did not know what to do, though this was owing to giving up the pipe, but I would never smoke again if I lost every tooth in my head. I said, "Lord, thou hast told us, 'My yoke is easy, and my burden is light,' and when I said that all the saints left me." Sometimes the thought of the pipe would come back to me very strong; but the Lord strengthened me against the habit; and, bless his name, I have not smoked since."

More than twenty years ago he had abandoned smoking, he said, "God has just given me enough money to pay my way through life, and nothing for the pipe. If I had spent only sixpence a week on the pipe I should have been about thirty pounds in debt."

William Bray was sometimes very plain and pointed in his reproofs of those whom he thought were in the wrong; yet it was not he who made the remark which is said to have led a deacon in one of the New England States to give up the habit of using tobacco. In a conversation on religious subjects, the deacon said "I don't think I am sanctified."

"No," replied the brother, with a little respect and deliberation, "I should not think you were; you don't smell like a sanctified man."

The conversation ended; he went home and thought; for the first time the idea dawned on him that there was any difference between the smell of a sanctified man, and an old tobacco user. He could not readily dismiss the matter from his mind. The words stuck to him, until at length he renounced the weed, and it is to be hoped smells like a sanctified man.

There are many statistics showing the enormous amount of money expended in the purchase of stimulants, and its impoverishing tendency. As an illustration of this Neal Dow, of Maine, quotes from a temperance address delivered in Oxford County of that State by a man from the town of Raymond,—"At the time of the course of which he said: "At the time when we were holding public meetings all over the State, to call the attention of the people to the relation of the liquor traffic to the general good, we had weekly meetings for that purpose in Raymond, my town. At one of these meetings I said that the people of the town consumed in strong drink the entire valuation of the town—all its real and personal property—in every period of twenty years. The audience fairly hooted at me as a moon struck temperance man, and there was a great deal of merriment at my expense. When the fun and noise had subsided, I said: 'Well, I have not calculated the cost carefully. I have given you my opinion, but I am in a position that will enable me to ascertain very nearly what the actual facts are, and at the next meeting I will be prepared to state them accurately.'"

A canal ran from tidewater at Portland to Sebago Lake, at Raymond, and so on to a long series of lakes, and this man had the supervision of the business of the canal at the Raymond end of it. All supplies for that town, as well as for all others on those interior waters, passed through this canal, and under the eye of this superintendent.

At the next meeting of the Raymond people he recurred to the subject, and said: "I have carefully examined the facts as to the quantity of liquors coming into this town for the use of the people, and I have the figures upon the paper which I hold in my hand. No doubt some liquor find their way here through channels of which I know nothing, but as to the figures upon this paper, and they are no mistake; I am quite sure of them, and here is what the entire valuation of this town is consumed by the people, in strong drinks, in every period of eighteen years, eight months and twenty-five days."—Neal Dow.

Among the many incidents connected with this subject that float along the tide of public prints, there are two simple ones that are interesting and touching; showing how Divine Grace sometimes uses the power of natural affection to restrain the drunkard and awaken him to a sense of his responsibilities.

A man named Hall was once lecturing on temperance, and among other things, said, all have influence, even that child; pointing to a little girl in the arms of her father.

"It is true, sir," said the man aloud. After the lecture the man said, "I was once a drunkard, and sometimes carried my child with me to the shops for rum. Once as I was entering the door, she said, 'Father, don't go.' and I replied, 'Hold your tongue, she repeated, 'father, don't go,' and then I felt a tear drop on my cheek. I turned and went home, and I have never drunk since. I am a sober man now. It is true, sir; she has influence."

A young man, who had been reclaimed from the vice of intemperance, was called upon to tell how he was led to give up drinking. He arose, and looked for a moment very confused. All he could say was, "The little shoes, they did it!" With a thick voice, as if his heart was in his throat, he kept repeating this. There was a stare of perplexity on every face, and at length some thoughtless young people began to titter. The man, in all his embarrassment heard this sound, and rallied at once. The light came into his eyes with a flash—he drew himself up and addressed the audience; the choking went from his throat. "Yes, friends," he said, in a clear voice, "whatever you may think of it, I've told you the truth—the little shoes did it! I was a brute and a fool; strong drink had made me both, and starved me into the bargain. I suffered; I deserved to suffer; but I didn't suffer alone—no man does who has a wife and child, for the woman gets the worst abuse. But I am no speaker to enlarge on that; I'll stick to the little shoes. It was one night, when I was all but done for, the saloon keeper's child holding out her feet for her father to look at her fine new shoes. It was a simple thing; but, friends, no fist ever struck me such a blow as those little shoes. They kicked reason into me. What business have I to clothe others with fineries, and provide not even coarse clothing for my own, but let them go bare? said I; and there outside was my shivering wife and blue-chilled child, on a bitter cold night. I took hold of the little one with a grip and saw her chilled feet. Men, farmers! if the little shoes smote me, what must little feet do? I put them, cold as ice, to my breast; they pierced me through. Yes, the little feet walked right into my heart and away walked my selfishness. I had a trifle of my money left; I bought a loaf of bread and then a pair of little shoes. I never tasted anything but a bit of that bread all the Sabbath-day, and went to work like mad on Monday, and from that day I have spent no more money at the public house. That's all I've got to say—It was the little shoes that did it."

On the Observance of Christmas.

My mind hath at different times been drawn into sympathy with parents and caretakers, who feel a desire to support our testimonies inviolate. Now as it is drawing near what are called the holidays, and especially that one termed Christmas, I know how hard it is for the dear children, who are young and tender, and have not seen or felt the inconsistency of conforming to the customs of the world, to be crossed and deprived of giving or receiving presents on that day, when perhaps many that surround them are indulging in it. Dear parents and caretakers, draw your children and those under your care close around you, and let fervent breathings ascend to the Father of mercies, that He would enable you to explain to them the ground of our testimony against the observance of "days and times;" and cause them to feel your real love in withholding the indulgence they desire. And my dear young friends, let us give that tender teaching of those who are older and know what is best for us, though we cannot see it ourselves now; remember we shall never have to regret obeying our parents in the Lord.

12th mo. 7th, 1870.

The foregoing expression of concern from a loved Friend in Ohio, suggested the propriety of giving some account of the origin of Christmas observances.

Though this festival is held in honor of the birth of our Saviour, yet it is not known in what season of the year that event occurred. In Chambers' "Book of Days" this feast is referred to a much more ancient origin.

"Amid all the pagan nations of antiquity, there seems to have been a universal tendency to worship the sun as the giver of life and light, and the visible manifestation of the Deity. Various as were the names bestowed by different peoples on this object of their worship, he was still the same divinity. Thus, at Rome, he appears to have been worshipped under one of the characters attributed to Saturn, the father of the gods; among the Scandinavian nations he was known under the epithet of Odin or Woden, the father of Thor, who seems afterwards to have shared with his parent the adoration bestowed on the latter, as the divinity of which the sun was the visible manifestation; whilst with the ancient Erians, the appellation for the god of light was Mithras, apparently the same as the Irish Mithr, and with the Phœnicians or Carthaginians it was Baal or Bel, an epithet familiar to all students of the Bible.

"Concurring thus as regards the object of worship, there was a no less remarkable uniformity in the period of the year at which these different nations celebrated a grand festival in his honor. The time chosen appears to have been universally the season of the New Year, or, rather, the winter-solstice, from which the new year was frequently reckoned. This unanimity in the celebration of the festival in question, is to be ascribed to the general feeling of joy which all of us experience when the gradual shortening of the day reaches its utmost limit on the 21st day of December, and the sun, recommencing his upward course, announces that mid-winter is past, and spring and summer are approaching. On similar grounds, and with similar demonstrations, the ancient pagan nations observed a festival at mid-summer, or the summer-solstice, when the sun arrives at the culminating point of his ascent on the 21st of June, or longest day.

"By the Romans, this anniversary was celebrated under the title of Saturnalia, or the festival of Saturn, and was marked by the prevalence of a universal license and merry-making. The slaves were permitted to enjoy for a time a thorough freedom in speech and behavior, and it is even said that their masters waited on them as servants. Every one feasted and rejoiced, work and business were for a season entirely suspended, the houses were decked with laurels and evergreens, presents were made by parents and friends, and all sorts of games and amusements were indulged in by the citizens. In the bleak north, the same rejoicings had place, but in a ruder and more barbarous form. Fires were extensively kindled, both in and out of doors, blocks of wood blazed in honor of Odin and Thor, the sacred mistletoe was gathered by the Wights, and the savage divinities. Fires were made to the savage divinities. Fires are said, also, to have been kindled at this period of the year by the ancient Persians, between whom and the Druids of Western Europe a relationship is supposed to have existed.

"In the early ages of Christianity, its ministers frequently experienced the utmost difficulty in inducing the converts to refrain from indulging in the popular amusements which were so largely participated in by their pagan countrymen. Among others, the revelry and license which characterized the Saturnalia called for special admonition. But at last, convinced partly of the inefficiency of such denunciations, and partly influenced by the idea that the spread of Christianity might thereby be advanced, the church endeavored to amalgamate, as it were, the old and new religions, and sought, by transferring the heathen ceremonies to the solemnities of the Christian festivals, to make them subservient to the cause of religion and piety. A compromise was thus effected between clergy and laity, though it must be admitted that it proved anything but a harmonious one, as we find a constant, though ineffectual, proscription by the ecclesiastical authorities of the favorite amusements of the people, including among others the sports and revelries at Christmas.

"Ingrafted thus on the Roman Saturnalia, the Christmas festivities received in Britain further changes and modifications, by having superadded to them, first, the Druidical rites and superstitions, and then, after the arrival of the Saxons, the various ceremonies practised by the ancient Germans and Scandinavians. The result has been the strange medley of Christian and pagan rites which contribute to make up the festivities of the modern Christmas. Of these, the burning of the Yule log, and the superstitions connected with the mistletoe have already been described under Christmas Eve."

"Throughout the middle ages, and down to the period of the Reformation, the festival of Christmas, ingrafted on the pagan rites of Yule, continued throughout Christendom to be universally celebrated with every mark of rejoicing. On the adoption of a new system of faith by most of the northern nations of Europe in the sixteenth century, the Lutheran and Anglican churches retained the celebration of Christmas and other festivals, which Calvinists rejected absolutely, denouncing the observance of all such days, except Sunday, as superstitious and unscriptural."

In the Book of Advice issued by the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, we find the following under date of 1808:

"Advised, that Friends be exemplary in keeping to our ancient testimony against the superstitious observation of days."

"Ever since we were a people we have had a testimony against formal worship, being convinced by the precepts of our Lord Jesus Christ, the testimonies of his apostles, and our own experience, that the worship and prayers which God accepts, are such only as are produced by the influence and assistance of his Holy Spirit. We cannot therefore consistently unite with any in the observance of public fasts, feasts, and what they term holy days."

"When we consider the pagan origin of these Christmas and the manner of their introduction into the Christian Church as above described, it is no marvel that the zealous reformers of a former period should have felt that they had a testimony to bear against the superstitions connected therewith; nor is it surprising that thoughtful and conscientious Christians of the present day should select other times for family reunions and social enjoyments, so that it may not be supposed that they are following a popular custom, of whose origin they could not approve.

An Appeal.

In entering upon a new year it appears seasonable once more to appeal to the friends of The Tract Repository on its behalf, the funds placed at the publisher's disposal to aid in its publication being nearly exhausted. Should these deem it desirable to continue it, they will please make such contributions for that purpose as they may feel prompted to do.

The demands for The Tract Repository from all parts of the South were never so great or urgent as at the present time, and it requires considerable care and management to subdivide an edition of about twelve thousand copies monthly, so as to be able to supply all who desire it with a few copies. Indeed it has been impracticable of late to do this, as an application was made a few months ago for over 1000 copies to supply about thirty schools in North Carolina, and another in the same State for 400 copies for other schools, neither of which calls have yet been answered, as the low state of the funds in hand rendered it imprudent to increase the edition.

The publisher is in the almost constant receipt of letters from colored people, expressing their high appreciation of The Tract Repository, and of assurances that its circulation among them is evidently productive of good.

There has been contributed to aid in its publication since its commencement, $1,553.61. There has been expended in issuing thirty-one numbers, $1,543.82, exclusive of a portion of labor gratuitously performed. The entire number of copies printed and circulated is about 325,000. A part of each edition has been nearly equally distributed in the State of North and South Carolina and Georgia, while there has also been a liberal monthly circulation in Virginia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Tennessee, Arkansas, with a few scattering copies in other States.

It requires considerable labor to prepare and send out a publication of this kind, and to attend to all the correspondence which involves; yet this will be cheerfully and gladly performed should the liberal contributors to its support still feel disposed to aid as heretofore. Let us remember that for years many of us have partaken largely of the product of the unrequited toil of these poor sons of Africa by the use of that which their forced labor produced. Can we now do less than help them a little in such ways as present, in order to elevate them from their low and degraded condition, and to confer upon them and their children some of the many privileges which we ourselves enjoy?

Contributions can be sent as heretofore either to Jacob Smedley, 304 Arch St., or Joseph Walton, 150 North 9th St., or direct to the publisher,

DAVID HESTON,
Frankford, Philadelphia.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Portuguese Man-of-war.—The most magnificent specimens of these richly-colored animal (Physalia) occurred in the Atlantic Ocean near the Equator. The sea was moderate, calm, and from time to time during the day, splendid individuals of Physalia pelagica sailed by, attracting attention, even when far off, by their large size and brilliant colors. They had the appearance of beautiful prismatic shells standing upright upon rich blue cushions, the shell being radiated from the base or cushion to the circumference, which was fringed with a rich and bright rose-color. They were not in great abundance, but one would float by every five minutes or so.

The largest Physalia which I examined measured as follows:

Extreme length of bladder, 8 inches
Greatest vertical circumference, 10 1/2 "
Height of bladder above water, 2 1/2 "

The stinging propensities of these Hydrozoa were not generally known, but were destined to make themselves evident at the expense of one unfortunate man. A boat happened to be lowered early in the day, and one of the crew, seeing a large Physalia float within reach, took it up with his naked hand. The threads cling to his hand and arm, penetrating to the axilla and down the side, causing the man to yell with agony. He was quickly brought on board, and as soon as he reached the deck, ran about like a frantic maniac, so that it took several men to catch him, and when secured and the proper remedies applied, he rolled about for a considerable time, groaning with pain. His arm was red, swollen, and remained so for some hours after the occurrence.

One circumstance in relation to these large bryalisc struck me as being very remarkable. Each one as it floated by had beneath it that at first I took to be its mass of tentacles and polypites; but, on more close observation, I found that the appearance was due to a shoal of small fishes accompanying the hydrozoan under protection of its appendages. The fishes were of various sizes from two to six inches long, transversely banded, and looking in the water precisely like the Pilot-fish. There were perhaps a dozen of these accompanying fishes clustered together beneath the bladder of each Physalia.—Collingwood's Naturalist in Chinese Seas.

Animal Poisons.—While bathing at the Cape of Good Hope] as a boy I managed to get me long, lovely, blue tentacle of the Portuguese man-of-war round my wrist, and well recollect the attendant long-enduring agony and irritation, while the blue mark remained on my wrist. Twenty-five years after while soaking in a P. and O. steamer's marine bath in Madras roads, I suddenly received that seemed an agonizing stab below my left knee, and jumped out of the bath with the pain. The cause was at once apparent, a bit of the fatal blue filament had been pumped to the bath, and left the familiar mark on my knee, and I bore it for a long time.

On one occasion I was showing some friends the famous "Arrah House" and opened small window to let in more air and light; doing so, I unwittingly disturbed the adobe nest of a great hornet's nest, and one of the infuriated inmates at once stung me on the left temple; the pain was intense and the swelling immediate.

This dreadful hornet, nearly two inches long, deep brown, with a broad yellow band across the abdomen, builds large globular ear nests, and is not rare in the Himalayas, there it may often be seen in the pines. The mill-men dread it extremely. These are the dreadful animals which assisted in the expulsion of the Amorites of old.—Nature.

How Silver Ore is Sold at Leadville.—The headville (Col.) Reveille says: "The business of buying and selling ores in a camp like this, when the output of the mines is so immense and the value of dollars so great, has been reduced to a science, and is by no means, as many have supposed, dependent upon the fair dealing and honesty of the mill men, who generally are the purchasers. The large mining corporations and wealthy individual owners of productive properties have their own assayers, as well as their own scales at the mines. So far as practicable, similar ores from the different pay streaks are piled together for shipment, under the distinguishing titles of hard carbonates, iron, dark sand, gray sand and many other varieties of ore. The assayer makes frequent assays for the purpose of keeping a general knowledge of these separate kinds of ore, yet such assays are not the basis upon which sales are made, owing to the fact that such samples may be either too high or too low for the bulk of such lots, and the correct sampling must be arrived at by the process customary at the sampling works of receiving so many pounds at regular intervals out of a given weight of ore as it is being crushed. This system gives approximately the true value of the bulk of ore, to ascertain which is equally to the interest of the buyer and seller. Samples from these bulk samples are assayed by the mill men and by the owners, and, if the ounces closely tally, the price to be paid is arrived at. If too great variations occur, the assays are made over again until they do agree. The owner of ore, knowing the cost of milling and marketing ore, is as well able to determine what the mill men can afford to pay as the mill man himself, and thus there is full and complete satisfaction and confidence existing between the sellers and buyers of ore in this camp. The weight of each ton of ore is made to tally almost to a pound by allowing for the unavoidable light waste in hauling, and it is very seldom that disputes arise on this point.—Leader.

Tame Leopard.—Sir J. D. Hay, the British Ambassador in Morocco, had brought up a young leopard in his house until the animal had reached his full size and strength, and it seemed a scarcely safe companion for the younger members of his family. He therefore resolved to present it to the Zoological Gardens in London, where it was duly installed. Some two years later, when on a visit to England, his former master brought him of the leopard, and, going to the gardens, recognized the animal and spoke to him in Arabic. The once familiar sounds immediately awoke the animal's memory, and it at once displayed the appearance of unboasted, but joyous, excitement. On explaining the circumstances the cage was opened and the animal showed the utmost delight at the approach of its early friend and master.—Hooker's Morocco.

Trusting in the Lord.—I saw a parlor clock a few days since which was inclosed in a glass case. Through that case all the mechanism and motion of the clock were visible. Every adjustment of the wheels, every click of the lever, every stroke of the pendulum, was distinctly seen. But it is not necessary that a clock should have a glass case, in order that it may be trusted to tell me the time of day. Ordinarily only the hands and face are seen, but these are enough to go by. So an intimate knowledge of God's ways is not necessary in order to command our trust in Him. I need not understand all the relations and adjustments of divine providence before I can trust the Lord.—Dr. A. J. Gordon.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 20, 1879.

The Quarterly Meeting of Haddonfield, held on the 11th inst., at Moorestown, N. J., was a season of so much Divine favor, and marked by such a deep and united exercise as to call for thankful acknowledgment to Him from whom cometh every blessing.

The feeling of deep solemnity that spread over those assembled, as they sat in reverent silence waiting on the Lord for ability to worship Him in spirit and in truth, was precious; and in due season was followed by the expression of concern that arose in the hearts of several present, who were brought under a living exercise for the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom in the hearts of the people. This current ran especially towards the children and young people, and the depth and harmony of exercise that prevailed was unusual, and it was evidently a time of renewed visitation to that portion of the flock. Earnest, loving and persuasive entreaty was extended to them to choose the Lord for their portion, to yield their hearts to that God who was seeking for entrance there. The rewards of faithful obedience, and the judgments of the Lord on the disobedient and rebellious, were both pointedly brought to view; and it was a time in which both encouragement and warning were freely extended.

There was also an exhortation to those of riper years who desired to be counted among the Lord's people, but who had not given themselves up as a whole burnt sacrifice on the Lord's altar, and who therefore could not fully partake of the joys of God's salvation, to bring all the tithes into the Lord's storehouse, and to prove Him therewith and see if He would not open the windows of Heaven and pour them out a blessing that there should not be room enough to receive.

The different communications were mostly brief, definite and weighty; and we believe the hearts of many rejoiced in the precious feeling of harmonious travail for the welfare of Zion, and could adopt the language of the Psalmist: "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Such seasons of favor bring with them a weighty responsibility for the right use of the blessings vouchsafed; and we sincerely desire that our beloved young people may dwell under the force of the impressions that day made on their hearts, and daily seek in inward retirement, to hold communion with their Heavenly Father, so that they may become familiar with the voice of the Good Shepherd, and receive power from Him to turn from every thing that is evil, and to follow Him in the way of holiness. And they will grow in favor with God and man, know more and more of that sweet tenderness of Spirit, and Heavenly Peace, which are given to the faithful and obedient, and finally be prepared to enjoy in their fullness and unending duration, those pleasures which eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive them.

And may a living concern rest on those who are further advanced in the Heavenly journey, to bear these young disciples on their hearts, to watch over them in love, and to seek for ability to pray fervently to the Lord that He would pour out of his Spirit upon them, strengthen them to resist the temptations of the evil one, enable them to sacrifice their own self-will to his requirements, and make them pillars in his temple that shall go no more out.

Then would the prophetic promise be fulfilled, "He shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers."

We have received from the author, Ellwood Haworth, of Kansas, with a request that it be reprinted in our journal, a pamphlet entitled, "A Witness for the Truth of God against all Schisms and Divisions in Christian Societies." It has been called forth by the separation which occurred in Spring River Quarterly Meeting, Kansas, some months ago, and criticises the "Testimony" or statement put forth by the Friends who took part in that movement, an extract from which appeared in our columns. The author appears to be one in doctrinal sentiment with those Friends, and fully admits the correctness of their views as to "the object and purpose of religious societies, the gifts given to members of the body, the loving care that one member should have over another wherein we bear one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ, and the preservation of a sound and living ministry by living witnesses to the cause of our holy Redeemer." He also unites with what is said in "The Testimony" referred to, on "the universality of saving grace, the atone ment, perceptible guidance of the Holy Spirit in acts of worship, in the exercise of spiritual gifts, sanctification, perfection, &c."

But he differs from them in their belief, that "where contention is, where strife and evil-speaking are; where there is no unity in faith or practice; where there is no fellowship or communion; where views are such that, if one part builds at all it must tear down what the other part builds; where there is no [profitable] testimony can be borne, sinners will not be converted, men will be driven to unbelief, weak members will be discouraged, and the cause of our Redeemer will be dishonored instead of glorified."

In opposition to this view, he says, the history of the church shows that in all ages good and evil have existed within its borders, as is exemplified in the history of Cain and Abel, and in "the strifes, contentions, and evil speakings that were put forth against Moses and the other standard-bearers under the Mosaic economy" and in the "envying and strife and divisions" in the early Christian Church, which the apostle reproved. "Outward separation," he says, "was not known among them, until they lost the life and power of God to that extent that they were not able to rid the church of these baneful things." Another separation may soon be thought necessary as corruption becomes manifest, "and so on, as is verified in the rents and splits that have taken place in Christendom since the establishment of the Christian Church."

These sentiments of Elwood Hawthorth convey a caution which it is well for all who are placed in positions of trial in these days of unsettlement to consider and heed; so that they may be preserved from rash movements, and from too hasty a retreat from any field of service in which they may be called to labor in the Master's cause. Yet we believe there is a limit to their application, beyond which they cannot be pressed without conflicting with the exhortations of Scripture, and with the example of faithful servants of the Lord, in whose footsteps we should walk. We do not suppose that the author of the pamphlet in any degree designs to censure the first converts in the days of the Apostles, for withdrawing from the Jewish Church and organizing separate meetings for the worship of God and the maintenance of the doctrines they had embraced. Neither would he condemn our early Friends for leaving the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Baptist and other denominations to which they had previously belonged, and sitting down together to wait on God, where they might be relieved from a round of formal performances, which hindered rather than helped their devotions.

In the application to the separation at Spring River, of the principles he lays down, he admits the prevalence of the spirit of intolerance complained of in "The Testimony," but thinks it was manifested by both parties, and that the result of that step has been to divide some who were equally sound in doctrine, and were equally concerned to walk uprightly before men.

We desire to call attention to the appeal for aid in conducting the "Tract Repository," which will be found in another part of our columns. This little periodical is doing good in a very unpretending way. It was commenced about the time its publisher paid his first religious visit among the colored people of the Southern States a few years since. The eager thankfulness with which it was received by those people was a stimulus to continue it; and so it has gone on from number to number as funds for its support came to hand—its treasury never very full, and sometimes so nearly or entirely empty that it seemed doubtful whether the end had not come. Yet the demand for it among those to whom it was sent has thus far awakened a willingness on the part of others to contribute. It is an inexpensive way of doing good; for, every dollar given circulates 200 copies. The colored children in the South take them to their homes and often read them to other members of the family; so that these 200 copies probably influence the minds of 500 or more persons.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate on the 11th inst. the Committee on Indian Affairs reported the joint resolution for the appointment of a commission to negotiate for the removal of the Utes from Colorado. This was adopted with an amendment providing that they shall not be removed to the Indian Territory.

In the House a bill has been introduced for the appointment of a commission to consider the best plan and route for a canal across the Isthmus of Darien. An adjournment is to take place the 19th inst. to 6th proximo.

Several resolutions to be introduced against the proposed bill asking Congress for authority to suspend the coinage of silver dollars when the amount should exceed fifty millions, which he substantially renews in his recent report. By the first of the year the proposed bill will have been nearly reached. But a trifling over thirteen millions of these coins are in circulation, although an effort has been spared by the Secretary to force them into use. The greater part of this silver passes from the mint to the vaults of the sub-treasuries.

The fishing season at Gloucester, Mass., closes with the record of the loss of 32 vessels and 260 lives. The vessels were valued at $130,000.

The taxable property in Tennessee is assessed this year at $213,176,000, which is $10,094,473 less than in 1878.

Recent heavy rains have relieved the four months' drought in Virginia.

The hardest storm in the history of the Northern Pacific Railroad, was reported last week as prevailing along that road, from Bismarck to Duluth, covering an area of 400 miles square. Casualties to settlers in exposed districts are minimal.

The village of Red Rock, five miles from Bradford, Pa., was entirely destroyed by fire on the morning of the 10th inst. The fire originated in an oil well, and communicated to a 25,000 barrel tank of oil. Three hundred families are homeless and destitute, and relief committees are formed for their assistance.

The United States consul at Foochow, China, in a dispatch to the Department of State, says the total imports of that country are valued at $5,000,000, less than one-tenth of which were from the United States. One-half is absorbed in the one article of opium from British India.

The City of Berlin, which arrived from Liverpool on the 13th inst., brought $241,500 in gold coin.

On the morning of the 19th inst., one of the Harvard College buildings, known as Stoughton Hall, caught fire from a defective flue, and the roof was burned off, and the room on the fourth floor considerably scorched. The damage will be large, as the building was loaded with water.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending at noon on the 13th, was 282. Of this number 192 were adults, and 90 children.

Markets, &c.—U. S. bonds, 6% 1881, registered, 103 do., coupon, 107 3/4, 30, 103 1/2; 4 1/2, 107; 4 1/2, 107; 4 1/2, 103 1/2.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings at 13 1/4 14 cts. per lb. Petroleum.—Crude, 8 1/2 cts. in barrels; refined, 8 1/2 cts. for export, and 9 1/4 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—Minnesota extra, $6.70 a $7.25 per barrel (bulk), 57 1/2 cts. per cwt. (bulk), 57 1/2 cts. per cwt. for higher grades, $8 a $8.75. Rye flour $5.37 a $5.50.

Grain.—Wheat market and prices easier—re $1.54 a $1.55; amber, $1.56 a $1.57. Rye, 97 cts. Pennsylvania. Corn, old, 62 a 63 cts.; and new, 57 a 62 cts. Oats, 47 a 48 cts. per bushel.

Seeds.—Clover, 9 a 9 1/2 cts. per pound; flaxseed, 8 1/2 cts. per bushel.

Hay and straw.—Prime timothy, 90 cts. a $1 per 10 pounds; mixed, 80 a 90 cts. Straw, $1.10 a $1.20 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—The market for the week was inactive and prices unchanged. Extra, 54 a 55 cts.; good, 5 1/2 cts.; common, 2 1/4 a 4 cts. per pound. Sheep, 4 a 5 cts. per pound, as to quality. Lambs, 4 1/2 a 6 cts. per pound. Hogs, 61 a 73 cts.

FOREIGN.—Advices from Europe on the 11th inst. were unfavorable. The Russian frontier was closed. The Seine was completely frozen over. For Vienna it was stated, so hard and continued frosts early in the season have not been experienced since 1838. Much snow has fallen in Sicily and Calabria rendering communication difficult. The district of Calabria occurred in the district of Calabria, in consequence of the general distress. In Berlin the cold was intense. In upper Silesia, where famine prevails, the thermometer marked 12 degrees below zero on the 9th inst.

General Roberts telegraphed from Cabul, that a battle fought on the 12th inst. between the English troops and the Afghans on the ridge above the Bala-Hissa in which the Afghans were defeated and driven from the Ridge. A dispatch from Cape Town, dated the 25th inst., says: The colonial forces successfully storme Miroors's Mountain on the 20th ult., Chief Miroors was killed during the combat. On the British side two colonels were wounded and two native allies were killed.

Paris has now over nine miles of tubing laid down under the main thoroughfares, for the purpose of unifying the time of all the public clocks, and setting the clock in the city hall, and in the houses, and supply the time of day, like gas and water.

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 11th, Leper, Minister of the Interior, moved a grant of 5,000,000 francs to relieve the existing distress from the (trap) depression of the cotton market, by a vote of 75 to 3. The Senate afterwards unanimously voted to grant.

The newly appointed Spanish Ministers, took the seats in the Chamber of Deputies on the 10th. The Premier, in announcing the formation of the Cabinet declared that the recent crisis was due to the fact in which the bill for economic reforms in Cuba was drawn up that the present Government would support a bill for the abolition of slavery in Cuba, and would press fresh proposals for a compromise between the interests of Spain and Cuba.

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

Marshallton, 3rd mo, 29th, 1864.

Dear Friend, Joseph Elkinton,— * * * Oh! may our dear friends who are at Tunessassa be so preserved and enabled to discharge their duty faithfully, that the good savor of their precepts and example may be long felt and remembered by the Indian children. I think it is a matter of great importance that those who stand appointed as a committee to carry out the religious concern of our Yearly Meeting for the welfare of our Indian brethren and sisters, should feel after that religious concern, that they may be favored to feel the weight of it, which I think would tend to humble us, and all should be brought to feel the necessity of looking for Divine direction and help to perform it. I desire we may guard against indulging (a wish) to get praise of men, or gratifying the itching ear in others who are desiring to hear of great things. It seems to me the Christian will be satisfied to know that he has done his Master's will and then leave it, looking to Him for his reward. * * *

Thy friend,
EBENEZER WORTH.

1863. 11th mo. 12th. I have been favored with some precious seasons, greatly to my encouragement. This morning met Hannah A. Warner and Amy Albertson at the widow Downing's, and took them to the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders. I thought Hannah was favored; to me it was a precious meeting.

13th. Attended the Quarterly Meeting; in which I thought we were favored with a quiet precious covering.

14th. Attended Uwehlan Monthly Meeting; in which I felt my mind comforted and staid; were kindly entertained at Mary Butlers'; then went to Robeson.

15th. Attended Robeson Meeting; a comfortable one, and pretty well attended.

16th. Attended West Caln Meeting in the morning and East Sadsbury at 3 P. M. I thought Hannah's communication was suitable to some then present. Lodged at Parvin Smith's.

17th. Attended Bart Meeting. I think Hannah Warner was favored, and some were tendered; had a meeting at Old Sadsbury at 3 P. M.

18th. A comfortable meeting at East Caln and pretty well attended; dined at Mary Pim's. The meeting at Bradford at 3 P. M. was pretty well attended and I thought Hannah Warner was favored to feel the state of those present and speak properly to them. I do not recollect for a long time to have experienced more composure, settlement of mind and ability to feel for the welfare of those present, desiring the blessing of the Great Head upon them all. A meeting I desire not soon to forget, but to remember with feelings of gratitude to the great Giver of all good.

19th. Attended the Western Select Quarter and on the 20th the Quarterly Meeting.

21st. Hannah Warner had an appointed meeting at Parkersville at 3 P. M.; a pretty comfortable one.

22nd. New Garden Meeting at 10 A. M. and West Grove at 3 P. M.; both pretty well attended. Daniel Thompson met and took us to his house.

23rd. At London Britain Meeting. The scholars belonging to a school in the neighborhood attended. Came to C. H.'s that evening.

24th. A pretty comfortable meeting at London Grove at 10 A. M. One at Fallowfield at 3 P. M.; small. Staid at A. G.'s over night.

25th. At Downtingtown Meeting; pretty well attended and a favored meeting.

This memorandum appears to conclude his visit with Hannah A. Warner. This dear Friend deceased 25th of 9th mo. 1872, aged 58 years; her quiet, unobtrusive yet dedicated life, leaving a very precious savor, which yet remains on the minds of her friends, saying in expressive language, follow me as I have followed my Divine Master.

12th mo. 3rd. A comfortable meeting, after which there was $162 subscribed for the "Contrabands" of the South.

5th. Attended the interment of Ann Downing, widow of Chas. Downing, after which there was a meeting held. Attended, yesterday, a special meeting of the Meeting for Sufferings, in which I thought there was a precious solemn quiet and a deep interest manifested for the welfare of our Society and the support of our Christian testimony against war; and a desire, while we supported our testimony, not to give any just cause for offence to those in office, and to acknowledge the kindness of the Secretary of War* to our drafted members. The favors we have received I esteem as a blessing from the Great Head of the Church, for which we ought to be very thankful. I have, I think, of late been warned of the uncertainty of time and trust at seasons have been much favored with the spirit of supplication. May the favor be gratefully received and I more humble and faithful.

1864. 2nd mo. 11th. Attended our Select Quarter, and on the 12th the General Quarterly Meeting. I thought we had a comfortable meeting. There was a committee appointed to attend the monthly and other subordinate meetings and give such advice and assistance as they might be capable of. May we live so as to be prepared for the service required of us, that the day's work may be going on with the day, that when the solemn summons comes to us, all may be prepared to go.

3rd mo. 8th. Attended Sadsbury Monthly Meeting with others of the Quarterly Meeting Committee. The meeting was small and in a weak state.

3rd mo. 9th. The Committee attended our (Bradford) Monthly Meeting. I thought a quiet favored meeting, affording some encouragement to those who were interested for the welfare of Society. A good many young people in attendance; their behavior sober and becoming.

3rd mo. 10th. At Uwehlan Monthly Meeting— Oh! that the Committee themselves may dwell low and feel after Best Help to enable them to do what may be required.

8th mo. 2nd. Attended Sadsbury Monthly Meeting. I trust I was favored to have my mind in good measure staid upon that which can preserve and comfort us. Friends go along with the business pretty well.

3rd of the mo. and 4th of the week. Attended our Monthly Meeting. It was well attended by our young members. Although feeling my own weakness I was favored to feel for myself and others. It felt like meetings I was favored to attend years ago. For the last few weeks I have enjoyed meetings much; it is an unmerited favor.

8th mo. 12th. Our Quarterly Meeting. It was pretty well attended by our members and a number of those who are not. M. C., P. W. R. and Lydia Kite attended and spoke acceptably. To me a comfortable meeting; a great favor.

8th mo. 14th. A comfortable meeting at Bradford, in which I think I was enabled in some degree to have my mind staid on that which can preserve and comfort. May I be more humble and faithful. I have felt much for our country. Sorrow seems to clothe the feelings of many on account of the war. May we be brought nearer to what we ought to be, by our trials.

9th mo. 15th. Attended a meeting of the Indian Committee also a Meeting for Sufferings. In both of these meetings I think I was much favored to feel my mind staid and comforted by Him who is the alone helper of his people. How precious the favor. May it humble me and encourage to faithfulness.

10th mo. 6th. Attended Uwehlan Monthly Meeting. In the meeting for discipline S. Cope was led to speak very tenderly to the young men who had violated our Christian testimony against war. I also felt much for them. I think the young men were a good deal tendered. I hope it was a favored meeting.

9th.—First-day.—Was a good deal unwell; was enabled to feel the uncertainty of time. May I continue to be humbled under a sense of it and endeavor to make a good use of my time.

11th mo. 28th. I trust, in unmerited mercy, I have again been favored to feel a sense of the goodness and mercy of the Great Head of the Church to me, a poor sinner. May I humble me and may I be more devoted faithfully to serve Him the remainder of my days, and to be preserved from falling. What an inestimable blessing it is that we are not forsaken. What encouragement and cause for gratitude. May the latter increase in all the human family. Our Divine Master is forever worthy to be loved, honored and obeyed. I think I may say of latter time our meetings for worship and discipline have been favored seasons. What a great favor that the Dear Master in his goodness is pleased to be with us when thus assembled. Oh! how precious is his Divine presence. I was privileged to attend our own and Salisbury Select Preparative Meetings and Select and General Quarterly Meetings. C. S. and P. W. R. were with us with minutes from their Monthly Meetings liberating them to attend the meetings of Calm and Western Quarterly Meetings. The company of those whom the Master sends to labor amongst us is acceptable, and may He bless their labors to the praise of his own name for He is worthy.

Life of an Actress.—Charlotte Cushman often said sadly, writes her editor, "What is or can be the record of an actress, however famous? They leave nothing behind them but the fragments of memories. Ask any number of persons to give you a real picture or positive image of the effect any great actor produced, * * * and they can tell you nothing more than that it was fine, it was grand, it was overwhelming; but ask them, How did he do such or such a thing, how did he render such a passage? * * * and they are at once at a loss. It is all gone, passed away. We strut and fret our hour on the stage, and then the curtain falls, and all is darkness and silence!"

This is melancholy enough, but it is true as far as it goes. It certainly is not in harmony with the teachings of those who would fain persuade the modern church that the stage is, or might be made, the auxiliary of the pulpit. The good which men do lives after them. Men like Florence Bushnell bequeathed ideas and influences which are inspirations God-ward to many, and which reproduce themselves in succeeding generations. But C. Cushman herself being judge, the residuum of the life of the greatest actress is—"darkness and silence!" Sad confession! Yet it omits that hardening of the moral sensibilities in thousands which is the inevitable result of exciting aimless emotions, and that earthly influence which is inseparable from so thoroughly earthly a place as the theatre. The curtain may fall and hide the actor; but those excited sensibilities he helped to harden in thousands live on, and contribute to the downward tendencies of many lives. The theatre, therefore, is not a place of harmless, but, even in its best conditions, of positively harmful amusement. In its lowest and prevailing plane it is "earthly, sensual, devilish."—National Repository.

British Guiana.

Among the fish which abound in the rivers of Guiana are several species which are dreaded for their voracity, or formidable means of attack. Among these are the Perai. "These were so abundant and ferocious that at times it was dangerous, when bathing, to go into the water to a greater depth than up to one's knees. Even then small bodies of these hungry creatures would swim in and make a dash close up to our legs, and then retreat to a short distance. They actually bit the steering paddles as they were drawn through the water astern of the boats. A tapir which I shot swimming across the river had its nose eaten off by them whilst we were towing it to the shore.

One day, when the boat was hauled in to some rocks, a few of the men were engaged shooting fish near by, and in so doing wounded a large haimara. Having escaped from its human tormentors, it made for the open river, but was instantly attacked by perai attracted by the blood escaping from its wound, and was driven back to the shelter of the rocks close to the boat, from which I had a good view of the chase. The large fish followed by its savage enemies reminded me of a parallel case on land—a stricken deer pursued by wolves.

The perai, fortunately, lie only off sand-beaches and in quiet pools, not frequenting the cataraets, where their presence would be anything but acceptable to the men when working in the water. I was fortunate enough to find the spawning place of some perai on the matted clusters of fibrous roots of some lianes, which hung from the branches of a tree into the water, amongst which much earthy sediment had collected, and many small aquatic plants had grown. The sediment gave weight to the roots which kept the clusters under water, and the force of the current made them buoyant, giving the lianes a slope when the river was high, which kept them not far from its surface. My attention was attracted to them by two perai lying close to them, with their heads up stream, as the men said, engaged in watching their eggs. Procuring one of the roots I examined it, and found amongst its numbers of single eggs and clusters of small jelly-like young, which had been already hatched.

In hauling the boats up the shallow rapids near the mouth of the Cutari the men, whilst wading, were frequently struck by conger eels. Every now and then a man would call out 'Congler, conglar,' and jumping into the boat, rub his shins which had been benumbed by a touch from one of these fish. After half a minute or so the numbness wore off and he took to the water again. The boat being in a critical position at the time it was impossible for the men to leave the water. They had therefore to brave out the shocks from these batteries, which must have been very slight, given probably by small eels, or they could not have stood them.

Sting-rays were frequently seen on the sandy bottom or graveling for worms in the muddy banks under water. My interpreter, William, was unfortunate enough to step upon one, which, being of the color of the bottom, was not observed. It drove its spine or sting into the side of his instep, producing a jagged wound which bled profusely. I immediately put laudanum on the wound and gave him strong dose of ammonia. In a quarter of an hour after he was writhing on the ground in great agony, actually screaming at times with the pain which he felt in the wounded part in his groin, and under one armpit. His foot and leg were so cold that he got one man to light a fire and support his foot over it, persisting in trying to put it in the flames. I gave him two doses of laudanum, one shortly after the other, without relieving his sufferings in the slightest degree. After three hours of intense pain he became easier, but had returns of it at intervals during the night. For a week he was unable to put his foot to the ground, and the wound did not heal thoroughly for six weeks."

On one of the excursions up the Essequibo River, our author stopped at the house of a Brazilian Indian, where, he says, "I was much amused with the good relations existing between three young tame birds at the house they were fully feathered, but as their wing were clipped they could not fly—not that they seemed to care to do so, for they appeared to enjoy themselves thoroughly, trotting about in company, watching 'every pot boil' in the house, and making little excursions to the edge of the forest, or the water's edge. The leader of the band was a small fall-bird with a black and white body and crimson head, the others were a black corn-bird and a young 'Q'est-que-ce-dit.' When ever the fall-bird went its two companions trotted close behind, side by side, the big corn-bird now and then opening its mouth, in a babyish fashion, to try and induce the little leader to feed it. Whilst I was watching them they made one of their journeys to the river's edge, and began hopping about in some low shrubs overhanging the water, when, in an unlucky moment, the 'Q'est-que-ce-dit' lost its hold and fell in, where it struggled round and round in its futile endeavors to get out again. Great was the sorrow and concern of the other two, who chirped and chattered in a most excited state, hopping about above its head on the lowest twigs, as if wishing to try and render it every assistance in their power, and in their excitement nearly falling into the water themselves. Going to the spot I fished the little fellow out with a stick, and no sooner was it on dry land than its companions were round it, evidently greatly relieved in mind at its escape from the watery grave. They all trotted off to the house together, the wet and draggled little bird marching between its two sympathising friends."

Among the wild animals that range in the forests of Guiana, the Jaguar and the Puma are the most formidable. The jaguar with its spotted coat is the American representative of the tiger of the East Indies, and the puma, with its tawny skin, free from marks of the lion. Both are smaller than their Eastern cousins, yet possess sufficient strength and ferocity to render them dangerous at times. From the book we are reviewing, we extract the following items respecting them.

"I learned a curious fact regarding the habits of the jaguar which is worth recording. On one occasion when we had landed and were hunting a herd of bush hogs, two men were left in charge of the boat. We had not been away in the forest for more than two or three minutes, when the men in the boat heard a heavy foot tread on the bank above them, and looking up saw a large jaguar gaz ng down on them from the very spot up which we had clambered. They immediately pushed the boat off into the stream for safety, bearing an attack from the tiger, as they had no gun to defend themselves with. They told me that this jaguar was what the Indians call the master of the flock of hogs we had been hunting; that it follows them wherever they go; and that when it is hungry, and finds a pig a little distance from the rest, it pounces upon it, killing it with one blow of its huge paw. The squeak of the stricken hog brings down the whole herd to the spot, whereupon the jaguar climbs a tree for safety till the storm it brewed is over and the pigs have left the spot, when it descends from its perch to feed on the flesh of its victim. I suppose when it has 'cleared out' an entire flock it seeks another one and proceeds as before.

A story is told of an Indian who was following up a flock of hogs to get a shot, when he saw a jaguar knock over a member of it as just described. When the flock bore down on the jaguar, it jumped upon a low fallen tree where it was surrounded immediately by the enraged hogs. Unfortunately for the jaguar it was not beyond their reach, and in a minute was dragged down amongst them, trampled upon, and ripped to pieces.

One can easily conceive how the numbers of bush hogs are kept down in this way by large tigers of various sorts preying upon them, but it is more difficult to understand what keeps the numbers of large tigers from increasing. They appear to have no enemies, nothing preys upon them, and the few killed by Indians would not affect their number in any sensible degree. Both animals increase at the same rate, the jaguar having from two to three cubs at a birth, and the peccary about the same number of young."

"One evening, whilst returning to camp along the portage path that we were cutting at Wonoboto falls, I walked faster than the men, and got some two hundred yards in advance. As I rose the slope of an uneven piece of ground, I saw a large puma (Pelis concolor) advancing along the other side of the rise towards me, with its nose down on the ground.

The moment I saw it I stopped; and at the same instant it tossed up its head and screeching also came to a standstill. With its body half crouched, its head erect, and its eyes round and black from its pupils having expanded in the dusky light, it looked at once a noble and an appalling sight. I glanced back along our wide path to see if any of my men were coming, but at the moment I felt that it was not well to be alone without some weapon of defence, and I knew that one of them had a gun; but nothing could I see. As long as I did not move the puma remained motionless also, and thus we stood, some fifteen yards apart, eyeing one another curiously. I had heard that the human voice is potent in scaring most wild beasts, and feeling that the time had arrived to do something desperate, I waved my arms in the air and shouted loudly. The effect was electrical; it turned quickly on one side, and in two bounds was lost in the forest. I waited until my men came up, however, before passing the place at which it disappeared, in case it might only be lying in ambush there; but we saw nothing more of it."

For "The Friend"

"How Mary Penington Built a House at Amersham."

In a work entitled "The Penns and Peningtons of the 17th century," an interesting occurrence is narrated, under the above title, showing the perseverance of Mary Penington in procuring and fitting up a home for herself and family, after her husband's estate had been confiscated to the crown.

In the year 1655 Isaac Penington was imprisoned by the order of the Earl of Bridgewater, "because he would neither when writing to him use the phrase 'My Lord' nor sign himself 'Your humble servant.'" It was not until 1668 that he was taken to London for trial, and as there was "no record against him, he was at once liberated." The writer would desire to arrest the attention of the young women of the present day, by the perusal of these events, showing that though reared in affluence, and moving in the higher social circles, Mary Penington did not shrink from what she thought the path of duty, and did not heed the finger of scorn, which some might point at her. The young mothers especially, are affectionately invited to note how she ordered her family in the little minutie of every-day life; and how great her care was on meeting-mornings to keep her mind measurably clear of the cumbering cares attendant on house-keeping. Too many of us are apt to conclude the domestic machinery must be kept running at high pressure rates,—that unless all is favorable, we cannot "present our bodies" in the assemblies gathered for spiritual worship without sustaining too much temporal loss. We will listen to her own words, showing how amply she was compensated for all the sacrifices made. "I lay down sweetly and very pleasantly at night, awaked with a sweet sense of the work before me in the morning; was employed all day thereat, but had no burden on my mind."

After speaking of I. P.'s long imprisonment, the narrative states: "Some unprincipled men, who had observed his unresisting spirit, refused to pay him money which they owed him, and one of Mary Penington's relatives commenced a law-suit to deprive her of one of her estates. The case was thrown into Chancery, and was lost, because neither she nor her husband would take an oath to verify their claims. Mary Penington herself tells us of these trials, adding, 'Thus were we stripped of my husband's estate and wronged of a great part of mine. After this we were tossed up and down from place to place, to our great weariness and charge; seeing no place to abide in in this country near to meetings, which had formerly been held at our house at Chalfont. We were pressed in our spirits to stay amongst the Friends here if any house could be found with conveniences, though it were but ordinarily decent. We sought in many places within the compass of four or five miles from that meeting, but could find none. Yet having still such a sense of its being our right place, we had not freedom to settle anywhere else; so we boarded at Waltham Abbey during the summer for our children's accommodation at the school there, and left our friends to enquire further for us. But in all that time of seeking it had never entered into our thoughts of buying a place. Nay, we rather endeavored to have a state of disengagement, and to procure a habitation without land. But, seeing no place like to fit us in the country near those people, I told my husband I was not willing to go from them into any other place, except it were to our own estate in Kent. This beliked not to do, taking exception against the air and against the dirtiness of the place. This put me into a great strait. I could not bear, except to go to Kent, to leave those we had been instrumental in gathering to the Truth, and who had known our sufferings respecting our estate, and who compassionated us. We and they had suffered together, and had been comforted together. They had a sense of our former condition, and were compassionate of us; we being in their sight so stripped, they expected no great things such as would answer to our rank in the world; but rather wondered we were able to live so decently, and to pay every one their own. Our submitting thus to mean things, which our present condition occasioned, was honorable before them, but strangers would have despised it, which it would have been uneasy to us."

"Thus it was that the temper amongst our acquaintances and countrymen here helped us to bear the meanness and the great straightness so much more than we have ever known before, having been born to and having lived in great plenty. One day when we were going to Waltham Abbey, R. T. coming to see us, and bewailing our going out of the country, and having no place near them to return to, said, 'Why will you not buy some little place near us?' I refused this with great neglect, saying our condition would not admit of such a thing, for we had not an hundred pounds beside our rents, and that we must sell some of my land if we do so. He told me he had an uncle who would sell a place that was about thirty pounds a year, which stood near the meeting house at Amersham, and was in a healthy place; and that the house being trimmed might be made habitable. My husband was not there at that time; but soon after R. B. came, and I told him what R. T. had proposed; he seemed to encourage the thing, and said he had heard there were some rooms in the house that might serve.

"That night Thomas Elwood came out of Kent and told me he had much to do to come back without selling my farm at West Bar. I laid the e things together, and said, 'I think this must be our way; if we can sell West Bar, to buy this that R. T. has offered, and with the overplus money put the house in a condition to receive us.' Next day I took Annie Bull with me, and went on foot to Woodside, to John Humphries's house, to view it and its situation. I came in by Hill's lane through the orchard; but it looked so ruinous, and unlike what could be trimmed up for us, that I did not go into the house. So it quite fell through until we were going away, having been disappointed of a house at Beaconsfield, which my husband had been in treaty about. Upon this we pressed again to see the house, which I did, Thomas Elwood and H. B. going with me; my husband having said he left the decision to me. So I went into the house, and they viewed the grounds; and in half an hour's time I had the form of the thing in my mind, what to sell, what to pull down, what to add, and cast how it would be done with the overplus money. So I gave up to have them treat for it, and let us know at Waltham; which they did, and sent us word the title was clear, but they judged it £50 too dear. When I received that message, I had my mind much to the Lord in this thing; that if it were the place He gave us liberty to be in, He would order it for us. I had requested of my husband that, seeing he had lost all, and the children had no provision but my estate, and that we were so tossed about, and had no dwelling place for ourselves or our children, I might build some little thing for them. My husband was averse to building; but I, weighing that could I part with some land, and buy the place with the money, and put it in condition for us and them, and he not to be troubled with the building, but that it should be made over to Friends for me and the children; then he, considering that the estate was mine, and that he had lost all of his, and that thus that suffering had been brought upon me, was willing that I should do what I would. And he added that he took delight that I should be answered in this, though it was contrary to his temper either to own a house or to build one.

"So I sent word to our friends that they should conclude for it; that I did not matter £50 if they thought well of it in other respects. Then it went on. I was often in prayer to the Lord that I might be preserved from entanglements and cumber, and that it might be such an habitation as would manifest that the Lord was again restoring us, and had a regard to us. When it was bought, I went industriously and cheerfully about the business, though I saw many unusual inembrances present themselves before me; under which I still cried to the Lord that I might go through in his fear, and not cumber or darken my mind.

"After we had concluded for it, we met with a great interposition; the woman being advised to make prey upon us by an unreasonable demand for her consent. I earnestly desired of the Lord to make way for us to get clear of the whole matter, though with great loss, rather than that we should run into entanglements in the management of it, the dread of running into debt was so heavy on me. But I got over that, and went on to plant, and to make provision for building, till the surveyor put me out of my own way. He put us upon rearing from the ground a new part, and my husband falling in with his plan, I could not avoid it. It brought great trouble upon me, for I did not see my way clear as before. Having stepped from my own plan, and not knowing how to compass this charge, I took no pleasure in doing any thing about it. At length I fell ill, and could not look after it. At a great was an exercise; one while fearing the Lord did not approve of what I had done; another while saying within myself I did not seek great things nor vain glory in wishing a fine habitation. For as I cast it at first, and did not intend to do more, it would have been very ordinary. After many close exercises and earnest prayers, I came to a clearness that I had an honest intent in what I did, the full expense being undiscerned. I then felt my mind stayed, and acted without disquiet; and the building was afterwards managed by me rather in delight, through an assurance that the undertaking was a right one.

"Part of the house fell down from the new casting of it, and in the falling I was most remarkably preserved. This wrought in me a care how to compass what had to be done. After a time I felt an innocent enjoyment arise in my mind, and I went on very cheerfully, never looking out with apprehension; and when there was occasion for money to be paid I found I still had it, having contracted my family expenses. My rents came in steadily, and by selling old houses, and bark, and several other things, the expenses of the building were met, and I then had pleasure instead of pain in laying out the money. Indeed my mind was so daily turned towards the Lord in conducting this affair, and so continually I was provided with money, that I often thought, and sometimes said, that if I had lived in the time when building of houses for the service or worship of the Lord was accepted and blessed, I could not have had in such a work a sweeter, stiller or pleasanter time.

"I set all things in order of a morning before I went to meeting, and so left them unthought of till I returned; rarely finding them so much as to rise in my mind when going to or when at meetings. This was my mind kept all sweet and savory; for I had nothing in all that affair that disquieted me, having no further anxiety than that nothing should be wasted; and this I perceived by eye, without disquieting care being administered, that would produce anger or fretting. I lay down sweetly and very pleasantly at night, awaked with the sweet sense of the work before me in the morning; was employed all day thereto, but had no burden on my mind. This seasoned me, and kept me pleasant and in health, and now I am free to leave this account of it with my children.

"The building was completed in less than four years; I could have compassed it in much less time, but then I should have been straitened for money; doing it by degrees, it stole on undiscerned in point of charge. Now all is finished except the wash-house; and I have taken up one hundred pounds; and during that time we have not omitted being helpful to others in giving or lending in our places. Maria Webb writes, 'The rebuilding must have been done in a very substantial manner, for we find the house is still, after a lapse of nearly two centuries, a tenable habitation. It is now a farm house, and well known in Amersham as the ancient residence of the Peningtons.'"

"No payment for Love."—J. Cohen, at the annual meeting of the London City Mission, mentioned the following touching incident:

"Fifteen years' experience in Whitechapel had brought him into contact with some of the noblest specimens of humanity he ever met with—an honor to their kind and to the religion they professed. He remembered one case of a widow with four troublesome boys to maintain. It was discovered, some weeks after the death of a poor girl who died of consumption in extreme poverty, that this poor widow, after a hard twelve hours' work as charwoman, would go back to her home at eight o'clock in the evening, not to bed, but twice or thrice a week to sit all night by the bedside of that dying girl, to minister to her wants, and speak a word of comfort to that poor dying soul. The person who discovered this asked her, 'But were you not paid?' 'Paid for it, ma'am!' she replied; 'I loved her.'"

"What was the largest gift handed to their treasurer, in God's sight, compared with this poor widow's mite?"

A Warning.

There are a people sprung up in our midst who profess to belong to Friends, and are pretending to propagate and promulgate Friends' ancient principles; but are not doing it, but are ignoring them and setting them at naught from time to time. These people are sending men out as preachers, who are nothing more than lecturers of a smooth appearance; who go about teaching, and may I not say, seducing weak members amongst us, making them believe there is need of a change in Friends' principles and practices, and that the old form has got out of date and is unpopular and thereby many honest people are deceived and led astray before they are aware of it till finally they lose all sight of the straight gate and narrow way which we are commanded to walk in. Step by step they are led into a more popular and fashionable way of worship which suits the natural man. It is evident the main object is to crush Friends' principles out of existence; and that is to be done step by step, as we become corrupted. For the evil spirit knows it can be done only by degrees. Now I feel constrained to warn all Friends to mind who they receive, and to whom they bid God-speed, for in so doing we are partakers of their deeds whether they be good or bad. P. K.

A few Questions and Answers Relative to War.

Q. "From whence come wars and fighting among you," saith the apostle.

A. He answers, "Come they not hence even of your lusts that war in your members?" &c.

Q. What is war?

A. That cruel, legalized, systematized murder or mode of destruction, in which intelligences and immortal beings are taught, permitted and encouraged, by temporal authority, to mutilate and kill one another.

Q. Is it not this, in the language of the poet, "that so makes man a wolf to man?"

A. Yes: the sin, cruelty, bloodshed and misery of war, are terrible beyond description and are much more becoming sanguinary wolves, than Christian nations or men.

Q. Are wars at all reconcilable with the religion of Christ?

A. No. He whose kingdom is not of this world; who was declared to be "the Prince of Peace" and who said, "Blessed are the peace-makers" can allow of no complicity with that, which one of his apostles declares comes from the "lusts that war in our members." Whenever the true spirit of Christianity prevails in the world, war will be impossible.

Q. What saith the Psalmist, of war?—He who in a former dispensation was necessary to them and engaged in them?

A. "He (the Lord) maketh wars to cease and to the ends of the earth," &c. And again, "Scatter thou the people that delight in war."

Q. Was not the abolition of war prophesied of in other scriptures before the coming of the Christian dispensation?

Yes. Isaiah saith: "He (the Lord) shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Selected.

Q. Is not arbitration a more Christian, as well as a more expedient way of settling national differences?

A. Yes; many long, very bloody, and extensive wars might have been amicably and firmly settled by the arbitration of a deputed congress of nations, or by even a jury of twelve men.

Q. In addition to the innumerable diseases caused by wars, do they not involve a fearful waste of means which might be usefully applied?

A. Yes. An intelligent British author says, The expenses of an ordinary campaign would be sufficient to endow a school in every parish in England and Ireland for ever.

Q. What, as one example, does history teach us relative to the expensiveness of wars?

A. The American Colonies, before the Revolution, imported from the mother country, goods to the amount of $22,500,000; which trade was annihilated by the war; whereby also great numbers of respectable merchants and others were entirely ruined. The struggle lasted seven or eight years; while in this time, Britain sacrificed 200,000 men, and expended $720,000,000.

Q. What does Bismarck say of the terrible course of war; and of all the disappointment, misery and sin involved in it?

A. "In satisfying my ambition," Bismarck has said, "I have made nobody happy. And what a number of people I have cast into misery. Without me three great wars would have been avoided; 80,000 men—many, many more—would not have been killed, and such numbers of families, of fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters and wives would not have been plunged into mourning."

Q. What does he say of the settling this account with his Omnipotent Judge?

A. "However, that account is to be settled between God and myself so far as the hereafter goes."

Q. What satisfaction did he derive from this? and what was the harvest?

A. "What happiness have I derived from all my success? Little or none; and I have reaped endless worry, vexation, hatred, pain, grief, over-work and care."

Q. What does General Sherman declare of battles and fightings, and of his hatred thereof?

A. General Sherman in a little speech to some children, said: "You may think, children, when you read about us war men, that we like battles and fighting. It is not so. Most of us hate it. So far as I am concerned, I have been engaged in wars and with business connected with war for forty years, and I hate it with a deep and growing hatred."

Q. What do the present menacing, impoverishing, demoralizing armies of Europe indicate and portend?

A. They indicate jealousy, covetousness, or revenge. They portend that monster scourge of war; with its accompanying train of iniquities—promiscuous slaughter, carnage, untold wickedness, cruelty and desolation; the dreadful murder, the bitter anguish, the agonizing horrible death; as also, the widowed mourning hearts, and fatherless children.

Q. What is the hoped for advantage, or accruing benefit?

A. The self-gratulation in rulers of having set idle, mischief-making, if not rebellious armies in motion; the puny ambition or honor of having come off victorious; the thirst for military glory; the coveted desire, if all else should fail, of notoriety among men, the sweets of popular applause.

Q. What does the poet say of war's ephemeral gains?

A. "—Reason frowns on war's unequal game, Where wretched nations raise a single name, And mortgaged States their grandees' wreaths regret, From age to age in everlasting debt. Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey To rust on medals, or on stones decay."

Q. What was the song of the angel with a multitude of the heavenly host, upon the ever memorable Advent?

A. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men."

[The two following pieces appear to have been written on the occasion of the "Thanksgiving," recently directed to be held by public authority. We all have abundant cause to render the tribute of thanksgiving to the bountiful Author of all our blessings; but this tribute can only be offered availing when the Lord is pleased to raise the feeling in our hearts, and give ability to offer to Him the homage which is due. Therefore our Society has ever objected to the observance of a fixed time for thanksgiving, set apart by the civil authorities; as well as to the performance of other acts of religious worship, such as preaching and praying at any set times, and independently of knowing the renewed anointing of the Lord's Holy Spirit.—Ed.]

THANKSGIVING.

Selected.

"Thou connect the year with thy goodness, and thy paths drop fatness. The pasture is clothed with locks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy; they also sing."—Psalm lxx. 11-13.

Not brighter than our brilliant skies
Were those of Palestine;
Then let our songs of praise arise
"In notes almost divine."

When Israel's bard, with sweetest strain,
Blessed God for all that grew
On mountain slope and fertile plain,
Where nightly fell the dew,
That with the sun-shine and the rain
Nourished the tender shoots,
The waving fields of precious grain,
And all the luscious fruits;
And when he looked on vine-clad hills,
Abroad on pastures green,
And heard the sweetly murmuring rills
That, with their silvery sheen,
Flowed from the mountain to the vale,
To water thirsty lands
With living streams that never fail,
And heard the joyful bands
Of warblers sweet that daily sung
The praises of the Lord,
His own sweet harp he gladly strung,
Attuning every chord
To strains adoring and sublime,
And, with immortal words,
Sang of their lovely, genial clime,
Of locks and well-fed herds,
Of valleys covered o'er with corn,
Of years with goodness crowned,
When plenty, from her bounteous horn,
Poured richest treasures round.

He taught us how, with grateful hearts,
Sweet psalms of praise to sing;
Let us, with joy, sustain our parts
As we to Heaven's King
On this great festival of praise,
Our sweetest incense bring;
And though we have no golden urns
To bear before his throne,
He'll turn no grateful heart o'er turns
That worships Him alone.

THANKSGIVING.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

What time the latest flower hath bloomed,
The best bird had soulward flown;
When silence weaves o'er garnered sheaves
Sweet idyls in our northern zone;
When scattered children rest beside
The hearth, and hold the mother's hand,—
Then roars Thanksgiving's ample tide
Of fervent praise across the land.

And though the autumn stillness broods
Where spring was glad with song and stir,
Though summer's grace leave little trace
On fields that smiled at sight of her,
Still glows the sunset's altar-fire
With crimson flame and heart of gold,
And faith uplifts, with strong desire
And deep content, the hymns of old.

We bless our God for wondrous wealth,
Through all the bright benignant year;
For shower and rain, for ripened grain;
For gift and heaven, far and near.
We bless the ceaseless Providence
That watched us through the peaceful days,
That led us home, or brought us thence,
And kept us in our various ways.

And if the hand so much that gave,
Hath something taken from our store,
If caught from sight, to heaven's pure light,
Some precious ones are here no more,
We still adore the Friend above,
Who, while earth's road grows steep and dim,
Yet comforts us, in tender love,
And holds our darlings close to Him.

Thanks, then, O God! from sea to sea
Let every wind the anthem bear!
And hearts be rife, through toil and strife,
With joyful praise and grateful prayer,
Our Father's God, their children sing
The grace they sought through storm and sun:
Our harvest tribute here we bring,
And end it with, "Thy will be done!"

Meteorological Notes from Diary of Benjamin Hornor.

1768. April 5th.—Ice so strong as to bear my weight (in hhd.) where the water was two feet deep. N. B. His weight varied from about 210 to 225 pounds.

8th.—Snow on the ground 2½ inches in depth.

15th.—Snowed a great part of the day.

May 6th.—A frost that froze the ground.

1769. April 5th.—Very warm, with a thunder shower.

8th.—Very cold. Ice quarter of an inch thick.

20th.—Hard frost and snow all day.

May 2nd.—Some snow and cold rain.

1770. April 2nd.—Snowed all day,—depth about six inches,—although it thawed.

4th.—Ice so strong as to bear my weight.

October 3rd.—Snow this morning that covered the houses.

1772. February 22nd.—Very warm. Thermometer said to be at 65°.

March 15th.—Said to be the coldest day this winter.

April 3rd.—Snow about six inches deep.

1774. May 3rd.—Snow—some remaining until next day.

1799. May 6th.—Ice this morning.

1802. 1st mo. 1st.—A fine morning, with white frost.

21.—Fine and warm, uncommonly so for the season.

3rd.—Fine and warm.

16th.—Fine as can be; very warm, no occasion for fire in the stove, and for several days past uncommonly fine for the season.

27th.—Very fine and pleasant, and has been so most of the month.

1803. 5th mo. 7th.—I saw ice nearly quarter of an inch thick, and the ground was frozen.

8th.—Snow and rain about two inches,—said to be six inches in Bucks county.

9th and 10th.—A large white frost both days.

In a marginal note at the commencement of his diary, he says in 1804, May 8th, snow, said to be six inches deep in Bucks county. Is this? or that of 1803, the great snow that broke down the Lombardy Poplars of Philadelphia, and obstructed the streets, so as to render them almost impassable?

Two Bits of Antique Glass.

In Psalm lvi, we read, "Put thou my tears into thy bottle." The reference appears to be to a custom, which was common at a later period among the Greeks and Romans, of collecting tears in bottles provided for that purpose. Before me lie two such lachrymatories, which were exhumed by Gen. Di Cesnola in Cyprus.

Their shape is rather that of an antique vase than of a modern bottle, bulbous at the bottom and having quite a long, slender neck. The smaller one has been broken off at the top; the larger one remains nearly intact.

These fragile articles, buried in the tombs of an extinct people, have survived the rise and fall of many successive civilizations in Cyprus; for they are doubtless older than the New Testament, older than the Christian era. They bear marks of extreme age, but no indications of the exact period to which they belong. Di Cesnola assigns the glass objects of his collection to about 400 B. C. Twenty-three hundred years since they were fashioned! Four hundred years old when St. Paul visited Cyprus! Blown 2,000 years before the Venetians attained such renowned skill in glass manufacture! Once the receptacle of tears shed by mourners seventy generations ago! The finger of time has been slowly picking away at them, for they are partly disintegrated, and covered with iridescent scales. Originally transparent, they have at length become partly opaque through agencies that have been at work through all these centuries.

It was remarked that these "tear-bottles" give evidence of extreme age. This evidence is found in their covering of thin, iridescent scales, a condition peculiar to very ancient glass. The scales resemble mother-of-pearl, and are often of singular brilliancy. They are the product of the slow decomposition of glass, or the separation of its elementary components into concentric layers around numerous points. Sir David Brewster says of glass, "There is, perhaps, no material body that ceases to exist with so much grace and beauty when it surrenders itself to time."

Glass is a common symbol of fragility, but it is contrary to our conceptions to regard it as subject to decay. The rude "lens of rock crystal found by Lazard at Nivech is as sound as it was many thousand years ago when in the form of a crystal" but the glass taken from the same ruins has yielded to the disintegrating action of time. The lens is crystallized silica, and its similar particles are arranged in accordance with their molecular forces, and held together by the natural affinities, while the dissimilar particles of silica and alkali, usually composing glass, have been forced into artificial relations by fusion, and are held together by chance attractions. Hence the silica of the glass wholly resorts to its primitive connection with silica, leaving the alkali to shift for itself. According to Griffiths, the pearly stratum covering antique glass "consists almost wholly of silica."

In ancient glass the disintegration has begun at many points on the surface, and has proceeded inward, separating the glass into very thin layers of silica and the other dissociated constituents. Hence the colors displayed are not inherent, in the sense that they are in colored glass, but are known as the "colors of thin films" illustrated by the colors of a soap-bubble or of the thin oxide on the surface of metals. A sharp blow on ice will often cause these colors to start forth from some interior fracture with magical effect. They are produced by reflection from two surfaces very near together, in consequence of which the two reflected waves are said to "interfere." The interference results in the extinction of some of the elementary colors of white light, leaving the others to produce a compound color.—The Christian Advocate.

Education and Reading as a means to Mental and Spiritual Elevation of Mind.

The following extract is taken from the Journal of William Evans, penned in 1835, while he was attending the meetings and visiting families near the eastern limits of New York Yearly Meeting.

"The house of the kind and intelligent Friend where we were entertained (at Starksborough) was an agreeable lodging place for us; the influence of education and suitable reading, in expanding the mind, divesting it of many illiberal, contracted notions, was visible here. But in too many cases, we find Friends, of sufficient means, who have neglected the education of their children very much, or, after having given them small portions, do not provide them with suitable books to employ their leisure hours, in storing their minds with useful and instructive ideas. Labor for our subsistence, is unquestionably necessary; but we may slide into the habit of pursuing our worldly concerns with such avidity, as to lose all relish for mental improvement; and for those things which are invisible and eternal. When old age overtakes this description of people, they have few objects of thought and conversation, but the little round of worldly concerns, which have engrossed their time and attention for many years; but little interest in anything beyond their own affairs; and for want of having been engaged to lay up treasure in heaven, are often destitute of any ability to promote the welfare of religious society, and the advancement of the testimonies of Truth. Their example tends to lead those around them into the same worldly pursuits; and thus, instead of being the salt of the earth and lights in the world, they prove stumbling blocks to sincere enquirers after Truth, and blind guides to the youth of the Society. Such persons are objects of commiseration and regret. These are subjects that ought to call forth the energies of the Society; not only in a fervent concern for the religious welfare of the young people, but in adopting proper measures for their guarded school education; visiting them in their families, and endeavoring to elevate their minds by furnishing suitable libraries in the Preparative Meetings."

Transaction of Discipline.—I have found my business sometimes of late, to be more inward in travail, and less active in the exercise of the wholesome rules of Society, than I once was; and believe, when I have obeyed the call into this inward, still abode, and there felt my loins rightly girded, it has contributed much more to the right exercise of the discipline, than when, through a desire for its proper administration, I have, by overacting, seemed to do a good deal for its execution.—J. Scott.

K. A. Burnell reports in The Congregationalist, that, having been appealed to, as to the necessity of drinking wine when travelling abroad, in consequence of the bad character of the water, he gave this reply: "Thirty days in Japan, forty-two in China, one hundred and twelve in India, nine in Egypt, fifteen in Palestine, fifteen in Syria, four in Constantinople, four in Athens, sixty-five in Europe, thirty-five in England, ninety days at sea of twenty ships, afforded ample time to test the water, with no occasion to touch an intoxicant or taste tea or coffee. Occasionally we took a cup of nutritious cocoa, and always milk when obtainable."

Religious Items, &c.

Prayer Book.—The Evangelical portion of the Prayer Book of England appear to be gradually awakening to the doctrinal unsoundness of certain parts of their "Prayer Book." The Book, one of their journals published in England, says: "It is hopeless to maintain that the Reformation character of our Church will ever be complete until the compromising positions of it are honestly expunged, and our integrity no longer taxed to explain, on Evangelical principles, passages in our service which, to say the least, appear to favor sacerdotal, and therefore anti-Christian dogmas."

Crusades of Dissent from the Church of England.—At an English "Church Congress" held in London in the 10th month last, in which this subject was discussed, Canon Ryle said he believed that four fifths of the dissent of the present day had arisen from the fact that not finding the gospel in the pulpits of the Church of England, they had gone elsewhere for it, and also from the dreadful lives formerly led among the clergy, and from the harsh treatment of godly clergymen by their bishops. Of this there was a notable instance in the case of Daniel Rowlands, of Llangathco, whose license had been withdrawn by a predecessor of the chairman because he had preached the gospel in the open air.

Immoral Publications.—The Post Office authorities in Canada have prohibited the circulation through the mails of Police Gazette, believing that the details of crime contained in them are demoralizing to the public. They requested the United States Government to prevent such publications coming in the mail from this country designed for Canada. Post Master General Key has accordingly issued an order, directing that such papers directed to Canada should be regarded as unmailable matter and refused.

Hiring Ministers.—The Primitive Christian says, A hiring priesthood is the main source of the prostitution and debauchery of the public mind. It is a standing bid to corruption. The inevitable tendency is to prophesy smooth things.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 27, 1879.

The proposition which has been introduced into some of the Yearly Meetings on this continent to establish an "American Friends' Missionary Board" to be composed of committees appointed by the meetings which enter into the scheme, is one of such a grave character, that it may well awaken thoughtful consideration.

A conference of the committees appointed by several Yearly Meetings on this subject was held on the 10th and 11th of the 12th month at Indianapolis, at which a plan of organization was agreed upon and directed to be laid before the respective Yearly Meetings for their approval. This proposes that "The Board" shall consist of two members from each of the bodies who join in the Association. Its duties are thus defined.

"The Board shall procure information in regard to the various missionary fields, and exercise a general supervision over the work and workers under its care; shall receive and consider applications from persons who may desire to engage in the work, and recommend them to such fields for labor as may seem to be best, and under such regulations as it may determine. It shall recommend to the Missionary Committees of such Yearly Meetings as may have them, suitable fields for their labor, and suitable workers for those fields; it shall correspond with such committees upon general and particular needs of the work, and report to the Yearly Meetings, through their Committees, where they have such, all information that may be of interest to them, or may aid them in furthering the interests of the cause. It shall keep Friends generally advised, through the press, of the progress of the work, and make such application of the funds entrusted to its care as may seem best, either in the establishment of new missions, or in the assistance of those already established by individual Yearly Meetings."

It will be observed that the Missionary Board as here proposed, is expected to assume the duty, which the discipline of the Society of Friends has heretofore devolved upon its regularly organized meetings, of sitting in judgment on calls to religious service—as to those persons who desire to labor in fields under their care.

This duty is one of the most responsible and important that the Church has to perform. For there is a strength in the unity of the brethren, which he who goes forth weeping, bearing precious seed, often feels to be confirming and helpful amid the trials of faith and patience to which he is exposed, and it is also the case, that were it not for the prudent oversight which is thus exercised, some persons would engage in services for which they were not prepared; either making the preparatory baptisms for the call to enter into labor, or stimulated by an active impetuosity to undertake that which the Lord has not commanded.

When, under a sense of its responsibility, the Church is enabled to look up to its Holy Head for light and wisdom to guide it in these eighty matters, it has often experienced the spirit of judgment to descend upon those who sit in judgment. We believe it is altogether unsafe to entrust the decision of such questions to a Board constituted as has been proposed; and that the plan (if carried into effect) will not only be a step in the way of departure from the practices of our Society, but will open wide the door for the introduction of other things totally inconsistent with our fundamental principles.

The duties of the "Board" as set forth in the proposition of the Conference, evidently refer mainly to the establishment and support of "Missionary" enterprises similar to those carried on by other religious denominations. If the scheme is put into operation, we have but little hope that the labors of those sent out would be confined within the limits which our principles would fix. This has been the case already, as shown in the Madagascar mission, supported by some members of our Society in England.

Thus the Society of Friends would in measure become responsible for practices which a consistent member cannot adopt; and the effect on the body would be a weakened hold of those spiritual virtues of religion and worship which it is our special call to exhibit to the world.

We believe this project is one of the results of a spirit of change and of departure from the principles of Friends, which has been widely manifested in the past few years; and that if carried into effect, it will tend to lower the standard of gospel ministry among us, to destroy by degrees our testimony to a pure spiritual worship, and to assimilate our meetings to those of most other societies, where the attention of the people is largely turned to outward demonstrations, and but little opportunity is given for waiting on the Lord for the renewal of spiritual strength.

Whatever reasons may be adduced on general grounds for a union of different Yearly Meetings in religious undertakings, there is too much unsettlement in our borders at the present time to render it advisable to enter upon any such general arrangement.

It has been said in support of this proposed scheme, that an earnest concern to spread the Redeemer's kingdom among men animated the apostles and first disciples of Christ, and was conspicuously exhibited by George Fox and our early Friends; and that a similar duty devolves upon us of the present day. This we suppose all Friends will admit; and it is our own belief that the Church needs a more general and full awakening to a sense of the responsibilities which rest upon it; and that many of its members are greatly deficient in a submission to those baptisms—even into the likeness of Christ's death—which are a necessary preliminary to rising with Him in newness of life, and bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit. It is only by unreservedly yielding to the teaching, guidance and government of the Lord's Holy Spirit—that Grace of God which bringeth salvation and hath appeared unto all men—that a true and living zeal for the Lord's holy cause and for the eternal welfare of our fellow men can spring up and become fixed in our hearts. Where a deficiency of this zeal exists, we believe that it will not be remedied by a change of church machinery. The arrangements which already exist in our Society are sufficient to provide opportunities for the exercise of those gifts and callings which the Head of the Church bestows upon its faithful members.

Our own impressions on this subject are confirmed by the language of one who long experience and opportunities for observation give weight to his judgment. He says: "I am greatly concerned in reference to this Home and Foreign Mission business. It has a specious glare with it—and one of its effects will probably be to take the members and meetings off from a due consideration of their own state. The effect of it altogether will be to fix the standards of ministry and worship, and the qualifications for religious service of all kinds at a lower level—in fact practically upon the level common to other societies. The adoption of this scheme will, if I have any right apprehension, be a great obstacle in the way of any return to the true foundation from which the Society has been drifting for many years."

We have received a copy of the printed minutes of Iowa Yearly Meeting of the Smaller Body, which convened at Oskaloosa on the 26th of 9th Month last.

We observe that in addition to Bear Creek Quarterly Meeting, which at first was the only one to uphold this organization in its separate existence, representatives were present from Salem Quarterly Meeting.

Among the more important committees appointed, were one "to visit meetings, families and isolated individuals for their help and encouragement in the faithful maintenance of the principles and testimonies of the Society in its first rise;" and one "to endeavor by correspondence or otherwise, to become better acquainted with the doctrinal views, future prospects, &c." "of the various isolated portions of Society, that had become so in consequence of bearing testimony against the unsound doctrines and inconsistent practices which have been introduced of late years."

An epistle was received from the Smaller Body in Western Yearly Meeting, and replied to.

The following passage is extracted from the minute on the State of Society.

"Joshua, the successor of Moses in leading the people, was not to turn to the right hand, nor to the left; so we, who profess to be successors of early Friends, are to be a special people, separate from the world, and should not turn to the right hand nor to the left in maintaining the same doctrines, principles, testimonies and discipline; for it was by the divine spirit and power of the Lord that they were gathered to be a people to his praise, and the doctrines that were given to Fox, and ancient Friends with him to promulgate to the world, were given them immediately by the Head of the Church; as were also the testimonies they had to bear to the world; and the discipline emanated from the same source. There were no sufferings, persecutions, imprisonments, or spoiling of goods that could deter them from what they believed to be a divine requisition; and if we are under the influence of the same divine principle, it would bring us into the same conformity, for like causes produce like effects even in the outward."

The close of one year, the commencement of a new one, has, by general consent, been selected as a period for making that annual thorough examination which every prudent man feels to be desirable, into the condition of his property, the working of his business, and into all that affects his financial situation.

The importance of this inquiry is not sufficiently appreciated by some, and as a stimulus to such, we append a minute of Gracechurch-Street Monthly Meeting [London] of the 8th of 6th Month, 1785.

"This meeting taking into consideration the advice directed by the Yearly Meeting to Friends in general, 'to inspect the state of their affairs once in the year,' and being sensible of the propriety and importance thereof, do earnestly and tenderly advise and entreat our members individually, especially those in trade, to be careful in complying with this salutary advice, as it will, with the assistance of keeping just and clear accounts, and a care not to over-rate any part of their property, be not only the means of bringing more frequently to view, a general state of their outward concerns, but also of giving them a particular insight into their debts and credits, as well as profits and expenses; whereby they may be induced to avoid intrusting any persons, however specious their appearance in life, with sums disproportionate to the risk, which their own capital would reasonably warrant them to run. For want of this care we apprehend many well-meaning persons have incautiously, and almost insensibly, involved themselves in much difficulty and distress.

"The frequent inspection of affairs will also serve to show how far property is, from time to time, really increased, by which all ought to regulate their expenses, rather than by the precarious rule of a present advantageous trade. By this mistake many have missed their way; and when in the course of outward things, which are ever subject to change, some, finding their profits diminished, and, to save appearances, being unwilling to lessen their expenses, have failed in the payment of their just debts; to the great injury of their creditors, the ruin of themselves and families, and the disgrace of the profession of that principle which would, if followed, lead all into an humble dependence on the Divine Hand for every blessing, and into moderation and circumspection in all our concerns."

We have received a package of small tracts designed for children, put up in parcels of 12 different kinds, and for sale at the Book Store, 304 Arch Street. They contain simple narratives, which are easily understood, conveying valuable instruction in an attractive manner, and we think they will interest both young and old. We hope the Friends who prepared them will be encouraged, by the success of this venture, to continue their labors in the same direction. They are sold at 10 cents per package of 12 tracts.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The bonded debt of the city of Philadelphia on the 1st inst. was $94,121,943, of which $75,769,450 was 4 per cent. bonds, $91,593, 5 per cent. bonds, $9,450,592 taxed city 6's, and $11,122,100 un-taxed city 6's.

The Insane Line Steamship Company have tried the experiment of lighting one of their vessels with electricity, using four lights for the saloon, and two for the steerage. The passengers give a most enthusiastic endorsement of the new system of lighting—they say that reading, writing, and sewing were possible in every part of the room. The lights were four incandescent, and each had the power of 80 standard candles.

Congress adjourned on the 19th inst. until the 6th proximo.

The Secretary of the Treasury has informed the sergeant-at-arms of the House, that he can draw silver certificates, instead of silver, for twenty per cent. of the salaries of members, if he wishes. This measure will prove relieving, as silver dollars have been accumulating in his hands, owing to the unwillingness of Congress to receive them.

The result of the count made by the Governor and Council of Maine, shows that in the Senate the Fusionists are given 20 members, and the Republicans 11; in the House the Fusionists have 78 representatives, and the Republicans 71. The cities of Portland, Bath, Lewiston, Rockland and Saco, having 12 Republican representatives, are disfranchised.

During the four months ending on the 11th inst., the total amount of gold brought to the port of New York from Europe was $71,672,650, or an average of $513,826 for every day of the one hundred and twenty-one.

Petroleum and petroleum products have fallen in value so much during the last year, that although four million gallons more were exported in 10th month of this year, than during the same period of 1878, the value was nearly a million dollars less. The chief exports from ports other than New York and Philadelphia, do not amount to ten per cent. of the aggregate exports of the month (50,000,000 gallons), valued at $4,027,477.

It is reported from Pennsylvania, Va., that large numbers of emigrants from North Carolina, are passing through on their way to Indiana. They seem to know nothing of the climate and country to which they are going, and are ignorant of what their condition will be in their new homes.

The steamer Kohn recently sailed from Charleston, S. C., with 5515 barrels of cotton for Sebastopol. It was the largest cargo ever sent from that place.

The port statistics of San Francisco show that the arrivals of Chinese during the year were 6,128, and departures 8,746, of whom 6,229 went to China, and 2,517 to Honolulu.

A dispatch from Fairplay, reports the discovery of Uranium in the Sacramento mining district. This mineral is found in Bohemia, but never before has been discovered in this country as far as known. Uranium is worth $1,800 per ton.

The mortality of Philadelphia the past week numbered 261. Of this number 164 were adults, and 97 children—45 being under one year of age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 6's, 1881, registered, 104½; do., coupon, 107½; 5's, 103½; 4½'s, 1891, 106½; 4's, 1907, 104½.

Cotton.—Prices remained about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings at 12½ a 13½ cents per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white 8½ cts. for export, and 8¼ a 9 cts. per gallon for house use.

Flour is dull, but unchanged. Sales of 1200 barrels, including Minnesota extra at $6.75 a $7.12½; Penna. do., at $7 a $7.25; western do. at $7 a $7.50, and patent and other, high grades at $8 a $8.50. Eye flour, is steady at $5.00.

Corn is in demand and firmly held, with sales of 55,000 bushels, including rejected at $1.47; red at $1.54; amber, $1.54 a $1.55. Eye is unchanged.

Corn is in fair request and steady. Sales of 15,000 bushels, including old mixed and yellow at 62 a 63 cts. cts., and new do. at 57 a 59 cts. cts., tender and sold.

Beef cattle.—The market for the week was active, and prices were 1 a 2c. higher: 2730 head arrived and sold at 3 a 6 cts. per lb., as to quality. Sheep, 4 a 5½ cts. per lb., as to condition. Lambs, 4½ a 6½ cts. per lb. Hogs, 3½ a 6 cts. per lb.

WARRIORS.—The authorities of the War-office are considering the advisability of sending reinforcements to Afghanistan. A dispatch from General Roberts, dated on the 11th, says that he is strongly entrenched at Shirpur, and is able to hold his own. He states that the fact of his leaving Cabul, will probably have the effect of exciting the Afghans in their resistance.

The Duchess of Marlborough has written to the Lord Mayor of London, asking his aid to induce the wealthy citizens of London to contribute to the relief of the distressing condition of Ireland, and she expresses the desire to see the relief of the distressed private benevolence comes to the assistance of the sufferers. Sir Stafford Northcote says the Government will take measures for the relief of the distress, but while careful of the material prosperity of Ireland, would, above all, insist upon the maintenance of law and order, and just never coquette with any demand for home rule which the responsible men of all parties knew to be impossible.

The distress caused by the famine in Upper Sicily during the past month, has been intensified by typho fever. It is said measures have been taken to prevent any dangerous extension of the famine and disease. The Emperor and Empress, and other members of the royal family, have contributed generously toward relief of the distressed.

Intelligence from St. Petersburg represents that several officers of the artillery and engineers have been arrested, and with complicity in the recent nihil attempt on the Czar's life at Moscow. The Wind Palace is now illuminated all night with the electric light, as a precaution. It has been decided to grant the municipal governments in all the chief cities of Poland, the privilege of using the Polish language in the sittings of their councils after the first of the month.

It is reported from Madrid that the Cuban estimates present a deficit of $8,000,000, besides the loss by a recent rebellion, which amounts to $800,000 monthly. The average daily evaporation of water in the B. C. water thus lifted up, says a meteorologist, is enormous and the heat absorbed in its conversion into vapor estimated to be equal to the continual working power of 800,000 steam engines of 1000 horse power.

Testimonies of Earlier and Later Date.

The following are some predictions and testimonies of the wise and good, of ancient and of more recent periods, concerning the present and future—the vitality and permanency of the religious Society of Friends. While they speak of trials and tribulations, of uprisings and overturnings, of clouds and darkness and tempest, they simultaneously point to a better and more propitious day of sun-gate beyond them. It is well to keep this in few amid a flood-tide of discouragements, and to remember that all things are possible to Him with whom we have to do; that He can make a way where there seems to be none; that his covenant is with the night equally with the day; that his grace is sufficient for us; and that it "is He, the God of Israel, that giveth strength and power unto is people." Blessed are they who alike in calm or in storm, put their whole trust in Him.

Francis Howgill, in 1662, delivered, in the name of the Lord, the following testimony: "The sun shall leave its shining brightness, and cease to give light to the world; and the moon shall be altogether darkness, and give no light unto the night; the stars shall cease to know their office or place; my covenant with day, night, times, and seasons, shall sooner come to an end, than the covenant I have made with this people, into which they are entered with me, shall end, or be broken. Yea, though the powers of darkness and hell combine against them, and the jaws of death open its mouth, yet will I deliver them, and lead them through all. I will offend their enemies as I did in Jacob, and scatter them as I did in Israel in the days of old. I will take their enemies; I will hurl them hither and thither, as stones hurled in a sling; and be memorial of this nation, which is holy unto me, shall never be rooted out, but shall live through ages, as a clond of witnesses, in generations to come. I have brought them to the birth, yea, I have brought them forth; I have swaddled them, and they are mine. I will nourish them and carry them, as on eagles' wings; and though clouds gather against them, I will make my way through them; though darkness gather together on a heap, and tempests gender, I will scatter them as with an east wind; and nations shall know they are my inheritance, and they shall know I am the living God, who will plead their cause with all that rise up in opposition against them."

A prophetic declaration of Mary Piesley, in 1755:—"Notwithstanding a night of apostasy has come over us as a people (as day and night naturally succeed one another in their season, and God keeps his covenant with both,) yet am I of the judgment, that that day has begun to dawn, in which the Sun of Righteousness will rise higher and higher, and with greater lustre than heretofore. But if those who are called of God to be the sons of his morning, look back to the night, and to those who have slept and been drunken in the night, (by sipping of the golden cup of abominations,) or even to the latter day,—they will frustrate the designs of Providence respecting themselves, though not respecting his own work. For it is his sacred determination to be glorious in heaven and glorified on earth, though these who would be called His Israel be not gathered. And I am of the faith, that where the gospel has first been preached to them, as it is meet it should, such as neglect to embrace it, thereby rendering themselves unworthy of so great salvation, will be left, and the feet of the messengers turned another way, even to the highways and hedges, with a power of compulsive love, which will prevail on the halt, the maimed, and the blind, to come to the marriage of the King's Son; and by coming they shall be made strong, beautiful, and lovely, as a bride adorned for her heavenly husband, who shall not look back to those things that are behind, but press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus,—following no man's example further than they follow Him. And what if I say in the faith that is given me, that God has designed to carry some of this generation, in these parts of the world, higher and further in righteousness than their forefathers were carried, even such as were honorable in their day, and are fallen asleep in Christ. Therefore let them take heed that they limit not the Holy One of Israel, nor circumscribe the leadings of his blessed merrying Spirit, by looking too much at the example of others; for this has been a means of stopping the gradual progression of many glorious, well-begun reformatations. Instead of going forward, they have looked back, and even sunk below the standard of the first reformers. Such as will be the happy instruments to labor for a reformation in this degenerate age, must differ in their trials from the sons of the former morning, and will find them to be of a more severe and piercing kind: their's were from the world, and such as they might justly expect therefrom,—not exempt from false brethren; ours will chiefly arise from those under the same profession, clothed with the disguised spirit of the world, and that amongst some of the foremost rank (so called) in Society; and what if I say, (though my natural eyes may not see it,) that God will divide in Jacob and scatter in Israel before that reformation which has been brought about, in his Church."

A testimony of Stephen Grellet, recorded in 1805:—"I have been very sensible, during these weeks past, that the low state in which I find our Society, meeting after meeting, is owing to their having departed from that retiredness of spirit, and lowliness of mind, which characterized our former Friends, and the primitive Christians. They have retained indeed, to a certain degree, the outward profession, but few continue in the life. What families, to train them up in the Christian profession; nevertheless the Lord has a precious remnant preserved in almost every place, to whom I feel nearly united. Through many baptisms, He has brought them and preserved them, and I have faith to believe that, though this people may be chastened, to purify them, they will not be forsaken; and from among the children, yea, from generations yet unborn, will arise such as will magnify the name of the Lord their Redeemer."

S. G. again wrote, in 1811, while in England:—"As I pass through the country, my mind is frequently brought under solemn contemplation, whilst beholding the abodes of some of our primitive Friends, valiant for the truth and testimony of Jesus; and the places also where many of them suffered greatly for their faithfulness in the support of their Christian principles. Many of their descendants, both in America and this land, now trample under foot, or set at naught these principles that were so dear to their ancestors. Riches and grandeur have brought dimness over many; yet there is here a precious seed, and my soul magnifies the Lord, in that I am permitted to visit it, and to suffer with it."

A prophetic testimony of Ann Jones, bearing date 1833:—"It seems to me that both you and we must suffer more than we have done, before we shall so humble ourselves before the Lord (as a people) as to know Him to arise and plead his own cause, eminently and gloriously. That He will do it, I can have no doubt, for my faith is unshaken that He will reserve and preserve to himself a living people, professing the ancient faith of the gospel as held by our primitive Friends, though scattering and desolation may come upon many. I believe the promise formerly made will be fulfilled, respecting this people: 'I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord.'"

Again writes the same in 1842:—"So far am I from believing that these things will lay waste the precious testimonies and standard of Truth, that I believe, however some who have seemed to be something may fall away, the eyes and spiritual understanding of others will be opened to see further and more clearly into the mystery of iniquity that now worketh, and also in due time into the mystery of true godliness—the spirituality of the gospel dispensation.”

Again, in 1843, she testifies:—“As a people we are too much in affinity with the world, loving and courting its favor and friendship, unwilling to be baptized into death, that so we may be raised from spiritual death by the power of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life, having the spiritual senses and faculties exercised by reason of use to discern both good and evil. Thus many of our churches stand in stations and standing in Society ought to be way-marks to others, are themselves partially blind, unwilling to see, and afraid to risk their reputation among men; so they ‘err in vision and stumble in judgment.’ But blessed be the name of Israel’s Rock, we have still some clear-sighted ones remaining or raised up, to stand for the Truth in innocent boldness.”

And again in 1846, about three months before her death, A. J. thus conveys:—“I do not believe that the missions of the faithful are in vain, as regards our poor, benighted Society, and certainly not as regards themselves in the Divine sight. Notwithstanding the determination on the part of those who at present bear rule in many of the Yearly Meetings, to cry ‘peace’ to keep all quiet and preserve the ‘harmony,’ he who brought this vine out of Egypt and Babylon, spiritually, still hath regard to the living plant of his own right-hand planting, and will no doubt succor, defend, and preserve the stock alive in the root, though it may be for a time apparently trodden down by the wild boar of the forest.”

“Ah! what a degenerate, backsliding, worldly-minded, worldly-blinded people we must have become, before the ancient Truth and testimonies given us to bear could be thus slighted, and turned from, and a counterfeit, plausible and specious enough in its outside appearance, substituted for the real thing. What is it, short of putting darkness for light, and light for darkness—thus to forsake the ancient standard, and substitute one in its stead that has not the Lord’s stamp upon it. Sorrowful indeed is the reflection, that our Yearly Meeting, the first that was gathered, should be, (or its present leaders and rulers,) among the foremost to encourage that which has not its origin, its foundation, in the ever-blessed and unchangeable Truth; and yet, like other apostate churches, be willing to lay claim to the appellation of ‘mother church.’ Alas! for the day. Well may the mourners in Zion cry, ‘Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach.’ Great are the efforts that are making with the busy, worldly-wise ones, to bind up, and heal, and cry ‘peace.’ They may be permitted for wise purposes, unseen, unknown to me, to prevail for a time, and the oppressed little ones, who have no strength of their own, may have to cry, ‘Oh, Lord, how long?’ but when He sees need to take unto him his great power, and show himself strong for his oppressed people, this dauting with untempered mortar, and crying ‘peace,’ where there is no peace, will be seen to have been healing the hurt of the daughter of Zion slightly, deceitfully.”

Lastly of this eminent handmaiden of her Lord, it is recorded, “that she was preserved clear and bright to the last, and the last words she was heard to utter were, (only twenty minutes before the close.) ‘Bring the chalcidony and the precious stones.’ She testified to several Friends who went to see her during the last ten days, her unshaken belief in, and cleaving to our ancient gospel principles and testimonies, and said that if ever she had done anything that was right in her life, it had been to uphold them; and to expose that which would mar them; that, nevertheless, she had nothing to boast of; and was sensible she was a very unprofitable servant, and had fallen very short of what she ought to have been, but her whole trust and confidence was in the love and mercy of God in Christ Jesus.”

Wild cattle, which have become naturalized in many parts of South America, were occasionally met with. “In passing Warararararu ponds, we stopped for a short time to replenish our laeder with ducks, and whilst there observed thirty wild cattle feeding at a distance. When we got some three hundred yards to leeward of them they observed us, and moved about uneasily. We then shouted to attract their attention, which it did, for they all started at a run towards us, keeping close together, and wheeling into line came to a stand within about one hundred yards of us. Knowing that tame cattle are sometimes fierce when at large, we argued that wild cattle ought to be very much fiercer. We therefore deemed it prudent to tree at once, and, selecting the largest tree about, swung ourselves gracefully, but swiftly, into its branches. The herd, not seeming inclined to advance nearer, worked more to leeward to scent us. They were full grown, well-conditioned animals, of uniform blackish-brown or light red colors. More than half of the lot were bulls, which tore up the ground with their fore hoofs in anything but a playful manner. I descended from my perch to get a nearer look at them, when a gust of wind bore down our sent to them, and in one instant they wheeled about in the greatest terror, making off at a pace that a savanna deer might envy. We could see more than a mile in the direction in which they went, to where a swell of land hid the country beyond, and this distance they cleared in an amazingly short space of time.”

Among the vegetable curiosities of the country is the Water-with, to which reference is thus made:

“Not finding water on the mountain, we had to resort to that method of quenching thirst which is oftener spoken of than accomplished. I refer to the custom of procuring water from a vine called the Water-with. My men sought for and found a number of these vines, which had wound themselves round the stems of large trees. Cutting them off as high as they could reach, they severed them quickly lower down, obtaining portions of stems some five feet in length, and from three to six inches in diameter. Holding these vertically, the sap, which appeared to be nothing but pure, clear, cold water, ran quickly out, and was caught in a cup and drunk. From one length of the largest size we obtained at least a pint of water.”

Upon the borders of the New River and main Corentyne, we met with large groves of Brazil-nut trees, and on the ground beneath them obtained numbers of their nuts. I was fortunate enough to find some of the nut-cases containing nuts that had commenced to germinate, each nut sending out long roots from one end and young plants from the other. The roots were all twisted and matted together, quite filling up the cavities in the case around the nuts; yet the nut case was hard, and showed no signs of decay, so that it is difficult to say how the young plants live themselves. There is a small aperture where the fruit-stalk was once attached, but in one instance did I find a case in which one of the young plants had found its way out, through this and sent forth leaves. It seems to me that when this happens, one plant also survives of the twelve or fifteen that commenced to grow, and that its matted roots gradually filling the nut case eventually burst it, when the plant is free to take root in the earth. The strong cover of the growing nut is a necessary protection to the young plant, for without such it would be devoured by one of the host of animals that are ready to eat it.

I planted some of the sprouting nuts, out of their hard outer covering, on my way up river, but on returning found that they had all been dug up and eaten by rats or other small vermin. I therefore had a lot planted in a box at our camp above King Frederic William IV. fall, on my first return to that spot, and placed on the stem of a small tree cut off some five feet from the ground. In this position they were free from the attack of small animals, and being covered with shelter of small palm leaves, thrived wonderfully. These plants were subsequently sent to Kew, where they arrived in a fine health condition.

We found many nut-cases with holes eaten by them by acouries, the marks of the gnawing teeth of those animals being plainly shown. My men used to open them by chopping off their ends with a cutlass, which, owing to their hardness, was no easy operation. The quatas, or large black spider monkeys, open a good deal of their time in trying to open them by beating them against the branches of trees, or on hard logs upon the ground, and as we passed a grove of Brazil-nut trees it was amusing to hear the hammering sound, produced by these fellows at their self-imposed tasks. Where a single monkey was thus employed the blows were most laughably ‘few and far between,’ and the creature showed its true indolent character by the slow way in which it performed its work, resting for a few minutes between every blow. It also showed an amount of perseverance, however that one would not look for in a monkey, and a knowledge that it would eventually reap a reward for its hard labor.

On one occasion, during our journey from the New River to the Upper Essequibo, we got quiet amongst a lot of the nut breakers, and secured a nut-case which one in its hurry had left upon a log, and which was worn smooth by the friction of the monkey’s hands. This had evidently been pounded for a length of time, but showed no signs of cracking. Its natural aperture was large enough to allow the monkey’s finger to touch the ends of the nuts inside, which were picked and worn by its nails. Near the same place we saw a nut-case split in two, on the flat surface of a large granite rock, that had evidently been broken by a monkey, for there were no Brazil-nut trees, from which it could have fallen, overhanging the spot."

Among the notices of the insect tribes which are recorded by C. B. Brown, there is a curious instance of that attraction which sometimes brings into close proximity animals of very different character and organization. He says:

"The long and barrel-like nests of a wasp, called the boraserie, were frequently seen suspended from the branches of trees. As a rule, their form was that of a long truncated cone of about eighteen inches in diameter and three feet in length. Portions of the sides of these nests were covered with wasps, probably young ones sunning themselves. It was impossible to get near enough to one to get a good look at it, for its inhabitants did not belie their name, but were very waspish. The wasps were of a dark color, with brown abdomens, and stung [severely], as I found to my cost when examining some rocks one day, under a tree in which a nest was suspended at least fifty feet up.

There was always a large spindle-shaped ant's nest attached to a branch close to these wasps' nests. The ants inhabiting them are probably the small amber-colored kind so frequently met with, which when touched emit such a disagreeable resinous smell.

What feelings do the two kinds of insects can have in common, that they should live together in harmony, it is hard to understand, unless it be that they mutually protect each other.

This social group requires the mention of a third party to make it complete, and this is no other than the yellow-backed mocking bird (Cassius persicus.) Around and almost touching the habitation of the wasps are the long hanging nests of these birds, in and out of which, during the breeding season, their owners go with impunity. The wasps, by their presence, no doubt, protect the young and eggs of the bird from the attacks of monkeys, but of what service the bird is to the insect is not so easily understood. It seems strange that the wasps should tolerate the presence of such busy, noisy, chattering neighbors."

"At one place on the Aramatua when watching great columns of yackaman ants hunting, accompanied as usual by numbers of little birds, I observed that the latter did not touch a single ant, but had splendid feeding on the insects that flew up from the ground as their foes advanced, which they caught on the wings, as they alighted on the ants' limbs. These birds were small, and of four or five different kinds. They kept hopping from twig to twig over the advancing ant columns, chirping and singing merrily.

As the ants marched along it was amusing to see the grasshoppers, crickets, small cockroaches, &c., scuttling along in a most agitated state, evidently fully aware of the approach of the ants, a yard or so behind them. They bolted out from under the dead leaves in numbers, and in many instances seemed too frightened to look whither they were going. Thus they frequently hopped the wrong way and fell into the middle of the column of their enemies. What the ants did not get the birds secured, so between them they cleared out their victims over a large area.

The main column of this lot, composed of closely-packed ants, was two feet in width and of unknown length."

What the Church Needs.

One of the correspondents of The British Friend in the number for the 12th month, after speaking of certain tests by which to judge the true state of a meeting, says:

"When a church is felt to be weak and languid a crowd of reformers arise proposing as many remedies for the condition deplored. We need enthusiasm, will some say; we need zeal, others; or, again, young workers, committees, a change of organization, better meetings for discipline, advances on the part of the elders, &c., &c. Loss of some things and more of others that we allow are suggested in confusion—some of the ideas being worthy of attention, but none adapted to remedy the evil. They are most of them far too trivial in comparison to all meet the needs of the case. Thus, I once heard seriously proposed as the real cure for a long-standing and disappointing lack of interest in certain meetings that the room should be filled with chairs instead of forms!

"Among others than Friends, and far too often among those called Friends also, the 'remedies' take a still wider range. Eager to learn the causa mali tanti, and see their churches flourish as they did at their rise, and as all churches always should, they seek the reason for their decline on human principles, by the efforts of analogy and of reason, instead of humbling themselves before God in repentance and beseeching Him to show them what is grieving his Spirit, what is the accursed thing that is causing Him to hide his face, and to endow them with his mighty power."

"The real desideratum of all churches in an unhealthy and feeble state (though this may be disguised and thought to be remedied in some by unnatural i. e., not Divinely-inspired excitement) is the Holy Spirit. Though few will believe it, this is what they need. If they need any one thing as churches, it is the one thing needful—Christ Himself by the fulness and in the power of the Spirit. They feel the lack of power, and of love, and of a sound mind, and thus evince that they need the baptism of the Spirit. They want a Pentecost; but have not the simple, obedient, humble faith to seek and await it at God's hand. It would be taking a position of great dependence, and acknowledging all their good efforts to be vain, to consent to this, and until every possible suggestion has been tried they will not agree.

"A body of Christians—though, as Chrysostom says, but two in number—if they have the Spirit of Him for and in whom all religions concerns exist, are a Church. A body of professors, whatever called and however numerous, are not one if wanting the Spirit of Him who is the Head over all things to the Church. It is God who constitutes a Church, not man. That is to say, the presence and (implied) approval of his Spirit makes us a company, not less than as individuals, his people; not any compliance with, or adoption of, discipline or creed. There are large bodies, doubtless, in the world who have ceased to be, if they ever were, Churches of God—his holy nation and peculiar people on the earth; and there are little bands in parlors and upper rooms, sick chambers and barns, who are true Churches, entire though small. From all which let us learn the solemn lesson that we do not necessarily merit the name and blessed allotment of a Church of Christ because we were once such. Our light must continue to burn, and Christ must continue by his Spirit to preside and govern, as the soul must continue to look to and abide in Him, or we shall not be of Him, and shall, with all our lukewarm desires, efforts, and resolves, have but a 'name to live.' Israel did not remain God's (accepted) people after they had rejected Him in his messengers and in his Son. When a certain amount of wickedness and inconsistency had been allowed—and after a long-suffering God could not overlook persistent depravity—the solemn warnings, more instructive for all professing to be God's people to weigh, went forth:—I am weary to bear [your religious acts] * * * yea, when I make many prayers I will not hear * * * it is iniquity, even the solemn meeting."

"The need being then the baptism of the Spirit, no lesser remedy will do—the most promising endeavors will fail until it is sought and won. If we bear this in mind, we shall not be stumbled or discouraged at seeing these repeatedly fail, and shall be able to offer right advice. We have enough mechanism—it is beautifully, sadly—complete, and only need the power to work it. This is all the churches need; but it includes all. The Holy Ghost is comparatively but little honored in this, his own dispensation."

The above extracts are commended to a writer in The Christian Worker who thinks "that what is most needed to build up the meeting," in the city where he resides, is "an active, earnest woman ministry—one or more" who shall be engaged not only in speaking, but in "visiting families, prisons, and the poor as well as the rich, taking part in all active work for reform in every direction." A True Incident.—When the Boston train came steaming into the depot the crowds rushed for seats.

As a band of recruits mounted the platform, they shonted back to their friends who had accompanied them to the train, the various slang phrases they could command, interspersed with an oath now and then. As the train moved off they pushed each other into the car, where many ladies were seated, including a Mrs. B. and her two boys.

Then the oaths came out thick and fast, each one evidently trying to outdo the others in profanity. Mrs. B. shuddered for herself and for her boys, for she could not bear to have their young minds contaminated by such language.

If the train had not been so crowded she would have looked for seats elsewhere, but under the circumstances she was compelled to remain where she was.

Finally, after this coarse jesting had continued for nearly an hour, a little girl, who with her mother sat in front of the party, stepped out timidly from her seat, and going up to the ringleader of the group, a young man whose countenance indicated considerable intelligence, she presented him with a small Bible.

She was a little, delicate-looking creature, only seven or eight years old, and as she laid the book in his hand she raised her soft eyes appealingly to his, but without saying a word went back to her seat.

The party could not have been more completely hushed if an angel had silenced them. Not another oath was heard, and scarcely a word was spoken by any of them during the remainder of the journey.

The young man who had received the book seemed particularly impressed. He got out of the car at the next station and purchased a paper of candy for his little friend, which he presented to her. He then stooped down and kissed her, and said that he should always keep the little Bible for her sake.

The little girl's mother afterwards told Mrs. U. that her child had been so troubled by the wickedness of those young men, that she could not rest until she had given her little Bible which she valued so highly herself.

Every one who witnessed it seemed to be affected by the little incident, which perhaps by the blessing of God, may have led to the conversion of at least one soul.

"A little child shall lead them."

Tender Pleading Against Indulging in Worldly Amusements.

Providence, 7th of 11th mo. 1781.

My young friend,—My view in writing is to inform thee, that in the conversation I had with thee on the subject of thy going to dancing school, I aimed at nothing but thy good, and to discharge my duty to thee in the sight of God, as to one whose welfare I desired, and thought I ought to endeavor to promote.

Think not hard of me, my friend; for the Lord knows I had no hardness in my heart toward thee, but sought thy good. I would not have thee shut thy heart against the gentle movings of that holy principle in thy own mind, which manifests what is right and what is wrong, and which justifies for doing the one, and reproves for the other; but stand open to its teachings and influence. And as thou findest this light to produce uneasiness in thee for dancing, and such like diversions, and mispent time, oh! yield to its operation; that so, by believing in the light, thou may become a child of the light, and of the everlasting day of God's salvation.

I can tell thee, it was no small cross to me to deny myself the gratification of dancing, and some other vain amusements of like nature. But when I did give them up, oh! the peace which flowed in my soul, as I travelled on in the way of self-denial! It was like the flowings of a gentle stream of joy unspeakable and full of glory. And the wish I have for thee, dear child, is that thou may witness in the secret of thy own soul, the flowings of the same celestial joy and consolation; which, if ever thou dost witness, thou wilt find it is in the way of the cross to thy natural inclinations; for the cross of Christ is the alone way to the crown of glory.

I know what I write, and therein have the sanction of the word of truth in my own experience, and also in the Scriptures. I am not speaking against dancing only. I wish thy redemption from all things that are contrary to the law of God, and his meriting witness in thy soul. And I am the more encouraged to this communication of counsel, from a belief I had, whilst thou wast with me, that thy heart was far from that state of hardness and insensibility, which I have discovered in some of thy age. I thought I perceived something tender in thee, that gave me to hope thou might come to know the Lord for thyself, and to thy own comfort, if nothing was suffered to divert thy mind from a due attention to that Grace of God which brings salvation, and which has appeared to thee, and will, if thou hearkenst to it, teach thee to deny all ungodliness, and to live soberly and godly in thy day and generation. With desires that this may be thy happy experience, and that thou mayest receive these few lines as a token of unfeigned good-will, I bid thee farewell, and am thy friend,

JOB SCOTT.

The following lines were written by the late Joseph Kite, and published in "The Friend" thirty-seven years ago. The advice they contain may be useful to some of the present generation.

To

ON THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR 1843.

Come from thy cash and book accounts,

Debts and credits come;

Count not thy eoffer's loved amounts,

By thrift so dearly won,—

Time—the stage-driver—is at hand

To bear thee to an unknown land!

Come, and look o'er the map, 'twill show

How perilous thy way;

There is no time to tarry now,

Far spent with thee is day;

The evening shades are closing fast,

The vigor of thy life is past!

Come and recruit thy weary strength,

Ah, do not, dare not, wait;

The moment will arrive at length,—

May it not find thee late,—

When the shell's blast blown at thy door

Will tell all preparator's o'er.

Come, come!—here is the closing year;

A few short days,—and that's all;

An endless one will swift appear,

To all the sons of men;

Then, in the Resurrection-book,

How will our final balance look?

Speed for thy journey!—have thy wealth

Thy silver, jewels, gold,—

Secure beyond the robber's stealth,

In bags that was not old;—

Deposit riches in the skies,—

The heart is where the treasure lies!

Close thy old books—and open now

A journal to be read,

When an assembled world shall bow,

And hear the sentence said,

"Well done!"—oh list the rapturous flow!

"Depart ye!"—hark! the wail of woe!

With the new year may we begin,

A new-born life to lead,

Leave all the histories ways of sin,

And in that path proceed,

That leads to Zion's holy hill,

Whence rapturous notes the ransomed thrill.

N. L., Twelfth mo. 1843.

Selected.

"Cast thy burden upon the Lord and He shall sustain thee."—Psalm lv. 22.

Has't thou a care whose pressure dread

Expects sweet slumber from thy bed?

To thy Redeemer take that care

And change anxiety to prayer.

Has't thou a hope which thy heart

Would almost feel it death to part?

Entreat thy God that hope to crown,

Or give thee strength to lay it down.

Has't thou a friend whose image dear

May prove an idol worshipp'd here?

Implore the Lord that might may be

A shadow between Heaven and thee.

What'er the cure that breaks thy rest,

Whate'er the wish which swells thy breast,

Spread before God that wish, that care,

And change anxiety to prayer.

SOMEBODY'S MOTHER.

The woman was old, and ragged, and gray,
And bent with the chill of the winter's day;
The street was wet with the winter's snow,
And the woman's feet were aged and slow.

She stood at a crossing and waited long,
Alone, uncared for, amid the throng
Of human beings that passed her by,
Nor heeded the glance of her anxious eye.

Down the street with a laugh and a shout,
Glad in the freedom of "school let out,"
Came the boys like a flock of sheep,
Hailing the snow piled white and deep.

Past the old woman, so old and gray,
Hastened the children on their way;
Nor offered a helping hand to her,
So meek, so simple, afraid to stir,

Lest the carriage wheels, or the horses' feet,
Should crowd her down in the slippery street.
At last came one of the merry troops,
The gayest laddie of the group.

He paused beside her, and whispered low,
"I'll help you across, if you want to go."
Her aged hand on his strong young arm
She placed, and so, without hurt or harm,

He guided the trembling feet along,
Proud that his own were firm and strong;
Then back again to his friends he went,
His young heart happy and well content.

"She's somebody's mother, boys, you know,
For all she is aged, and poor, and slow;
And I hope some fellow will lend a hand
To help my mother, you understand,
If ever she is poor, and old, and gray,
When her own dear boy is far away."

And "Somebody's Mother" bowed low her head,
In her home that night, and the prayer she said
Was, "God, be kind to the noble boy,
Who is somebody's son, and pride and joy."

Exaggerations.—One morning, as we sat at our breakfast table, the conversation turned on strict truthfulness of statement, and as the discussion grew more and more lively it was finally proposed by one member of the family that we should all pledge ourselves to the sternest veracity of speech for that day, and see what would come of it. The motion was seconded and carried unanimously, and, as first fruit of the resolve, we asked the one who had suggested it, "What made you so late at breakfast this morning?"

She hesitated, began with "Because couldn't"—and then, true to her compact, said "The truth is, I was lazy and didn't hurry or I might have been down long ago." Presently another one remarked that she had been very cold, adding, "I never was so cold in my life." An inquiring look caused the last-speaker to modify this statement instantly with "Oh, I don't mean that, of course; I've been much colder many times, and I don't think it was so cold, after all."

A third remark, to the effect that "Miss So-and so was the homeliest girl in the city," was recalled as soon as made, the speaker being compelled to own that Miss So-and-so was rather plain, instead of excessively homely.

So it went on throughout the day, causing much merriment, which was good-naturedly accepted by the subjects, and giving rise to constant corrections in the interest of truth. One thing became more and more surprising, however, to each of us, and that was the amount of cutting down which our careless statements demanded under this new rule. More and more we realized the unconscious exaggeration of our daily speech, and the distance between it and truth, and each one acknowledge at the close of the day that the lesson had been salutary as well as startling.

Such a day may be of service in more ways than one, since it enforces good humor as well as strict truthfulness.—Intelligence.

For "The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

1865. 1st mo. 29th. I think we were favored with a good meeting, and have not enjoyed one more for a long time. It has afforded encouragement. Since returning from the Indian Reservation I have experienced at times much weakness, almost to discouragement. There is none but One, can help me, who knoweth all our weakness, and what is best for us.

3rd mo. 7th. I attended Salisbury Monthly Meeting. I trust I may say I was favored to have my mind gathered inward to the Great Head of the Church. Oh that I may be preserved from a desire to get honor of man, and from spiritual pride, and experience more of that state comparable to the clay in the hands of the potter. I trust I felt for the welfare of the meeting and its individual members.

3rd mo. 8th. Attended our own Monthly Meeting. Samuel Cope and Isaac Phillips were absent on account of bodily indisposition. As instrumental helpers and burden-bearers they were missed. I think I was some comforted with Divine Help, and it was a pretty comfortable meeting.

3rd mo. 9th. Under some discouragement I attended Uchlan Monthly Meeting. I was mercifully favored to have my mind, in some degree I trust, gathered inward, the first meeting pretty comfortable. I fear my want of faithfulness has caused great weakness.

3rd mo. 26th. I thought our meeting to-day was a favored one—a solemn silence seemed to spread over it. When thus assembled may we be livingly concerned to attend to what we profess to come for, that our time and talents may be rightly employed. I think I may say I enjoyed the meeting. May the blessings of the Great Head of the Church be upon our Society and this country; may peace be again restored and feelings of love to the Great Head of the Church and love to each other be the clothing of our spirits, and may the North and the South be united in Him, the True and Living Vine, and become fruit-bearing branches to the praise of his great and excellent name. Oh the precious feeling of Christian love."

In the spring of 1865, a nephew was fatally injured by the upsetting of a wagon, in reference to which he makes the following remarks under date of 3rd mo. 28th: "It was a bustling time, the family felt a great deal of anxiety. I felt much on his account; may it be a warning and prove a blessing to all the family, myself and many others. The night before the accident happened, I dreamed I was near when it took place, and felt as if I had neglected something I ought to have done. The evening after the accident I felt as if I ought to talk to him (the nephew) which I did, fearing to neglect it. He talked very comfortably to the family the next morning; sent for some of his cousins and myself to bid us farewell; expressed a hope to meet us in Heaven if we lived as we ought in this world. It was an affecting time, which I hope will not soon be forgotten. Oh the necessity of building on the right foundation, that we may have a safe resting place in the time of trouble; in the time of sore trial when no earthly power can support or preserve us, we feel the need of it. In unmerited mercy I have not been forsaken in the time of trouble. May I remember my former covenants.

4th mo. 14th. Attended the Meeting for Sufferings. The committee to assist our members that may be drafted made an interesting report. The draft was said to be stopped, which was grateful to my feelings and cheering to most persons.

15th. Attended the meeting of ministers and elders. It was a pretty comfortable meeting. The death of the President was reported this morning. Sorrowful news.

7th mo. 17th. I have felt some warnings to be prepared for the solemn change, and hope I may say have experienced help from Him who alone can help his people. Had a very comfortable meeting yesterday, which I desire may be remembered to the praise of my Divine Master, and if spared, my time and talents be more given up to serve Him; He is worthy to be loved and served by all.

23rd. This morning was well and I trust, the breakfast table. felt unwell and I trust, the uncertainty of time. Went to meeting somewhat humbled, and I trust in measure desirous to discharge my duty to my Divine Master; was mercifully favored and comforted. May I be more humble, watchful and grateful for his long suffering and unmerited favors to me a poor sinner.

8th mo. 6th. Was blessed with a solemn comfortable meeting held in silence. I doubt not some felt that the Great Head of the Church ministered to them; several in attendance who were not members.

9th mo. 14th. Attended Arch St. Meeting for worship—I enjoyed it much. The meeting of the Indian Committee in the afternoon was an interesting one; may we seek a qualification to discharge the service required of us toward these poor people, that the Great Head of the Church may be honored thereby. Oh that they may be brought near to Him; numbered amongst his people, and be as fruit-bearing branches to the praise of his great and excellent name.

9th mo. 15th. Attended Meeting for Sufferings; we were favored to get along with the business in harmony.

10th mo. 19th. I have reason in humility and thankfulness to record the unmerited mercy of my Divine Master that He has not cast me off, but that in great mercy He continues to enable me to feel of his good presence, which is an unspeakable favor. May I be more given up to serve Him in all that He may be pleased to require of me, that the praise may be to his great and excellent name who is forever worthy. I think I have been favored within the last month with many evidences of Divine regard, and have had some pretty close trials, which I have reason to look upon as blessings; may I be sufficiently thankful for his many unmerited favors, and be more fruitful of good.

10th mo. 22d. This has been a day of favor to me a poor sinner. I was at times somewhat tried in meeting with a drowsy feeling, but labored to strive against it, and I trust was in a degree favored with a qualification for prayer. Oh! the danger of lukewarmness.

Indian Affairs.

The Report of the Secretary of the Interior on Indian affairs contains the following paragraphs:

"Whatever troubles and perplexities the presence of the Indians among us may cause, every man who loves justice and who values the honor of the American name will admit that it is our solemn duty to leave nothing untried to prepare a better fate than extermination, and a better rule than that of brute force for the original occupants of the soil upon which so many millions of our people have grown so prosperous and happy. That the Indians on this northern continent have been savages, and that many of them are savages now is true; but it is also true that many tribes have risen to a promising degree of civilization, and there is no reason to doubt that the rest, if wisely guided, will be found capable of following their example."

"Of seventy-one Indian agencies, there are only eleven which have military posts in their immediate vicinity, and fourteen with a military force within one to three days' march. Of the 252,000 Indians in the United States there have been since the pacification of the Sioux at no time more than a few hundred in hostile conflict with the whites. Neither does it appear that such partial disturbances have been provoked by the absence or prevented by the presence of a military force. Of the four disturbances that have occurred within the last two years, three broke out in the immediate presence of such a military force, and only one without it. At this moment a band of less than eight hundred Utes, and another of about one hundred and fifty Indian raiders in New Mexico, in all less than one thousand of an Indian population of a quarter of a million, are causing serious trouble. In fact, the number of white desperadoes who were within the last twelve months banded together in New Mexico for murder and rapine was larger than that of the Indians recently on the war path near the southern part of the Territory."

Proud of his Work.—During a discussion of the temperance question in the Canadian Parliament, Ford, a member from Queen's County, referred to the case of one who had not long before been laid in a pauper's grave, as "a temperance lecture in a nut-shell."

The member from Halifax immediately arose, and stated that he was a liquor-seller, and that the business was just as honorable and legitimate as a carriage-builder's.

This remark called up Ford again, who said: "I build carriages; and when I turn out a fine wagon, and point to it rolling along the street, I say, 'That is my work.' I would ask the honorable member from Halifax if he is proud of his work, as he sees it rolling along the street?"

There was no answer to this question.—The Safeguard.

Though the Lord's tender mercies are over all his works, we cannot expect preservation without watchfulness and prayer, walking in lowliness of mind before Him. All self-sufficiency, and relying on past attainments, must be relinquished, and a willingness lived in to be emptied and stripped, by Him who knows our infirmities, and what baptisms and reductions are needful for our refinement and growth in Divine Grace.—Wm. Evans.

Jacob Schoonerhoven on Sanctification.

"It is forty years," said he, "since my brother Theodore and myself experienced religion. Soon after our conversion he professed sanctification, and urged me to seek for it. I considered the subject. Theodore, after being sanctified, was more forward, more confident, but no more disinterested. He was greedy of gain, and shrewd in speculation, faking advantage of his keen perception to amass wealth; having his constitutional selfishness still strong, still blinding his judgment, and causing him to think he ought to be better paid for his services; men ought to work for him cheap; he ought to receive higher wages than others for public service or mechanical labor; what he sought ought to bring a higher price; what he buys ought to be got for little. My brother has never scrupled to buy property at a low price, which he knew was about to rise in value, and to sell at a high price that which was about to fall; he has not scrupled to buy as cheap as possible, young animals of great promise, from men who knew not their value, and to shift off young animals of no promise to men who knew not their worthlessness. All this, he said, was according to law, upheld by public sentiment, and agreeable to his conscience. I considered the subject of sanctification in the light of loving God with all my heart, and loving my neighbor as myself—not so much a work of the emotions as of the judgment—a work not of one moment but of a lifetime; agreement, union, and harmony with God; self lost in humanity; self lost in God; living for the honor of God and for human welfare. At all times, seven days in a week, three hundred and sixty-five in a year; in all places, at home and abroad; in the sanctuary, at the mill or at the market; in all business; laboring, buying, or selling.

"I went into the woods and prayed for sanctification, when the Lord said, 'Jacob, dost thou love my will, my law, and my government with all thy heart?' I said, 'I do, Lord,' and the Lord said: 'Dost thou love thy neighbor as thyself?' I answered, 'I do, Lord.' The Lord said: 'Very well, and now, Jacob, prove thy word in thy life.' A week after this I took down a book on military science, and was reading, having a great ambition for martial fame. The Lord said: 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I saw my ambition was self; I dropped the book and never took it up again. I had made an arrangement to join a lodge of Masons, was on my way, riding fast, when the Lord said: 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I saw that my desire to be a Mason was self; I turned and rode home. I had coveted two colts which I knew would become horses of great value. They were rough and lean, and the owner, not knowing their value, would sell them low. I was on my way to buy them. The Lord said: 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I saw I was not loving my neighbor as myself; I went on, and said: 'Peter, keep your colts; they will make the most valuable horses among all I know.' Peter said, 'I did not think them valuable; but I believe you, for you and your brother know more about horses than any men I ever saw.' I would give a thousand dollars for your knowledge. But now,—Schoonerhoven, the fact is, I must sell them to save my house and land, which is mortgaged.' 'I will lend you the money,' I said, 'to save your house; keep your colts.' He did keep them, and finally sold them for five hundred dollars.

"A man came to me to buy some city lots. I was about to take the price he offered, when the Lord said, 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I said, '— Broderick, I cannot in conscience sell you those lots; that part of the city must fall in a few years.' It did fail, and I turned those lots into a farm.

"Thus my sanctification went on. These lessons were never forgotten; self was banished from my buying and selling; the quick discernment of the value of property, and the foresight of coming changes which the Creator had given me, I did more used for mine own increase and wealth. It was evident to me that no man could gain wealth by speculation, and yet love his neighbor as himself. I have instructed hundreds of the honest, industrious poor, and kept them from the gins of speculators. My eye was single, my light increased, and my knowledge of right and wrong; of justice and humanity; my perception became keen to understand what was consistent with loving my neighbor as myself, to understand what it was to do to others as I would be done by.

"One morning I was awakened by the Lord, 'Jacob, arise and be sanctified. Remember thy word.' I arose, and coming from my lodging room I met a committee of three, informing me that for the part I took in an anti-slavery meeting, I must recant, or come to trial. I remembered my word, stood by my trial, and was excluded. To be separated from the church of my early choice, tore my heart. The Lord said: 'Jacob, lovest thou me more than these?' I answered, 'Yea, Lord, I love thee more than all.' The cause of temperance long before cost me a similar trial.

"I had from early life set apart all of my income, above the plain support of my family, for charity, and with much prayer sought for the most needy. I had passed a day under the clear impression that a sore trial was coming. At evening I stopped in my barn and cried: 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.' The Lord said, 'Jacob, art thou ready to be sanctified in the loss of all?' I said, 'Yea, Lord, take all. Thou gavest, and if thou takest away; blessed be thy name.'

"I answered a rap by stepping to the door. Three fugitive slaves, a mother and two daughters, were there. The mother mournfully said, 'Will you send us back?' And the Lord said, 'Jacob, wilt thou obey my laws or the laws of man?' I answered, 'I will obey thy laws, Lord.' 'Come in,' I said. I landed them in Canada. I went to jail, and lost all—house, land, herd, and flock. I have gathered a little by hard work in old age. This little cottage is mine, with a few acres of land. My God is reconciled, my peace is like a river, and my treasure in heaven."

"I believe, Bro. Schoonerhoven, that you do not profess sanctification. I never heard you speak of it."

"I never speak of it," said Jacob; "the word has become a term of reproach. Selfish, willful, proud men make high professions of sanctification. My brother Theodore is often referred to as a model sanctified man. He has amassed a fortune of a hundred thousand dollars by speculation, has always sought popular favor and civil office; has ever remained pro-slavery, opposed to the Maine law, and has gone with the most profane and de-bached political party. The judge, by whose decision I was stripped of all my possessions, professed sanctification. I deem it my duty to make no noisy professions. We should however, be sanctified every day in all our volitions, motives, purposes, and designs; our affections, in our temper and spirit; and in all our business transactions. All other sanctification is mere emotion, excitement, an enthusiasm; and is consistent with selfishness, cruel oppression, and grinding the face of the poor."—Wesleyan Methodist Magazine.

Learn a Trade.—I never look at my old steel composing rule that I do not bless myself that, while my strength lasts, I am not at the mercy of the world. If my pen is wanted, I can go back to the type case and be sure to find work, for I learned the printer's trade thoroughly—newspaper-work, job-work, book-work, and press-work. I am glad I have so good a trade. It is a rock upon which a possessor can stand firmly. There is health and vigor for both body and mind in an honest trade. It is the strongest and surest part of self-made man. Go to the academy to the printing-office or the artisan's bench, or if you please to the farm—for, to be sure, good farming is a trade, and a grand one at that. Lay this a sure foundation, and, after that, branch off into whatever profession you please.

You have heard, perhaps, of the clerk who had faithfully served Stephen Girard from boyhood to manhood. On the twenty-first anniversary of his birthday he went to his master and told him his time was up, and he certainly expected important promotion in the merchant's service. But Stephen Girard said to him: 'Very well; now go and learn a trade.'

"What trade, sir?"

"Good barrels and butts must be in demand while you live. Go and learn the cooper's trade, and when you have made a perfect barrel bring it to me."

The young man went away and learned the trade, and in time brought his old master a splendid barrel of his own make. Girard examined it, and gave the maker $2,000 for it and then said to him:

"Now I want you in my counting-room; but henceforth you will not be dependent upon the whim of Stephen Girard. Let what will come, you have a good trade always in reserve."

The young man saw the wisdom, and understood.

Years ago, when the middle-aged men of that day were boys, Horace Greeley wrote:

"It is a great source of consolation to us that when the public shall be tired of us as an editor, we can make a satisfactory livelihood at setting type or farming; so that, while our strength lasts, ten thousand blockheads, taking offence at some article they do not understand, could not drive us into the poor-house."—Exchange.

Be it thy unremitted solicitude of mind to witness communion with the God who gives thee life, breath and being. This cannot be fully known but through the wrestlings of the seed, in the silence of all flesh; every roving thought and idle imagination being subjected to the obedience of the cross of Christ. Then, when this is known, "Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it," will be understood by thy poor (and otherwise miserable) son. If thou wilt reign with Christ, thou must suffer with Him. No cross, no crown, are words of truth and righteousness.

Be not ashamed of the heart-tendering work of Him who is, at times, drawing near thee for thy refinement. Bear his reproach. Go with Him to the cross, to Pilate, and to the Lord. Die with Him to every other satisfaction, than what arises from union and communion with Him who was made perfect through sufferings. This is close doctrine, but I can testify it leads to joys unspeakable that the world knows not of; to a foretaste in this life of those rivers of pleasure, which are at God's right hand.—J. Scott.

A Scaled Legal Opinion.—An honest farmer once called upon a celebrated lawyer, and told him he wanted an opinion. He had heard a great deal about the value of a lawyer's opinions, and how a great many people went to get an opinion, and John, who had never had, and was likely to have, a lawsuit or other difficulty for a lawyer to help him from, thought he would have an "opinion." "Well, John, what can I do to help you?" said the lawyer, when John in his turn was shown into the room. "Why, sir," replied John, "I appended to be in town, and having nothing to do, I thought I would come and get an opinion on the matter." "State your case," said the lawyer.

"Smith. What's wrong?" "O, nothing, ain't got no lawsuit; I only want to get one of your opinions; they say they are very valuable." "But," said Smith, "about what?" "O, any thing, sir; take your pick and choice!" the lawyer, perceiving the notions of his client on the matter in hand, took a pen, and writing a few words, folded them up and handed them to John, who carefully placed them in his pocket. "What's to pay, sir?" "Four and sixpence." "When John returned the next morning, he found his wife, who took the lead in his business affairs, anxiously discussing with his chief farm servant, the propriety of getting in a large quantity of oats on that day, which had been cut the day previous, or of undertaking some other labor. John was appealed to settle the question, but he could not decide. At length he said, "I'll tell you what, Polly; I've been to a lawyer, and got an opinion that cost me four and sixpence. There it is; it's a lawyer's writing, and I can't make head or tail out of it." Polly, who was something of a scholar, opened the paper and read as follows: "Never put off till to-morrow what can be done to-day." "Enough said!" cried John, "then oats must be got in." And they were got in, and the same night such a storm men on as otherwise would have ruined them. John often afterward consulted the opinion, and acted upon it; and as long as he had entertained a high estimate of lawyers' opinions.—Late Paper.

This is my testimony, that none can enjoy peace, but as they witness the name of the Lord exalted in their hearts above every thing; above gold and silver, house and land, wife and children, and self-reputation; yea, above all heavenly names as well as earthly; every thought and imagination brought down and subjected to it. There is no other name given under heaven whereby man can be saved from their enemies within, which are their greatest enemies, but as they witness the name of the Lord exalted in them; even his name who said, "I am the light of the world." This light sheweth unto man his enemies, and not only so, but destroyeth them with the breath of his mouth, and the brightness of his coming. Power is in his name; the light, which makes all things manifest, to destroy and expel all that is contrary to it, and redeem mankind from under the power of it. This, and remnant, are living witnesses of it. This, and are ready in love and goodwill, to tell their neighbors, countrymen and acquaintance, what the name of the Lord, through their loving of it, hath done for their souls; that they may be persuaded to embrace it, and come to experience the like great salvation.

What then remaineth; but that all that have received this knowledge, do walk answerable to it; and that all in whom this light shineth, abide in it, and love it; so a vain thought cannot arise, nor an idle word be spoken, nor an evil deed be done, but they are judged and condemned by it.

This light that judgeth every appearance of evil, is a day of judgment, wherein men give an account for every idle word they speak.—William Shewen.

Selected.

The same Divine principle [of light and life] which led me out of the forms and ceremonies to worship the Father in spirit and in Truth, also led me by its secret teachings into a straight and narrow way, as to all superfluities in dress and address; and knowing in whom I had believed, the same hath preserved me in it to this day, and I trust will do so to the end, as there is no variability with Him. Simplicity of dress and address is becoming a humble follower of a crucified Saviour, whose garments or vesture were so unlike the fashions of that day, that we cast lots for it as a curiosity, for it was without seam. There is a cross to many among us in these things, as the practice of them declares to the beholders whose disciples we profess to be; and although all power in heaven and earth is given unto Him, yet, because the world in their foolish vain hearts despise the wisdom of God in these things, intended to crucify us to the spirit of the world, and the pomps and vanities of it, they are ashamed of the cross, and would rather enjoy the pleasures of a sinful world, which are only for a season, than to suffer affliction with the people of God in the scuffings of the world. * * * The change in my dress was a great cross, as I was always given to fashionable dresses, and at this time had sundry suits of apparel of this sort. I felt a solemn covering to come over my spirit early one morning, whilst in bed, which drew me into deep silence and attention, when I felt it required of me to conform to the simple appearance of Christ's followers; his garment was all of a piece, so ought mine to be, of a piece with my speech, my life and conversation. This felt to me a severe stroke; no shelter was now left for me, but I must appear as a fool to the world, my speech and then my garments would betray me that I had been with Christ, and professed myself to be one of his disciples. I wept bitterly, and pleaded the cross it would be to me before my friends and acquaintances, with the loss it would be to me in my present clothes; but all was silence to my complaints, and the leaven worked in the lump till the whole man was leavened, into submission, and then I ran the way of his commandments with joy and alacrity of heart, so much so that I have heard in passing some people say they would give their oath I was a Quaker. Oh! saith my spirit, that all the family were so conspicuous, even in the outside, that they might be known thereby whose they are.—Life of John Conran.

Religious Items, &c.

Praying to Saints.—An exchange paper of the Roman Catholic persuasion contains several short prayers to the saints so called, which by Papal decrees special indulgences are attached. Two of these are to be addressed to the Virgin Mary. "O, Mary, who didst come into this world free from stain, obtain of God for me that I may leave it without sin." "Sweet heart of Mary, be my salvation." Among those directed to her husband, is the following: "Remember, O most pure protector, St. Joseph! that no one ever had recourse to thy protection or implored thy aid without obtaining relief. Confiding therefore in thy goodness, I come before thee and humbly supplicate thee. Oh, despise not my petitions foster-father of the Redeemer, but graciously receive them!"

Such appeals are very inconsistent with many declarations of Scripture, such as the passages, "I, even I, am the Lord; and beside me there is no Saviour." "Look unto me, and be ye saved all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else;" "Unto me every knee shall bow;" "I the Lord am thy Saviour, and thy Redeemer, the mighty one of Jacob;" "I am the Lord thy God." There is no Saviour besides me." Highly favored as she was, Mary felt her own dependence, for she said to her cousin Elizabeth, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." The prophet Ezekiel says, "Though Noah, Daniel, and Job were in [the land], as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness." The Lord Jesus Christ is the only Mediator and Intercessor with the Father, and vain indeed are all appeals to men or angels for preservation from sin or forgiveness for its commission.

Great is the advantage of faithful obedience; it sweetens every cup, and speaks peace to the soul.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 3, 1880.

The Christian Standard, a Methodist journal of this city, in an editorial article in its issue of 12th mo. 27th, 1879, speaks of what it terms a "spiritual revival" in the Society of Friends, especially in the West and South; and says:

"Their manner of operation is being entirely changed in some respects. Some months ago we were permitted to spend several days in a series of special services in a Friends' Meeting House in the West, and singing and prayer and praise after the most excitable and inspiring camp-meeting type frequently prevailed. Recently at a Yearly Meeting in Kansas a state of things was manifested which looked like an old-fashioned Methodist Quarterly Meeting. The influence has spread widely and it is still spreading. It is to some of us occasion of profound thanksgiving to our Heavenly Father, that the National Camp Meetings have been the means of inspiring some of the most prominent leaders in this wonderful uplift. We could give a long list of names of the most prominent religious workers of the society referred to, who came into the enjoyment of full salvation at our National Camp Meetings."

We call attention to these remarks as additional evidence to those who have doubted as to the reality and extent of the changes which have been introduced into some parts of our Society. We trust every true Friend can rejoice in every true revival of religious zeal that comes to their notice; and that their hearts would be filled with thankfulness to see the members of our Society everywhere, filled with that self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Christ, which animated so many of our early members. But there are many among them who do not believe, that the reality and depth of such "revival" is to be proved or measured by the prevalence of "the most exciting and inspiring Camp-Meetings, types" of "singing and prayer and praise." While they may give credit to those who engage in these excited scenes, for a measure of sincerity and honesty of purpose, they mourn over a change which they indicate, not merely in manner of operation," but also in the appreciation of our testimony to the nature of pure spiritual worship, and in the upholding of our belief as to the right exercise of our ministry.

The expressions of Job Scott, written during a visit to the Southern States about 90 years ago, are applicable to the state of things now. "Oh how hard it is for self to be still, and all flesh silent before the Lord till He arise and abillate. Many Friends in our and this land, are so far from full reliance on the Lord, that they seem as if they thought the great cause would be deserted, and the testimony fall to the ground, if the arm of creaturely ability was not stretched out to support it, and scarce dare to wait for life and help Divine, lest it should be too long in coming."

"How my soul has been affected in beholding all societies too much clothed with the linsey-woolsey garment; a little smattering of Divine influence, and a great mixture of creaturely invention, activity and zeal. And yet alas, a right zeal is mournfully wanting. And too many that have seen the insufficiency of man, are settled in the other extreme, and instead of waiting with their lips in the dust for help, are sitting down at ease, caring too little for any of these things."

The Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has recently issued an address to our fellow citizens on the use of Intoxicating Drinks, which may be had for gratuitous circulation at the Book Store, No. 304 Arch Street.

This is an octavo pamphlet of 16 pages, in which after a few preliminary remarks and different heads—such as Medical Use of Alcohol, the Duty of the Christian Church, Prohibitory Legislation, The Public Press and Woman's Influence.

The Committee who are especially charged with the care of its distribution, have taken steps looking toward a wide distribution of this Appeal. The first edition of 5000 copies is about exhausted, and a second edition of we believe 10,000 copies has been ordered from the printer.

May a blessing accompany it!

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 23rd ult. the Philadelphia Gas Works registered 9,762,000 feet of gas, the largest consumption for any twenty-four hours for years, even exceeding the centennial year. On the same date of last year, the gas burned amounted to 9,224,000 feet. From midnight on the 23d until 8 o'clock on the 25th, 1300 packages passed through the examiners hands at the post-office in this city, and many others passed without examination. The increase in this class of post-office material is stated to have nearly doubled within the past year.

The excitement in Maine over the action of the Governor and Council in reference to the recent election continues. An attempt was made in Bangor, on the 25th ult., to remove the arms and ammunition from the State Arsenal to the Adjutant-General's office in Augusta. A mob of 400 persons, armed with clubs, gathered in the street by a mob, and the mayor feeling he had not force to protect them, ordered them sent back to the arsenal. Morrill has written to the Governor, suggesting the trouble be submitted to the Supreme Court as umpire, and some hopes are entertained that the proposition will be adopted.

The Bayley hat factory, at Newburyport, was destroyed by a fire originating from spontaneous combustion among old cotton waste. The factory was running day and night to fill orders. The loss is estimated at upwards of $100,000. A destructive fire occurred in the city of Boston, on the 23d ult., in the building of Kendall & Co.'s paper warehouse, destroying that building, the publishing house of Houghton, Osgood & Co., and several other buildings, valued in all at $2,500,000.

Oray, and the chiefs chosen to go to Washington, arrived at Los Pinos agency on the 23rd ult., with only $1000 in the pocket demanded. General Hatch refused to go unless all were given up, whereupon Oray asked more time, and was given five days. Fears are entertained that the Utes will attack Hatch and his little band, unless Oray can keep them quiet.

General McCornack published a list of all the expenditures on the part of the United States at the Paris Exposition, for transmission to Congress. Of the two congressional appropriations, amounting to $190,000, there is an unexpended balance of over $10,000.

Pleuro-pneumonia continues among the cattle in the neighborhood of Yonkers, N. Y.; several new cases have been reported within a few days.

Thirteen thousand bushels of peanuts are said to have been shipped on one day of last week from Petersburg, Va., to one northern port. The week's sale aggregated 200,000 bushels.

It is reported that Edison has now constructed a form of lamp which will render electricity available for light, under nearly all circumstances. It consists of a small piece of card-board, cut in shape of a horse-shoe, normally charged and placed in a glass globe, from which the air has been removed. The cost of a lamp is said to be not over twenty-five cents, and the light from each equal to twelve candles.

The number of deaths in this city during the past week was 274, an increase of 15 over the previous week, this number 177 were adults and 97 children. The principal causes of death were, consumption, 44; convulsions, 11; debility, 12; diphtheria, 10; typhoid fever, 9; inflammation of the lungs, 25; old age, 14. The whole number of deaths during the year was 16,281, of whom 10,000 were between 50 and 100 years of age; 15 from 100 to 110; and 23 over 110 years.

Markets, &c.—The following were quotations on the 27th ult. U. S. bonds, sixes, 1881, registered, 104½; coupon, 107½; 5s, 106½; 4½s, 106½; 4s, 107, 104½. Cotton.—Prices remained about the same as last week. Sales of middlings are reported at 12½ and 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and Sea Islands.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white 8½ cts. for export, and 9 a 9½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Floor is dull. Sales of 1500 barrels, including Minnesota, at $67.50 to $7.40; straight at $72.50; Pennsylvania, at $67.50 to $7.25; western do, at $7.25. Rye flour and other high grades at $7.75 a $8.50. Rye flour, is steady at $5.50 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is firmer and in better demand. Sale of 12,000 bushels, including western rejected, at $1 a $1.47; red do, at $1.45 a $1.46; and No. 1, $1.45. Rye flour.—Corn is quiet, but prices rule steady. Sale of 15,000 bushels, including old mixed and yellow 62 a 62½ cts., and new do. at 57 a 60 cts., including 5 a 58½ a 59 cts., and steamer at 57½ a 58 cts. Oats sold. Sales of 6000 bushels, including steamed, at 48 a 48 cts., and white at 48 a 49 cts. The receipts today were 100,000 bushels; 3000 barrels flour; 15,500 bushels; 27,500 bush. corn; 7000 bush. oats; 5500 bush. barley. Hay and straw market for week ending 12th mo. 27th, 1873.—Loads of hay, 223; loads of straw, Average price during the week.—Prime timothy, $1.10 per 100 pounds; do. No. 1, $1.05; do. No. 2, $1.00; straw, $1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—The market for the week has been active, and prices 1¢ per lb. higher—250 head arrive and sold at 3½ a 6½ cts. per lb., as to quality. Sheeps.—A cable telegram from London on the 27th ult., quoted U. S. bonds at 106½ for 5s, 109½ for 4½s, and 106 for the 4s. The tendency of stocks upwards, with the exception of gas shares, all of which declined heavily on account of the telegrams report Edison's late success with the electric light.

London.—A cable telegram from London on the 27th ult., quoted U. S. bonds at 106½ for 5s, 109½ for 4½s, and 106 for the 4s. The tendency of stocks upwards, with the exception of gas shares, all of which declined heavily on account of the telegrams report Edison's late success with the electric light. The gate-way to the river is said to have been 3-10 more severe, that steamboats were unable to reach a spot. The passengers are supposed to be all drown and are estimated from 150 to 200 in number.

A Paris dispatch to the Times states, that thousands of persons crossed the river Seine on the ice on the 25th ult.

In 137 classes of the 566, into which the Austral Exhibition at Sydney is divided, Germany shows nine hundred exhibitors. There are no goods shown which attract more attention, and it is claimed, financial instruments and gunpowder, to scientific apparatus and manufacturing machinery. Germany's productions are among the best. Some of their iron manufactures equal best English makes.

A Mussulman priest has been sentenced to death assisting to translate the Bible into the Turkish language. The British Ambassador has demanded a prisoner's release, and it is believed Germany will supply the demand.

Recent eruptions of Vesuvius have somewhat altered the appearance of the crater. There are now three craters around the great one, two small craters having recently opened, and blown off portions of the mountain which obstructed the issue of the lava. The current is flowing slowly in a northerly direction, and is clearly visible from Naples to the naked eye.

Camps in the Caribbees.

This is the title of a newly published book relating the observations and the incidents that befell the writer, Frederick A. Ober, who was sent out by the Smithsonian Institute to explore the natural history of the group of West Indian Islands called Lesser Antilles, which form part of the chain of islets separating the Caribbean Sea from the broad Atlantic.

Many of these islands contain high mountain peaks, and show signs of volcanic action. Some of the craters still emit puffs of steam, and sulphurous fumes. Among them still linger some of the descendants of the old Arab race—first made known to Europeans by the voyages of Columbus. But these people have quite laid aside the warlike habits which made their ancestors a terror to the more peaceful inhabitants of other islands; and are now peaceful subjects of the governments under which they live.

Many of the explorations described in this book were made on the island of Dominica, where Columbus first landed on his second voyage. It is about 30 miles long by 11 broad. After Columbus' return home, he answered his queen's inquiry as to its appearance by crushing a sheet of paper in his hand and throwing it on the table, as giving the best idea he could of its "furrewed hills and mountains deeply cut, and rent into ravines and hollowed into valleys."

Our author took possession of a little hut in a small mountain hamlet, and made from thence excursions into the surrounding solitudes for the birds and others objects of which he was in pursuit. Among the most numerous of the birds were the Humming—of which four species abounded on this island. In the capture of these and of various insects he was much assisted by three of the young native boys, whom he had taken into his service. He describes the method pursued by one of these little hunters:

"First he goes to a tree called the mountain palm, which replaces the cocoa palm on the mountains, the latter growing only along the coast. Beneath the tree are some fallen leaves, fifteen feet in length; these he seizes and strips, leaving the mid-rib bare, a long, slender stem, tapering to a point. Upon this tip he places a lump of bird-lime, to make which he had collected the inspissated juice of the bread-fruit, and chewed it to the consistency of soft wax. Scattered over the savanna are many clumps of flowering bushes, over whose crimson and snowy blossoms humming-birds are dashing, inserting their beaks in the honeyed corollas; after active forays, resting upon some bare twig, pruning and preening their feathers. Cautiously creeping toward a bush upon which one of these little beauties is resting, the hunter extends the palm rib, with its treacherous coating of gum. The bird eyes it curiously, but fearlessly, as it approaches his resting place, even pecking at it; but the next moment he is dangling helplessly, beating the air with buzzing wings in vain efforts to escape the clutches of that tenacious gum.

"The humming-birds brought me alive, I would place in a large glass-covered box; but they seldom survived many days, notwithstanding great care. If exposed to the light, they kept up a constant fluttering until the muscles of their wings became so stiff they could not close them, and they expired with wings wide outstretched. Some of them would take their captivity quietly, and though fitting now and then to the front of the box when light was admitted, would sit upright upon the perch, giving an occasional chirp, and dressing their feathers as serenely as if in the open air. They would seem happy and cheerful; but the fact is, they are creatures of light and sunshine, and cannot exist without it. You may give them their favorite food of honey and insects, fresh flowers every day, with the morning dew yet dripping from them, and yet, despite your tenderest care, they will drop and die.

"It is touching to witness the death of one of these innocent beings. Though I have caused more than one to lose its life, I never did it without a pang, as though I were committing a great wrong. To shoot a bird at a distance, and have him fall at a distance without a struggle, is not the same as to see him die in your hand. To watch the feeble fluttering of the stiffening wings, the expiring glance of the fast-dimming eye, the painful pulsations of the gentle heart, the last quiver when all is over—ah! how often has my conscience reproached me when looking upon such a scene. Again and again I have almost resolved never to kill another bird, and only the thought that I was doing this work in the interest of science kept me to my purpose.

"The little crested sprite bears confinement less easily than the others, and rarely survives two or three days. Every morning I would introduce a bough of fragrant lime-blossoms, at which they would all dash instantly, diving into the flowers with great eagerness. Sugar dissolved in water, and diluted honey, was their favorite food, and they would sip it greedily. Holding them by their feet, I would place their beaks in a bottle of syrup, when they would rapidly eject their tongues and withdraw them, repeating this operation until satisfied. The long slender tube, at that time, looks like the tongue of a serpent. It is so slender that one may see it. They never displayed fear, but would readily alight on my finger and glance fearlessly up at me, watching an opportunity, however, for escape.

"In some of the islands, Martinique especially, the boys shoot the small birds with pellets of clay or hard, round seeds, through hollow canes lined with zinc or glass. They kill a great many in this way."

"Not for the collecting of specimens merely was my mission; I was to obtain all the information possible of the habits of the birds—of their home life. It was in this study of them in their forest retreats that I took keen delight, and considered the shooting of them as a necessary evil to procure their identification.

"In one of my daily rambles for this purpose, I entered a gloomy glen in the deep forest. Soon as my eyes became accustomed to the gloom, I espied a humming-bird dancing in the air. There was not a flower in sight, and he did not fly as when in pursuit of nectar-bearing flowers, but hovered more on suspended wing, darting sidewise, backward and forward, with the body in an almost erect position. If through the deep shade a sunbeam slanted athwart the glen, his throat gleamed like a ruby. Now, this fantastic dance was not for pleasure, but for food. I ascertained that at such times they are in pursuit of insects; have seen the insect swarms, and so long as there remain any in sight—and even long after they have disappeared from my view—the bird darts hither and thither, snapping them up with great rapidity. At such times he does not content himself with a sip here and there and then alight upon some twig or liane, as when gathering honey, but evidently considers the fleeting nature of the prey he is pursuing, and shoots from one hunting-ground to another till he has obtained his fill."

On one occasion while hunting in the forest for the Imperial Parrot, a very rare bird, which is found only on the Island of Dominica, and resting beneath a huge tree, concealed in a bower of orchids and hanging ferns, he says:

"Close at hand, within two feet of me, sat a tiny humming-bird on a downy nest, which was fastened upon a twig no larger than a pencil. During all my stay it had sat there, gazing upon the first object of human kind, probably, it had ever beheld. Fearlessly it glanced at me with its bright, black eyes, and curiously it followed my every motion with its shapely little head. Involuntarily I stretched forth my hand to touch it, but at once drew back for fear it might take alarm and fly away. A buzzing of wings attracted my attention, and I beheld the mate of the one on the nest, who darted at me with unmistakable fury, his 10th mo 29th, 1846. Left home this morning with a comfortable evidence that it was inspired of a hope that I would be preserved. Attended Monthly Meeting at Forest St. Philadelphia, in which I was elected. Arrived at Joseph Stratton's, and stayed there in time to get on the ferry boat across the North River, took the steamerboat at Albany, got there about day-light. The steamerboat was about took the six o'clock train for Onondaga, arrived there a little past twelve, and hired a conveyance for the night, and hired a conveyance for the next morning. We stopped at "Homan's place," Peter Doxatier and David Nelson came in to see us, I concluded to have an Indian invited to meet at their meeting here this evening. This evening the Indians about seven, had a very satisfactory opportunity with them. Joseph E. and myself went back to Homan's residence and staid two night, had a good bed, a comfortable night's rest, and a good breakfast.

21th. Visited the Orchard settlement on Onondaga reservation. There I found a book for his two horse wagon. His wife and son but along, had a pretty satisfactory opportunity with them (the Indians), after which they requested us to stand beside each other, but all might have an opportunity of shaking hands with us to bid us farewell. They seemed to sing a hymn, one perhaps adapted to the occasion, after singing a short time, the women commenced passing out one after another, and took us by the hand as they passed us, the children followed, the men last, they continued to sing until the last bid us farewell. As the little children gave us their hands I felt a desire that the great Head of the Church might bless them from Onondaga brought us to Onondaga, went to Syracuse and hired a conveyance to the Onondaga reservation.

29th. Attended a meeting with the society at the Council house, in the afternoon meeting of the Methodist Indians. They have two good meeting houses, a white, one nearly finished, I had rather been away from the Indians. In the evening we visited Jos. Homan's place, his family came in and sat with us, and we had an opportunity of giving them some good advice, the evening as pleasantly spent, his daughter Elizabeth a well educated young woman, returned to her Hills to bed.

Second day morning, after breakfast, went to their married house, there were perhaps twenty children to be taken a number of men and women. Sam George, in the head of the Onondaga reservation. He appears to be a smart shrewd man, had a pretty and interpreter, and made an able speech in favor of holding their land in common, an Indian woman also made a pretty good speech in the subject of dividing their lands, therefore a number of speeches made. Took leave of the Indians, Wm. Hill brought me to Syracuse, staid over night, left half past 1 A. M. at Onondaga, crossed the St. Lawrence river by Plattsburgh, staid at Concord, Canada.

11th mo 1st. Spent the day walking over the reservation, about one half of it is in Canada, the other in New York. In all about 1700 Indians. Staid over night at Mitchell Johnson's. Just before going to bed I felt myself somewhat alarmed to see my mind full of evil would hardly live until morning. I tried to find a humbling prayer, may I be preserved from the blessing. Oh for humility and greater faithfulness.

2nd. Spent this morning at Mitchell Johnson's, he being a Catholic, went to his meeting, took a walk to Stratton's, and myself took a walk on an elevated place of ground and looked at the St. Lawrence. It is a large beautiful river, the water clear and well tasted, about one mile with it in front will be better to go up the rapids. Many of the 20 Right Indians on the Onondaga side are Roman Catholics, over the line in New York there are some Methodists, they have a conversation about ten by six miles, and some to lands, most of which is some of good land and good yield, many of the Indians pretty good looking. I would think a good deal improved with white blood. There are about 100 houses in their village, mostly frame, a Catholic mission, home, custom-house, post office, and school house, in the streets they have three bells. Had an interesting council, a large number attended, they were much more kind and friendly than I had expected to find them. Their kitchen seemed to be crossed up to my partner. We left them with very friendly feelings, which was truly pleasant to meet. Crossed the St. Lawrence at one half, took supper at the Commercial and went to the depot to wait the train on the Grand Trunk Railroad.

3rd. Breakfast at Colburn's, Earl Hope on Lakes Ontario. In company of people, probably, may thanksgiving, and probably to the Great Head of the Church. Passed the Catholic territory, crossed the suspension bridge, and got to John Monmouth and a little conversation, to baptize a wealthy Indian, then by the same house, will furnish I, and have a Catholic Indian woman for his wife, a kind well behaved woman. Attended two Indian meetings, had a pretty satisfactory opportunity, with their speakers, he acknowledged the truth of what I said to him, had above a very satisfactory opportunity. At John Monmouth placed.

11th mo 6th. Left John about 1 P. M. just to Ayres Station about 8 miles from the Onondaga reservation, hired a conveyance and went to the St. Charles Hotel, arrived about 11th mo 7th, was invited to be a member with them evening, after a good light with the Indian men and women. A large number had, we had a satisfactory opportunity, 11th mo 8th, we were thanked for the favor, returned to Ayres, staid at Charles Hotel, was very kindly entertained.

10th. Left for the Onondaga reservation, rode in a carriage for Albany, on railroad to Buffalo, Mr. Joe Hall, wife and his children, had very satisfactory interviews with them.

20th. Left to Asha Wright's, went to the reservation, had a pretty satisfactory council, by William and Martin B. Pierce, were introduced, visited the school near the Council house, and returned to the Indian Council house. The President and Commodore were holding court, made arrangements to be a council by morning, visited the Onondaga reservation, the children in school, which was pretty in viewing, some of them were pretty well educated in their studies, and were well read. Looked over the house, I had impressive thinking, with whom I had some opportunities, my next way very kind, lodged at Asha Wright's.

11th. Left for the Mt. Zion reservation, just to Onondaga about 30 miles, started on foot carrying our baggage, hired a team to bring us to Tunes, was met with a number of Indians, had a comfortable opportunity with them, and got to Tunes reservation dark. Took a walk over the reservation, and then returned to their dwelling.

12th. In 1847 I think it was the city of Onondaga, I whose I was then laboring, was much excited at last in political union in electing the intelligents from Washington, that Colley of the State of Maine, was killed in a duel by Graves. Both were members of Congress, and had nothing against each other. Graves had a number of the spread of the then edition of a New York paper. I said in a Boston paper at the time, "that would shame would pursue Graves till he was carried by the phre of justice." I still live to testify the facts in justification of my prediction made forty years before.

A conveyance from the Onondaga Ferry, within a few years back from Washington, the terms of the Onondaga reservation, and the 19th of the Onondaga. Found that I was from Maine, the General allowed for the affairs, passed the administration for Colley, and kept records of the Onondaga reservation of the issue. Had that Graves died the 14th of the month, and the next day, because I was in the prison, I had some opportunity with some friends and watching beyond, when he was not willing should leave his property. He commenced the hours of night, in walking to and fro, hills and fields, to measure a second time, and in still some motions. At length, returned with a mortal wound, got to hospital, and, sitting, with his hands, the unhappy man expired. I came to the general from the lips of a clergyman, but not believe. And thus was wiped the memory of the intellectual Colley.

The heart may not punish the guilty, though every effort be made, but there is a God, his reward, and retribution, to cause to follow crimes. Justice and judgment are the habitations of his throne. Though hard pain be kind, the wicked shall not be unpunished by. Heavens and crimes, though secret, all come to light. Men may prove themselves not guilty, by false swearing, they may call for, truth and deal in the contemptuous, but God is faithful to his promise, and will do right. A. Wright, in Christian Herald.

ANOTHER YEAR.

"Why art thou cast down, oh my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God." Psalm xlii. 11.

Another year:

The last lies dead behind thee,
The future from thy sight is hidden still;
But he who walks beside thee knows the ending—
Be patient, then, my soul, to do his will.

Another year:

To tread life's path, not knowing
Art longing to behold thy Saviour's face?
Or faint not yet? behold, He stands beside thee
In all the fulness of his loving grace.

Another year:

To gather sheaves for heaven,
Or out the harvest fields so full and white;
To find some loving word to be for Jesus,
To lead some soul from darkness into light.

Another year:

Art weary of thy toiling?
Art longing to behold thy Saviour's face?
Or faint not yet? behold, He stands beside thee
In all the fulness of his loving grace.

Another year:

He never will forsake thee,
Though clouds and darkness gather round thy way;
Be strong, for though temptation's power assail thee,
His grace shall be sufficient day by day.

Another year:

O doubt, my soul, no longer—
Go forward, trusting in thy Saviour's grace,
So walking, that each day shall find thee nearer
That "Better Land," where thou shalt see his face.

THE VALLEY OF SILENCE.

I walk down the valley of Silence,
Down the dim, voiceless valley alone,
And I hear not the sound of a footstep
Around me, but God's and my own;
And the hush of my heart is as holy
As bowers where angels have flown.

Long ago I was weary of voices
Whose music my soul could not win;
Long ago I was weary of noises
That fretted my soul with their din;
Long ago I was weary of places
Where I met but the human and sin.

I walked in the world with the worldly,
Yet I craved what the world never gave;
And I said: "In the world, each ideal—
That shines like a star on life's wave—
Is tossed on the shores of the real,
And sleeps like a dream in the grave."

And still did I pine for the perfect,
And still found the false with the true;
I sought, 'mid the humors, for heaven,
And caught a mere glimpse of its blue;
And I sighed when the clouds of the mortal
Veiled even that glimpse from my view.

And I toiled on, heart-tired of the human,
And groined 'mid the masses of men;
Till I knelt, long ago, at the altar,
And heard a voice call me. Since, then,
I walk down the valley of Silence,
That lies far beyond human ken.

Do you ask what I find in the Valley?
'T is my trying-place with the Divine;
And I fell at the feet of the Holy,
And around me a voice said, "Be Mine!"
And then rose from the depth of my spirit
An echo, "My heart shall be Thine."

Do you ask how I live in the Valley?
I weep, and I dream, and I pray;
But my tears are as sweet as the dew-drops
That fall on the roses in May,
And my prayer, like perfume from censers,
Ascendeth to God night and day.

In the hush of the Valley of Silence
I hear all the songs that I sing,
And the notes float down the dim valley
Till each finds a word for a wing,
That to men, like the dove of the deluge,
The message of peace they may bring.

But far on the deep there are billows
That never shall break on the beach;
And I have heard songs in the silence
That never shall float into speech;
And I have had dreams in the Valley
Too lofty for language to reach.

And I have seen thoughts in the Valley,—
Ah, me! how my spirit was stirred,—
They wear holy veils on their faces,
Their footsteps can scarcely be heard;
They pass down the Valley like virgins,—
Too pure for the touch of a word.

Do you ask me the place of this Valley?
'T is hearts that are harrowed by care,
It lieth afar between mountains,
And God and his angels are there,—
One is the dark mountain of sorrow,
And one the bright mountain of prayer.

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

BY E. A. KINGSBURY.

Tall hollyhocks, and pinks, and rue,
And roses various, and violets grey,
With other fragrant herbs and flowers
In well-kept beds and rustic bowers.
At early dawn and dewy eve,
In snowy cap, with upturned sleeve,
In pocket of homespun wool,
And short-gown trim, and bonnet, and cool,
Our grandmother would deftly dig
Around these plants, both small and big.
Their names and needs she seemed to know;
And this was fifty years ago.

Her checkered apron, full and long,
Was made of linen, good and strong.
Her neckerchief in many a fold
Lay on her bosom. Ah this told
The frugal housewife, nice and neat,
From crown of head to sole of feet.
And as she weeded, day by day,
And dog and pranced, a simple lay
Which to our memory is none the less
Than ought we since have heard to hear
Of olden times, she warbled low.
And this was fifty years ago.

The house was large; and one back room
Contained a spinning-wheel and loom,
And cards for making rolls, and reel
That measured skeins, and little wheel
Where she would wind with linen thread
Between her fingers, while she read.
Of her light feet kept time meanwhile
With sweet tunes, tending to beguile
The busy hours. And at her feet
We loved to sit. 'T was a great treat
To watch the fine thread come and go;
And this was fifty years ago.

The log behind the blazing fire,
The crane and hooks suspended higher,
The two brick ovens, one inside
The chimney jamb, was deep and wide
To hold the turkeys, puddings, pies,
For festal days; of smaller size,
The other stood outside the jamb,
And baked each week bread, beans and lamb,
The clean and nicely scalded floor,
The corner buffet with glass door
Displaying china; a rare show.
But this was fifty years ago.

Fifty long years! Within that time
We've wandered far from elfin to clime,
Seen many a grand and noble sight,
But nothing such delight would bring
As one more look at that elm tree,
'Neath which our play-house used to be.
The old clock, straight and dark, and tall,
With burnt-wood face and silver call,
Telling the hours that merriely
On swift-winged minutes flitted by,
Was prized most highly, you must know;
And this was fifty years ago.

Testimonies of Earlier and Later Date.

The following substance of a testimony given by Daniel Wheeler, was borne in London Yearly Meeting of 1832, by Sarah (Lynne) Grubb: "Her concern was, that we should return to first principles; but her more especial warning was, that if there were not coming down from the heights to which many have climbed, there were those amongst who might be compared to the golden vessel of the temple, such as had really stood in fire, and had not only been rightly filled, but employed of the Lord to communicate to the people, who would be permitted to be carried away captives to Babylon. That there was and is amongst us, a Babel now building whose top is intended to reach unto heaven, which must and will come down; that this is, (though not clearly seen by ourselves,) peeling and scattering amongst us, which clearly shown in the vision and light of the Lord; and that if we did not repent and return, we should be left very few in number. But that the Lord would not leave himself without a people, &c. She spoke further reference to some, who had been rightly gifted to speak the word of the Lord as from the mouth of the Lord; but who for want of dwelling low and deep enough, had had their brightness dimmed,—adding, 'when Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel, but when he offended in Baal, he died.'"

Again in 1834 she wrote: "My soul weeps in secret and is troubled for my own dear people! Surely we are fast mingling with the world at large, and not a few of the most active are taking retrograde steps, as though having begun in the Spirit, we could be made perfect by the flesh. * * * My dear husband and I have much to be in endeavoring to keep firmly to the ancient testimonies. Friends; we are considered 'very narrow hearted, ignorant,' and 'blind by prejudice' but while we long that self may be of no reputation with us, we do believe that the strictness is in that which moves off from the immutable and invincible foundation, even 'Christ within, the hope of glory.'—yea, while there may be great profession of faith in the outward and visible appearance of Him, our blessed Redeemer, and of his being the propitiation for our sins; all of which we old-fashioned Quakers as assuredly believe in at the present, and possibly feel full as thankful for in unfeigned and humble gratitude to Him whose name is above every name."

Sarah (Lynnes) Grubb again, in 1837, thus pens her feelings: "What occasions me the most sorrow, is that in this day of sifting a from sieve to sieve, we have, in a Society capacity, retarded the great work, and owned much which the great Lord of the heritage has appointed to be winnowed away. O, the consideration hereof weighs down my spirit and because there appears at present no remedy, my soul weeps in secret places, and I go mourning all the day long; yet there is a times a humble, but sure hope, that there will be a discerning more clearly between thing and thing, between the covering which is not of God's spirit, and that which He prepares and grants to those who are truly watchful."

Again S. L. G. writes: "Some of us see the necessity of being ranged conspicuously on the side of primitive Quakerism, and warning faithfully of the danger of things creeping in, that from their nature and tendency must divide, must indeed separate, whether there be an outwardly drawing the line of division yea or nay. In fulfilling the will of our heavenly Father, we must endeavor to leave consequences, and run the risk of being ourselves wounded by the arrows of the archers, and perhaps even carry the marks of our engagements with us, like scars from head to foot, to be seen to the end of our days."

Again in 1838: "May the dear young people be aware how it behoves them, as they value their truest interests, to yield to that living power and influence which regenerates the soul, and leads into a separation from conformity to this world, in its vain, yea, its evil customs, its friendships, and its foolish fashions; all which, while they alienate from the love of God, are themselves passing away, and will leave their votaries nothing but vexation of Spirit. It is they who receive the Kingdom in the way of his coming, to whom power is given to become the children of the Highest; born again of that which is inconvertible; for they can overcome every obstacle, in believing implicitly in the appearance of Him who bade his disciples to be of good cheer; for, said He, 'I have overcome the world.' * * * Although there are, I trust, in all religious professions, those who are promoters of the coming of the Redeemer's kingdom on the earth, living up to the light afforded, yet does it seem to me that this people are peculiarly called to exalt the testimonies of the unchangeable Gospel, even in its meridian effulgence. Let not our children conclude, that if there ever was utility in our plain and peculiar manner of life, and unceremonious worship, that has long since ceased; for surely the Lord will have a simple-hearted people still, and a people who hold Christianity in its native purity; yea, our offspring are designed to come forward, and practically adopt the language, 'I am the Lord's'; glorify Him with their bodies and with their spirits; for He is worthy of their energies, while in their full vigor, to be sanctified for his own blessed purposes, and that all his gifts should redound to his honor."

And again, in 1841, she testifies: "Thou and I think alike about our poor, degenerated Society. I only wish that they who are not of us would go right out, and leave a little band, who are united in the Gospel of the lowly Jesus, and who cannot do mighty works merely by extolling Him in name; yea, are faint without the renewings of the Holy Spirit upon them. There is a little stirring among our youth in some places, but alas! where are the fathers and the mothers? Oh! how little true discernment is left. Ministers are acknowledged, and elders are chosen; but, in too many instances, it evidences itself to be the work of man; at least there is a deplorable mixture still amongst us."

Lastly on the bed of death in 1842, as recorded of her: "Oh! there's but one way after all. The good old way is the only one for us." "Her thoughts were evidently much occupied respecting our religious Society, and its low state; yet she said slighting Society, and saying that she thought she could see 'one here and another there,' who would be raised up for the cause of truth, though she knew not who they might be. She mourned that so few appeared to 'prefer Jerusalem above their chief joy,' as she thought she might thankfully say she had done; acknowledging a consoling sense, at times, of having done her part in submitting to be made use of as a stone of the street; and also of having been enabled to 'fight the good fight,' and to 'keep the faith'; adding, 'Oh! it is a fine thing to have done this—to have 'kept the faith' through all.' The horizon of our little world, our little Society, looks dull to me. There must be more shaking, more overturning, I believe."

John Barclay, in 1834, writes: "No conviction awaits us; it might be better for us if it were so. No, no; the enemy is wiser than to foment this; he would not hurt us for the world; no, only let us be induced to give up the true foundation for another, and he promises no gently and peaceably to glide us on in it, that we shall not know it, except that it will be less rugged and hard to flesh and blood, without any cross or struggle, and there shall be nothing taken from us that we affect to prize, such as our customs and traditions, our church system, and so forth, nothing shall be disturbed of all this, and all the professors and the world too, shall love us the better."

Sarah Tacker in the same year hopefully predicts: "I think I have a little gleam of better days; for it always appeared to me that buildings, however stately, without good foundation, were of short duration; because they will not, they cannot, in the very nature of things, endure trial, but when the fire, the wind, and the earthquake approach and beat against them, they must fall; and, I believe, that after all these have spent themselves and are passed away, a quiet serenity and stillness will succeed; at which time it will be a season of returning and of gathering unto that city which hath foundations whose builder and maker the Lord is. This I pray the Almighty Father to hasten in his own time; and I do believe that the Lord is yet graciously disposed to build up Zion, and to strengthen the walls of Jerusalem, and will be, yea is now pleased, with the sacrifices of righteousness, and will preserve a remnant who will be found willing to suffer for the testimonies of Jesus, concerning to magnify the law, and make it honorable; even the law of the Lord after the inner man."

An impressive testimony of Jonathan Evans, in 1839, when near the close of his valuable life, was, "I am satisfied that there is a spirit at work, which would lay waste the ancient profession and doctrines of our religious Society, and draw Friends away from the spirituality of that which they have once known; and many are caught with it."

In 1845 Ezra Comfort testified: "May we continue, striving to keep in the everlasting patience, and be favored to possess our souls in it until the Judge of all the earth says 'it is enough,' and stretches out his hand of eternal power over the oppressors of his Israel; and by his judgments, brings forth his people out of this furnace of affliction. He will, in his own time, accomplish it, and I marvel not if the child is born who will live to see better times than any now living have yet seen; and may the Lord hasten the work He is about to do in the earth, even if it is by his awful judgments, to bring that day forth when the Lamb shall reign over all, and give his followers the victory."

Christopher Healy, in 1847, adds this testimony: "This is a sifting time to the members of our Society. I have believed our poor Society will yet be sifted as wheat is sifted in a sieve, for it is declared, 'I will overturn, overturn, overturn, saith the Lord, until He shall come whose right it is to rule and reign.' Our Israel is too much mixed among the people of the world. The language of my soul is, come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will save you. * * * Oh that this blessed day might come to the church; then will judges be restored as at the first, and counsellors as at the beginning. I do believe this time will come, though a great falling away may take place first; but a people, a favored remnant will be preserved of the true principle and name of Quakers."

Again in 1850, C. Healy writes: "It is a blessed declaration, that the mountains flowed down at the presence of the Lord. When this scourge has sifted our poor Society enough, He will take the work into his own hands and show who are his friends and who are his enemies, as He has in some measure begun to do already."

The same year, 1850, Sarah Hillman thus bears her testimony: "Truly we live in a day wherein we may well take up the mournful lamentation of the prophet respecting many of those who stood in the fore ranks even of the people, 'Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water,' and ofttimes under a sense of our own jeopardy, and the state of the church, we are clothed in sackcloth, and stationed as at Marah's waters, while in the depth of our humiliation and distress, we are made willing to go to the King as Esther did with the petition, 'Lord, if I perish, let it be at thy feet.' 'Spare thy people, O Lord.' * * * Those who ever situated who belong to his church militant on earth, who are of one heart and of one way, who desire to know nothing save the Lord Jesus and Him crucified, and are striving together, though separated by bonds, for the 'blessed hope of the gospel.' These are they who can in this day testify as did the apostles of old, of those things which they have seen with their eyes, which they have tasted, and which their hands have handled, of the good word of life, and having descended into suffering and death, and for their dear Saviour, can call upon others to come and have fellowship with them, in that blessed fellowship which is with the Father and with the Son, and with one another in Him."

These selections might be greatly multiplied; but enough have been given clearly to show, to the willing and easy-taught mind, the high appreciation in which the precious doctrines and testimonies committed to us were held by men and women of much experience and worthy of much honor, now passing away; and also the danger of attempting to remedy our making innovations upon, or in any wise lessening their application or force down to the latest time, or until "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ." It is written, "Whoso breaketh an hedge a serpent shall bite him." Would that the hedge around this Society, which has proved so effectual for more than two hundred years, might not, in principle or practice, from whatever cause, be impaired or broken through. May all, in this day of much intellectual inquiry and research—of ease, excess, and refinement—beware of the plausible baits of the serpent that so lieth in wait to deceive; who cares not who, or when or how he beguiles; and whose divinations and enchantments and desolating purpose can only be turned from by heeding the injunction of our Divine Lawgiver, "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation;" by our keeping fast hold of "the shield of faith, wherewith we shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked;" and by walking in lowly obedience to the light of Christ, whereby "all things that are reprobable are made manifest," even the in-speaking word of the grace of God, which is able to build us up, and which when obedience keeps pace with knowledge, brings salvation.

The New English Dictionary.—In 1857, a paper was read before the Philological Society by Archbishop Trench, then Dean of Westminster, on "Some Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries." In 1859, the Society issued their "Proposal for the publication of a new English Dictionary," in which the characteristics of the proposed work were explained, and an appeal made to the English and American public to assist in collecting the raw materials for the work, these materials consisting of quotations illustrating the use of English words by all writers of all ages and in all senses, each quotation being made on a uniform plan on a half sheet of note paper, that they might in due course be arranged and classified alphabetically and by meanings. This appeal met with a generous response; some hundreds of volunteers began to read books, make quotations, and send in their slips to "sub-editors," who volunteered each to take charge of a letter or part of one, and by whom the slips were in turn further arranged, classified, and to some extent used as the basis of definitions and skeleton schemes of the meaning of words in preparation for the dictionary. During the last three years the Philological Society have been earnestly trying to turn to account the vast store of material—some tons in weight—already accumulated, and they have recently succeeded in making an arrangement with the delegates of the Clarendon Press, in the University of Oxford, for the preparation and publication of a dictionary from these materials. By reducing the quotations to short sentences, clauses, or phrases, of a line or a line and a half, sufficient to illustrate the meaning of the word and complete the sense, it has been estimated that it may be comprised in a work of more than four times the size of Webster, say in four thick volumes quarto. It is intended that a first part of four hundred pages containing the letter A, shall be ready in 1882, the remaining parts to follow at regular intervals till the whole is finished.—Selected.

Little children have often very tender consciences, and are perfectly aware when they have been "naughty."

"A little girl one day said to her mother: "Papa calls me good, auntie calls me good, and everybody calls me good; but I am not good."

"I am very sorry," said the mother.

"And so am I," said the child; "but I have got a very naughty think."

"A naughty what?"

"My think is naughty inside of me."

And on her mother inquiring what she meant, she said: "Why, when I could not ride yesterday, I did not cry nor anything; but when my was gone, I wished the carriage would turn over, and the horses would run away, and every thing bad. Nobody knew it; but God knew it, and He cannot call me good. Tell me, mamma, how can I be good inside of me."—Chambers' Journal.

Brief Spiritual Observations.

Extracted from the Writings of Isaac Pennington, No. 1.

The true way to life eternal, is by believing in the light of the Spirit, which shineth in the conscience. Man is in darkness, which keeps him in death; and there is no way to come out of the death, but by coming out of the darkness; and there is no way to come out of the darkness, but by following that light which discovers it, and calls forth from it; and he that follows that, cannot remain in the darkness, but must needs come out. There is an evil principle in man, calling for evil; and there is a good principle calling from the evil to the good: Now he that follows the good, cannot follow the evil, but departs from it. "I am the light of the world, (saith Christ); he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." John viii. 12.

As for free-will;—The will with the freedom of it, either stands in the image and power of Him that made it, or in a contrary image and power. While it is in the image and power of Him that made it, it is free unto good, and not to evil; while it is in the image and power of him who corrupted it, it is free unto evil, and not to good. The will is not of itself, but stands in another, and is servant to that in whom it stands; and there its freedom is bound and comprehended. For there is no middle state between both, wherein the will stands of itself, and is free to both equally; but it is a servant, and under the command of one of these powers. Such a free-will as men commonly speak of, is mere imagination, and hath no foundation in the true state of things.

The regenerate and born of God are partakers of the divine nature, and wait on God for living food, and receive it of Him, and live by it; and cannot abide dead, dry, notional food, nor feed upon it. Blessed be the Lord, there is that birth known, which can feed on nothing but life itself. And let the power of darkness present the fruit of the dead tree ever so often, the living babe will not meddle with it; but hangers and thirsts after righteousness, and desires the sincere milk of the pure living word, that it may grow thereby. And if this holy nature be put into the babe, how much stronger is it in those that are grown in truth, and who come to be naturalized into it; the contrary nature being crucified and slain in them by the cross of Christ, and the new and holy nature ruling in them!

The inward man, the new man, the spiritual man, have inward and spiritual senses. Christ's sheep have spiritual ears to hear his voice withal; and a spiritual eye is given to the spiritual man, to see Him who otherwise is invisible. There is also a spiritual taste to savor and distinguish between that which is living and that which is dead; between that which is corrupt and unwholesome, and that which is wholesome food; and by the exercise of these senses, the children of God become more and more skillful in discerning between good and evil.

Keep to the sense, keep to the feeling; beware of the understanding, beware of the imaginary conceiving mind. These cannot be for God, nor bring forth anything for God, until they be new cast, and new moulded. Thine seed of life lies in the invisible, in the hidden man of the heart, among multitudes of seeds of death; all which have their growth up into, and strength in, the corrupted natural condition. So that this seed cannot shoot up into any part of the natural, but the other seeds shoot up with it and endeavor to choke it. Now the other seeds spring two ways, either in a way of opposition against the true seed, or in a way of similitude. The cannot be a good thought, or desire, or beam of light, enter into the understanding or wit but multitudes of evil thoughts, evil desire or fleshly reasonings against it, will spring up with it and strive to overbear it. And if the enemy be at length overcome, by the power of God fighting with him and vanquishing him, then he hath (or assumes) his garment of light; then he brings in thoughts and desire and notions like God's, which easily pass for good, if the soul keeps not close upon the water. * * * Now the only way of safety is to keep out of the natural, whereof the enemy hath possession, and where his strength lie and to keep in the sense and feeling of the invisible seed; and only to come forth with Him in that sense and feeling. When He comes He will come with strength, above thy strength that the enemy hath in the natural and by degrees conquer him.

Wait patiently the Lord's leisure. Be not hasty after life and salvation in the will of thy flesh; but leave the Lord to choose his own season for the showering down of his mere and blessing. The Lord will not presently entertain that spirit which hath adulterated from Him; but there must be a time of sorrow, a time of purifying and cleansing. * Therefore lie still, and bear the indignation of the Lord against that which hath transgressed, until He judge it, and deliver from it, and lead into the innocency and righteousness. Think not the race long, nor the battle hard, nor be weary of the afflictions and chastisements in the way; but follow the Captain, the Guide, the Leader; whose light strength, courage, and wisdom will overcome all, and bring the soul which abides in it into his own throne."

How commonly we show our distrust of God, or our dissatisfaction with Him, in ordinary speech! How much easier is it for us to look at his ways and works in the light of our own comfort, rather than in the light of his love and wisdom! "It is a bad day this," said a gentleman, one cold wet day of last week, as he stopped to make a purchase of a poor woman at a fruit-stand near the city post-office. She was thinly clad. She had no umbrella. The drizzling rain was chilling her blood. It seemed a kind thing to show sympathy by saying to her that the day was a bad one. "Well, we call it a bad day, sir," she replied cheerily; "but I suppose it's very good day. I suppose this is just the weather we need." And she was right, while he who spoke to her was wrong. What if we are under the clouds? What if the air is chilly? What if we do grow cold, and are wet, and shiver? Something else is needed in this world than unvarying sunlight, and uniform warmth, and never-changing dryness. There would be death to all, without that from which we shrink. This is as true in the moral world as in the natural. God knows best what is good for us. When He sends us orrow and privation and perplexity and trial, we call them bad; but really they are good. "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter." Woe unto them that say that God's way is a bad way, or that God's gifts are evil!—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend"

Faithful to the End.

The following extracts from the Memoirs of James Gough, are offered for insertion in "The Friend." I believe it is good for us often to recur to first principles and practices. It was by the "grace of God" our early Friends were what they were, and it may be by the same grace that any of us will be enabled to come up to the same stature in the truth that any of them attained unto, and were as "lights in the world," a "city set on a hill, which could not be hid," &c. Truth remains the same; it is unchangeable as its author, Jesus Christ; the same to-day, yesterday and ever; there is no new way to the kingdom; the way to the "erown" is by the way of the cross;" Christ Jesus is the only "door into the sheepfold" (10th of John), and the sheep hear his voice and follow Him, &c. May we wise in time, before it be said, "The summer is over and gone, the harvest is ended, ad I am not saved!" J. S.

OH, 12th mo. 23d, 1879.

"Many of our dear, honorable Friends of my first generation in our Society, appear on the time they were drawn to the pure fountain of light, life and love, to have altered their last moments; and a few I have known in my time who have arisen, and readily persevered, considering the degeneracy of the age, in a faithful attachment of soul to that grace and truth, which is come by Jesus Christ; and that have washed their robes white in his blood, and have kept their garments unspotted. But very few have come up to this height, and so continued as with their feet fixed upon Mount Zion; very few have got over the opposing mountains of human respect, selfish regards, sensual appetes, desires of the ease, honors, or profits of his world; all which tend to debase the soul, darken the judgment, eclipse the brightness of heavenly light; blunt the edge of Godly resolutions, and contract the corrupting leaven and spirit of the world.

"It is lamentable to reflect how many in our age, even of the anointed sons and servants of the Lord, have by these means gradually declined and dwindled, and at length totally fallen off, as Judas did from Christ, and Demas from his faithful apostle, and made shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience, and brought lasting disgrace on themselves and that good cause in which they had been huly and honestly engaged. Yet truth changes not; it is the same still, and still able to preserve from falling, to build up, and to give an inheritance among the sanctified."

C. H. Spurgeon says: "I see it publicly avowed by men who call themselves Christians that it would be advisable for Christians to frequent the theatre that the character of the drama might be raised. The suggestion is about as sensible as if we were bidden to pour a bottle of lavender into a great sewer to improve its aroma."

Curing Beef by Injecting Brine.—The infiltration system of salting beef, by filling the blood-vessels with brine, is attracting considerable attention in Australia. In some recent experiments at Brisbane, bullocks were treated as follows: At the instant of killing, the animal's heart was laid bare, and incisions were made in both ventricles. Into the orifice of the left ventricle a pipe was inserted, and a stream of weak brine was forced through the blood-vessels, washing out all the blood. Pressure was obtained by having the brine in an elevated tank. After the expulsion of the blood, the right ventricle was closed by a clamp, and stronger brine was forced in until all the blood-vessels were full. In this way the distribution of the brine through every part of the meat is said to be complete and the curing perfect. It is proposed to send to the Sydney Exhibition a whole bullock thus preserved.

Chinese Horticultural Ingenuity.—The Fatee gardens in Canton are nurseries in which are cultivated vast numbers of plants for the supply of the private gardens of the Chinese. Here may be seen also numerous specimens of horticultural ingenuity, and dwarf plants, miniature trees and shrubs curled and bent in every imaginable form, and trained, besides, into the forms of animals and other objects—frogs, pagodas, baskets, elephants and castles, fairs, stages among trees, human beings, fish, sampans, cats, scrolls, vases, &c., &c. These grotesque plants are usually dwarfed and trained over a wire frame-work, many of the form intended to be represented. They are kept carefully clipped, and suggestions are added to keep up the illusion, in the shape of eggshells with a black spot to represent eyes, painted faces, feet, &c.; so that it is by no means difficult to recognize the intended shape. The dwarfing is effected in the usual way, by confining the roots in small pots; but I saw none of those wonderfully minute specimens in which the Japanese so greatly excel. It is amusing to see a Chinese gardener water his choice plants. Taking as much water as his mouth will hold, he squirts it out all over the plant in a fine rain.—Colinvaux's Naturalist in China.

Whirlwind.—Numerous small circular whirlwinds swept across the plain, carrying up clouds of ash and dust. One of these, of unusually large dimensions, rose rapidly, not far from us, in a cylindrical form, somewhat resembling the smoke of a large fire. So like was it that it completely deceived a kite, which, flying towards it, rose up to hover over the supposed smoke, in order to pounce on vermin, started by the fire which it inferred was beneath. The upward revolving current of air caught the bird; and, with wings outspread, apparently unable to escape, upwards it went with great rapidity. Feeling deeply interested in its fate, I watched it till it became a mere speck, and then faded completely out of sight in the grasp of the whirlwind.—Brown's Guiana.

Enjoyment of a Naturalist.—In the pursuits of a naturalist there are sources of satisfaction not suspected by the uninitiated. To the botanist almost every specimen is linked in the memory with the spot where it was collected; and as he goes through the produce of his day's work, every minute detail is vividly presented to the mind. The wonder and awe that dwell around the mountain fastnesses, the consolation of the forest glade, the indefinable grandeur of the desert plain, nay, even the bleak solitariness of northern moorland and morass—these dominant impressions suggested by the aspects of nature are varied and enriched for the naturalist by the myriad phases of beauty that are disclosed to the eye of the observer. The glory of color in the Gentian and Saxifraga and golden Alyssum, and the other bright creatures that haunt the mountain tops; the tender grace of the delicate ferns that dwell in the rocky clefts; the teeming life of the warm woodland; the strange beauty of the unaccustomed forms that spring up in the desert solitude—these and countless other images are instantaneously revived by contact with the specimen that grew beside them. Strangest of all is, perhaps, the enduring nature of this connection. Often does it happen, as many a botanist can testify, that after the lapse of a quarter of a century, the sight of a specimen will bring back the picture, seemingly effaced long ago, of its original home.—Hooker's Morocco.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 10, 1880.

Our readers may remember that in No. 15 of the present volume of "The Friend," there was printed part of a communication received from a member of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, and describing a so-called devotional meeting, held in the evening after the close of the Yearly Meeting. In it was this sentence: "Some [of the women] left their seats and came over among the men and caressed and knelt by their sides."

Our attention has been called to a statement made by one of the visitors who was present, to the purport that the communication referred to gave an exaggerated account; and that there was but one such occurrence as that described, and that in this case it was a Methodist woman present who caressed her husband, in her anxiety for his spiritual welfare. He does not particularize any other point in which he thought our correspondent was inaccurate. We have no desire that things should be represented as any worse than they actually were; and are willing cheerfully to mention the palliating circumstance thus brought to our notice. We suppose no one doubts the modesty and propriety of behavior, under ordinary circumstances, of the women who were present at this meeting; and the reference of our correspondent to the occurrence, which his critic admits to have taken place, was designed to show the unusually disturbed and excited condition of the assembly, which alone rendered such an incident possible.

We have again communicated with our North Carolina correspondent, who confirms his previous statement, as not exaggerated, and says, it is evident that the one who criticised his remarks did not see all that was passing. As an illustration of the unsettled state of the meeting, he specifies one case (not that of the Methodist woman above referred to), in which a woman, a member of our Society, threw her arms around a man who was kneeling, and called by name upon one of the ministers present to come and pray for him. The minister responded by coming, kneeling at his side and uttering words in the form of prayer. But although this occurred in the immediate vicinity where our informant was sitting, the general noise and confusion was such, at the time, that what was said could not be distinctly heard.

This conflict of testimony between the two witnesses does not involve any question of veracity—for we give credit for honesty to both of them. It is easy to understand how much might transpire, which would pass without notice by one engaged in what was going on, especially in a large gathering, where some were kneeling, others passing to and fro, and exclamations, singing, and praying were being uttered simultaneously. One of the Friends thought the excitement that prevailed was an evidence of the awakening visitations of the Holy Spirit; and the other could feel no spiritual life or comfort in the whole proceeding, but regarded it as the outgrowth of un sanctified zeal. This difference of judgment almost unavoidably quickened or blunted their power of observation, as the case might be; and has affected their reports of the meeting.

We have received a printed copy of the Minutes of Indiana Yearly Meeting, held at Richmond, commencing 10th mo. 1st, 1879. Though considerable time has since elapsed, a few items from it may be of interest.

The Trustees of the Indiana Manual Labor Institute, founded by the late Josiah White, of Philadelphia, reported that twenty-four children were receiving its benefits.

The Trustees of the White's Iowa Institute of a similar character, proposed some changes in the "Articles of Association" respecting its reducing the number of Trustees from nine to three, and transferring the appointing power from Indiana to Iowa Yearly Meeting. These propositions were approved.

Thirteen ministers had been recorded during the previous year.

The statistical table gives the whole number of members 17,454, and of meetings 120.

The school among the colored people at Helena, Arkansas, had been kept up with an attendance of 177 scholars. Southland Monthly Meeting, composed of colored people, and located at the same place, has 175 members.

Seven hundred and fifty-one members of the Yearly Meeting are reported as using tobacco, at an annual cost of about $7 for each person.

Earlham College had been attended by 159 students, of whom 103 were members of our Society.

The average attendance at Spiceland Academy was about 200.

We have also received the printed minutes of North Carolina Yearly Meeting—of the proceedings of that Meeting some notice has already appeared in our columns.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature of the Twelfth month was 28.8 degrees; for the last six years the average was 35 deg. The lowest point was 11 deg. on the 27th. Total rainfall 4.69 inches. Snow fell on 13 days, amounting to about 21 inches. Prevailing direction of wind S. W.; maximum velocity 32 miles per hour.

The winter, so unusually mild in these parts, has been uncommonly severe in Minnesota, which is snowed up, and has had the thermometer nearly 60 deg. below zero.

Last year's engine were constructed by the Baldwin Locomotive works.

There were 106 drowning cases in this city during 1879; and 13 persons run over and killed by the passenger cars.

The Tribune Herald's monthly oil report gives the number of wells completed in last month in the Bradford field as 182, producing 3765 barrels; in the lower country 80 wells, producing 382 barrels. Total for the month 417 barrels.

Charles Parsons, the Irish Home Rule leader, arrived in New York on the 2nd inst, and was welcomed by a large delegation of Irish American citizens. His prospect is stated to be, to visit all the principal cities of the United States.

The profits of the Sing Sing Penitentiary during 12th month were $20,922.

Eighteen Indian pupils—eleven girls and five boys—aged from 17 to 20 years, arrived at the Humpston Normal School, from the Yankton Agency, on the 30th ult.

During last year, 89 vessels cleared from Portland, Oregon, for Europe, with 1,930,000 barrels of wheat, valued at $3,611,240, and 200,008 cents of flour, valued at $1,143,352.

The public debt statement for last month shows a reduction of $1,294,217.

The net amount of revenue receipts for the six months ending 12th mo. 3rd, were $2,904,386 more than during the corresponding period of 1878.

The excess of exports over imports of merchandise for the year, was $266,288,672; and the excess of imports of gold and silver coin and bullion for the same period was $91,740,885.

The opinion of the Supreme Court of Maine upon the questions submitted by Governor Garcelon, was given on the 3rd inst. It is signed by all the judges, and is against the action of the Governor and Council on nearly all points; the court holding that voters ought not to be deprived of their rights on account of non-residence.

Eleven more men from the lost steamer Borussia—five passengers and six sailors—were picked up on the 5th ult., 400 miles west of the Azores, and arrived at Baltimore on the 6th inst.

A fire occurred in Baltimore on the night of the 2d, which destroyed several large warehouses, containing 3000 bales of cotton, and other merchandise—the loss is estimated at $200,000.

The mortality in Philadelphia during the past week numbered 317, of whom 187 were adults, and 132 children—22 being under one year of age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 104; do. 5's, registered, 102½; coupon, 103½; 4½'s, 1891, 106½; 4's, 1907, 103½.

Cotton.—Prices were firm. Sales of middlings are reported at 12½ a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white 8½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 9 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is dull and barely steady. Sales of 1400 barrels, including Minnesota extra, at $6.50 a $7.12½; Penna. do., $6.75 a $7.25; western do., at $7 a $7.50, all patent and other high grades at $7.75 a $8.75. Rye flour, is in better demand at $5.50 a $5.62½.

Grain.—What is inactive and weak. Sales of 8,000 bushels, including rejected, at 14½; red at $1.52; amber, $1.53 a $1.53½. Rye is firm at 98 cts. Corn is in better request. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including old mixed and old yellow at 65 cts., and new do. at 59 a 59 cts. for steamer, and 59½ cts. for sail. Oats are quiet, but firm. Sales of 6000 bushels, including stained, at 47 cts., and white at 48½ a 50 cts. The receipts to-day were as follows: 2500 barrels flour; 20,500 bush. wheat; 2500 bush. corn; 500 bush. rye; 11,200 bush. oats; 3500 bushels barley.

Hay and straw market for week ending 1st inst 3rd, 1880.—Loads of hay, 300; loads of straw, 80. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.05; mixed, 85 a 95 cts. per 100; poor, 100; straw, $1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds.

Beecattle were dull and prices were a fraction lower; 2191 head sold at the different yards at 3 a 6 cts. per lb. gross as to condition. Sheep were in demand at an advance of 20 cts. in Ireland, causing much change to the lambst at 51 a 61 cts. per lb. Hogs were dull, rather lower; 5000 head sold at 6 a 7½ cts. per lb. and a few choice at 7½ cts. Cows were unchanged; 275 head sold at $20 a $50 per head.

FOREIGN.—Terrific gales are reported from all parts of the British Islands, causing much damage to property. The steamer Silesia, which left Hamburg on the 21th ult., after encountering tremendous hurricanes for three days, put into Plymouth Sound with her steering gear badly damaged.

The Bank of England has voted £600 towards the fund instituted by the Lord Mayor of London, for the relief of the distress in Ireland.

General Roberts telegraphs from Afghanistan, if the country is now quiet. His communications have been restored. Numbers of people are returning Cabul, and supplies are coming in.

The rivers Rhine and Moselle have swollen in consequence of the blocking of their currents—several towns are inundated, and there is great alarm in the neighboring districts.

The drift-ice in the Seine has become so heavy as cause great damage, and much alarm is felt. Seven of the bridges have been rendered unsafe, and travel over them has been stopped.

The Turkish Mission Aid Society have written to Times regarding the famine in Northern Persia, stating that the famine in that region is increasing daily, and that unless strenuous efforts are made to send help from England and America, a great number of the poor people to perish. There are only two month's supply of food to sustain them for the next seven months.

The revolutionary spirit in Russia is manifested itself among the soldiers. In consequence of which the military authorities have ordered that henceforth no regiment shall be stationed in the district where it was recruited.

As the King and Queen of Spain were driving through the gate of the royal palace, a few evenings since, young man fired two shots at the royal carriage, one which passed close to the queen's face. The would-be assassin was arrested, and has been committed to prison.

An American engineer named Crawford, recent sailed from Yokohama, authorized to make complete purchase of stock and materials for an American railway in Yezo, to extend from the coal fields in the interior through the city of Sapporo, the capital of Yezo to a port on the northern coast.

The town of Hokodaidi, in Yezo, was largely damaged by fire on the 7th ult. About 2300 houses were burnt—being one-fifth of the whole number.

DIED, in New Hope, Bucks Co., Pa., on the 7th 10th month, 1879, WILLIAM F. NEWBOLD, in the 80th year of his age, a member of Buckingham Particular and Monthly Meetings, Philadelphia for the West District. He was remarkable for purity of character. While in health he became religious, and adopted the principles of Friends from conviction. In the prospect of death he said to a friend: "I have committed no cause to the Lord, and feel true trust in Him." His position of Scripture that he read to his mother, set applicable to him: "A book of remembrance was written before Him, for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be with the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up jewels."—Malachi iii. 16, 17.

1865. 11th mo. 12th. Looked over the farm and some of the timber lands (at Tunesassa), in the afternoon attended a council. I felt of little account, though I thought I felt for the welfare of the Indians, and spoke a few words to them. How necessary it is, that we should be willing to be anything or nothing, as it may please the Great Head of the Church.

13th. Met three men and let a job of getting in about 300 logs at $1 a log. In the afternoon started for home; I felt sorrowful, as we passed through the upper part of the reservation, to think we were passing the Indians there without any of us calling to see them. * * I felt anxious to get home to attend our Quarterly Meeting.

12th mo. 15th. Since the Quarterly Meeting I have at times felt a good deal discouraged, but for the most part have been pretty comfortable in meetings; which I esteem a great blessing, and has been an encouragement in my trials out of meetings. I hope I have felt the necessity of being emptied of self, and humbled.

12th mo. 26th. I trust I have been favored if late to feel a comforting evidence of Divine regard. Oh may it stimulate to greater faithfulness; a more entire surrender to the Divine will, which cannot be attained to in my own strength.

31st. Our meeting to-day was held in silence, and a precious covering, I think, was felt by a number; to me it was a comfortable one.

1896. 1st mo. 13th. I feel unwell, which I hope is permitted for my good. May I be wholly Thine, dearest Master, soul, body and spirit, and the praise be forever Thine.

14th. Was taken quite unwell last night. Had I not have felt a very precious sense of the goodness of my Divine Master, I should have felt very miserable. Oh! what an unappreciated favor to me, a poor unworthy sinner. May I no longer trifle with his mercies. The doctor was sent for in the morning—did not get here until evening.

15th. But little better; brother came and staid with me last night; Samuel Cope came to see me to-day. May I be more careful to keep my proper place.

3rd mo. 3rd. Attended the funeral of my step-mother; died of something like pneumonia; another warning to be prepared for the final change. How cold and indifferent I seem prone to get in regard to things of the greatest importance—my duty to my Creator. Oh for more patient resignation to the Divine will; a living in a humble, watchful, prayerful state of mind. Oh! that the salt may not lose its savor. If I have been favored in unmerited mercy to feel a little of that good savor, may I be concerned to live so near the dear Master, that my life and conversation may savor of his good spirit unto the end.

5th mo. 27th. Unworthy as I am, I have reason to record the many mercies of a kind and merciful Providence to me. I have for some time been, I trust I may say, favored to enjoy our religious meetings—which I esteem a great favor. May I be preserved from becoming careless and lukewarm in my duty to my Divine Master, and patiently wait for a blessing. I have for a long time craved the ability to say "Thy will be done."

Our last Yearly Meeting I think was a favored one. May we all be united together in Him, who is the true and living Vine, and be favored to feel one is our Master, even Christ, and that all we are brethren. Oh! the sorrowful backsliding of many of our members; may those who are concerned for the prosperity of his militant church, strive to live nearer the Great Head of the Church, and experience their strength and concern to increase, and be more fruitful of good to the praise of his great and excellent name. The Quarterly Meeting's Committee was continued at last Quarter. I desire they may be faithful to feel after what the Great Head may please to require, and [seek for] ability to perform it.

6th mo. Attended Sadsbury Monthly Meeting. Samuel Cope laid a concern before it to visit the families and attenders of East Sadsbury Particular Meeting—A. M. and myself were appointed to accompany him. I think the visit was accomplished to pretty good satisfaction to the visited, and Samuel said to the satisfaction of his mind; a weighty service, and one that requires great care to feel after a qualification from the Great Head of the Church to perform the service aright. I think I may say I have also felt deeply interested for the welfare of the members of that meeting, and that the meeting may be continued.

7th mo. 15th. I think I have seldom sat more favored meeting; may I be concerned to try to make the best use of these opportunities. I have been favored for some time to enjoy our meetings more than usual. What a blessing!

21st. Attended East Sadsbury Meeting. It felt to me there was a solemn covering over the meeting, which I thought continued through the greater part; it was a long meeting, but way did not seem to open to close it sooner.

28th.—First-day. I have felt at times great weakness and my lonely situation—may I try to be more and more resigned to the Divine will. I think I was favored, through unmerited mercy; to feel a good degree of resignation to the Divine will in meeting to-day, and an interest for my own and the spiritual welfare of others—a refreshing meeting to me.

8th mo. 5th. I trust I may say in a degree of thankfulness, that after having at several times through the past week, felt great weakness, I have again been favored to enjoy another comfortable meeting.

9th mo. 20th. Accompanied Samuel Cope in a visit to S. and R. R., in which I thought he was favored; closed the visit to the members and attenders of Uchlan Particular Meeting. I am comforted in believing in most places left a good savor behind. May the labors be blessed to the praise of the Great Head of the Church, to whom all praise is due.

21st. Attended Meetings for Sufferings; there seemed to be a lively interest felt for the welfare of Society, and for the support of its precious doctrines and testimonies. After the close of the Meeting for Sufferings, the Indian Committee got together for the purpose of giving me the opportunity of informing them of a concern I had at times felt for several weeks to visit the Indians on the Allegheny reservation, which was united with, and I encouraged to attend to it. Oh may I be truly humbled before the Great Head of the Church, and endeavor to draw near to Him, seek to know his blessed will and do it—for He is forever worthy, worthy. May I not think too lightly of these things.

Dark Clouds.—A black cloud makes the traveller mend his pace and mind his home; whereas a fair day and pleasant way wastes his time, and that stealthily away his affections in the prospect of the country. However others may think of it, I take it as a mercy that now and then some clouds come between me and my Sun, and many times some troubles do conceal my comforts; for I perceive if I should find too much friendship in any man in my pilgrimage, I should soon forget my Father's house and my heritage.—Dr. Lucas.

Our Christian Testimonies.—It is cause of sorrow to observe that our Christian testimonies to plainness of speech, behavior, and apparel, and in the manner of living, are so much disregarded; and that a disposition is manifested to hold them in light esteem, as small matters not connected with the work of true religion. This is a source of much evil, and opens the door to weakness in other respects; the faithful maintenance of these testimonies being essential to our religious welfare and growth, both as individuals and as a society.—Thomas Evans.

Camps in the Caribbees.

During one of his continued excursions in the mountain forests, he met with a very curious procession.

"Climbing the steep hill side, and clinging by one hand as I climbed, giving all my attention to my work, I suddenly became conscious that I was surrounded by moving objects, whom I could hear as they rustled over leaves and rocks. I rubbed my eyes and looked around. Meyong, [his Indian attendant], was behind, but saw them at the same time I did, and eagerly shouted, 'Gardez! Ze crabs!' It was true, there was an army of crabs, and we were in the midst of it. It behooved us to get out of the way at once, for these crabs (as large as a good-sized crab of the sea-shore) have a disagreeable way of climbing up and over everything in their course, and of using their powerful claws upon the slightest provocation.

"Well, we got behind a large tree, and my guide made side forays upon them as they went by (for they are most delicious eating), until we had collected as many as we could carry.

"And how, think you, did he secure them? Why, he just tied their claws together with a liane, a small-cord-like root, and then placed them in a heap at his feet. Fortunate for us that this was a small army, otherwise I don't know how soon we could have pursued our way, for they sometimes travel by thousands. A very old French writer gives the only account that we can find of these crabs; and were it not that I had seen them on the march, there are some things he says the truth of which I should be inclined to doubt. They live not only in a kind of orderly and quiet society in their retreats in the mountains, but regularly once a year march down to the seaside in a body, some millions at a time. They choose the months of April and May to begin their expeditions, and then sally out from the stumps of hollow trees, clefts of rocks, and from holes which they dig for themselves in the earth.

"The sea is their destination, and here they cast their spawn. The eggs are hatched under the sand, and soon after, millions of the newborn crabs are seen quitting the shore, and slowly travelling up the mountains. The night is their chief time of travelling, but if it rains by day, they improve that occasion. When the sun shines, they make a universal halt till evening. In the season of moulting, they retire to their burrows to cast their shells, filling them with grass and leaves.

"My native boy's account of their habits agreed substantially with this, and he added, moreover, that if there was any one thing better than another, it was the flesh of these same crabs; a statement I can cheerfully verify, as that night we feasted on crab."

Among the productions of Dominica, coffee claims notice.

"Years ago it was cultivated to such an extent that it acquired a name and reputation; in the latter part of the last century there were over two hundred coffee plantations, giving an annual yield of three hundred thousand pounds; but with the abolition of slavery its culture languished, valuable coffee estates were abandoned, and at present the island does not produce sufficient for its own consumption. About forty years ago there appeared a blight upon the coffee plant that ruined whole crops and aided in the abandonment of its culture. This was in the shape of a coccus, a scale insect that fixed itself upon the leaves and buds, causing them to shrivel. This undoubtedly came of neglect, and increased until it acquired the mastery over the entire island. In Guadeloupe they have the scale insect, but it has never gained ascendancy over the planters, as more attention has been paid to the trees. Acting upon the theory that the leaf of the Mocha variety was too tender to resist the attacks of the insects, Dr. Inray has successfully introduced the Liberian variety, the epidemics of the leaves being thicker and tougher."

The cultivation of lime-trees is thus described:

"The valley of Battalie is one great field of lime-trees—a smooth sea of verdure—hiding beneath its surface golden fruit that is constantly dropping to the earth, and being carried to the stone mill beneath the cliff. Twenty years ago Dr. Inray conceived the plan of converting a poorly-paying sugar plantation into an orchard of limes, and he thus made of a narrow valley, riven from gigantic rocks and strewn with volcanic boulders, a garden of profit and delight. The majority of the trees are fifteen years old; they first bear at three years of age, and yield good crops at five years. Since the first full crop he has realized a large income from these trees, his manager informing me that during two seasons the returns amounted to two thousand pounds sterling each. The trees are thickly planted so as to shade the ground, and after they acquire their growth need no clearing beneath.

"The corps of boys and girls gather the limes as they fall to the earth—they are never picked—and carry them to the mill, where they are passed between two upright rollers, such as were in use when the sugar cane was raised there. The expressed juice is conducted to evaporating pans and boiled down to the consistency of molasses—to a density of one-tenth—and then run into fifty-gallon hog-heads for shipment to England. It was worth, in 1877, about twenty pounds sterling per hog-head, and has brought thirty pounds; and the plantation has yielded from seventy to eighty hog-heads in a season."

Be True.—There are persons whom you can always believe, because you know they have the habit of telling the truth. They do not "color" a story or enlarge a bit of news in order to make it sound fine or remarkable.

There are others whom you hardly know whether to believe or not, because they "stretch" things so. A trifling incident grows in size, but not in quality, by passing through their month. They take a small fact or slender bit of news and pad it with added words, and paint it with high-colored adjectives, until it is largely unreal and gives a false impression. And one does not like to listen to folks when so much must be "allowed for shrinkage."

Cultivate the habit of telling the truth in little things as well as in great ones. Pick your words wisely, and use only such as rightly mean what you wish to say. Never "stretch" a story or a fact to make it seem bigger or funnier. Do this, and people will learn to trust you and respect you. This will be better than having a name for telling wonderful stories or making foolishly and false "funny" remarks.

Dear young friends, be true. Do the truth. Tell the truth. There are many false tongues. Let yours speak the things that are put lovely, true.—S. S. Advocate.

A Plea for the Plain Dress.

It has been the experience of Christians all ages of the world, that as they were concerned to regulate their lives by "the law written in the heart," and by scriptural precepts, they have had the necessity laid upon them of observing moderation in all things. This restraint has been extended to their actions, their mode of life, their conversation and their dress. As regards the latter, you know that the preachers of the apostolic age taught that simplicity in clothing was consistent with true religion; and they held as their pattern, Him whose followers they were. Since their day it has been the concern of good men and women to dress unsummingly, no matter what religious denomination they belonged to. In reviewing the history of the Church, we observe that she has generally been a body of believers, who as a people felt called upon to bear a decided testimony in this particular; and for the past 200 years, the Society of Friends has been among the most earnest and practical advocates of this doctrine. Yet it is evident to its members in many places are now discarding this testimony; and the adoption of fashionable dress has so spread amongst us, that those not in our profession, notice this departure, and comment upon it in terms of regret and disapproval.

Our early Friends were constrained to observe simplicity in their dress, knowing, as they did that fine and expensive clothing fosters pride in the wearer, and excites envy or undue admiration in others. They felt that a meek and quiet spirit is the most beautiful ornament; and that life is too short to pass much time and thought in adorning the frail bodies that so soon must perish. They therefore laid aside all unnecessary display in their clothing; and were restrained by a sense of duty from following the constantly changing fashions of the world; and thus soon became noticeable for the plainness of their appearance and the different cut of their garments, as contrasted with the people around them. It is true that the distinctive dress of Friends has undergone material change since the rise of the Society; but in spite of this, their dress has always continued to be peculiar, and the changes in it have been in favor of greater simplicity and comfort.

We often hear it said, that the cut of a coat or the shape of a bonnet, does not make the Quaker, and this in part is correct; for it is only in the heart that the pure belief of Friends can be felt; yet experience has shown that the most spiritually-minded and sincere Friends, have generally felt themselves called upon to wear the distinctive dress of the Society; while many of those who reject this testimony, and yet are active in Church affairs, have been found to hold views inconsistent with its original doctrines.

This dress has been called a uniform, and declared to be an unnecessary cross for those who wear it; but I believe that many who thus speak, will acknowledge that it preserves the wearer from many temptations. A young man, for instance, will not wear his plain coat to the theatre or the race course. And when it may be necessary for him to mingle in fashionable company, he will find that when clothed as a Friend, he is not expected to violate either his own sense of what is right, or the testimonies of the Society to which he belongs. If, however, he does not so dress, he is more likely to follow the example of his associates, both in language and behavior.

I was recently conversing with a friend, who told me that when young his parents required him to wear a plain coat, but that on attaining manhood he resolved to free himself from the cross which so doing involved. He described his feelings on first wearing his fashionably cut clothes; and told me that it was a considerable period before these feelings were so deadened that he laid aside his plain coat altogether. I doubt not there are many who have thus felt, and who have in their youth, against their better feelings, given up what to them was a shield from evil. If these things should be read by any such, I would affectionately ask them to reconsider this matter; and seek to know their duty as individuals and as members of the Society of Friends. The adopting of the plain dress is often a bitter cup, but I know there is a satisfaction and a reward in following our convictions of duty, which can only be appreciated by those who do so.

The journals and memorials of some of the concerned members of our Society who have gone before us, show that when they were really converted to its principles, they were constrained to change from their former worldly mode of dress; and that in doing so they were humbled, and were enabled to bear a striking testimony against the changing fashions of the day in which they lived. Do the men and women of this generation, so mortify their pride, and so live up to the requirements of the Christian religion as regards their dress, that we as a people no longer need, by precept or example, to call their attention to the subject? I particularly desire for my young friends, that they may be concerned to give heed to these considerations, and not lightly set aside as useless, that which may prove a strength and preservation to them in years to come. If the impression is forced home to our minds that we should lay aside some little ornament, or refrain from indulging the desire for the latest cut of a coat or a dress; we will find that giving heed to such convictions will be attended with a positive blessing. As our members thus adhere to this ancient testimony, they can more consistently and practically teach to the world around them, the bearing of the daily cross which was first enjoined by Him who wore the seamless garment.

Philadelphia, 12th mo. 1879.

The Scriptures are good, very good; discipline, good rules, and good order, all very necessary; but still it is the Spirit that quickens and giveth life; and every departure from a right dependence on it, every zealous movement in support of Truth's testimony independent of its necessary aid, tends to introduce death, and set man on the throne, instead of Him who is God over all forever.—J. Scott.

Keep not that the world changes—did it need a stable, changeless state, 'twere caused indeed to weep.

Brief Spiritual Observations.

Extracted from the Writings of Isaac Pennington.
No. 2.

"There is the natural man, and the spiritual man; and there are the persuasions of each in and about matters of religion. There is the persuasion of reason, and the persuasion of faith. The persuasion of reason is that belief which man receives into his mind or heart from the exercise of the reasoning faculty; and this persuasion in matters of religion is but man's opinion and judgment; which however certain or infallible it appears to him, may yet be shaken by a demonstration or evidence of a higher kind and nature.

"The persuasion of faith is that belief which the new creature receives in the renewed mind, from the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit. And this persuasion is certain and infallible, however it may be strack at and battered, by the reasonings of the wise earthly part, even in that very man whose heart is thus persuaded by the light of the Spirit of God, concerning the things of God's kingdom.

"Now the lowest persuasion of faith is higher, and of a more noble nature, than the highest persuasion of reason; because faith is of a higher principle, and of a deeper nature and ground, than man's reason is. Happy [therefore] is he, who knows and hearkens to the persuasions of God's Spirit, who receives his religion from the light of faith, into the renewed nature and mind, and not from the reason of man into the natural understanding, which is easily corrupted, and cannot be kept pure, except by the indwelling of the principle of eternal life in it.

"For though such may suffer very deeply in this world, from the men of this world, yet their principle will bear them out; in which God will appear to strengthen and refresh their spirits, and carry them up above all their sufferings, in the patience, meekness, and faith of the Lamb. And keeping to their principle they cannot be overcome, but must either live or die conquerors, according to the will and good pleasure of Him who ordereth and disposeth of all things well, and bringeth good out of every evil, in despite of all the powers of darkness."

"By this faith alone, which is the gift from above, is Christ received. For Christ can be received by the faith alone which comes from Him; and that faith which comes from Him cannot but receive Him. There is no distance of time; but so soon as faith is received, Christ is received, and the soul united to Him in the faith. As unbelief immediately shuts Him out, so faith lets Him in immediately, and centres the soul in Him; and the immortal soul feels the immortal virtue, and rejoices in the proper spring of its own immortal nature."

"We know no other Christ than that which died at Jerusalem, only we confess our chief knowledge of Him is in spirit. And as Christ said in the days of his flesh, that the way to know his Father, was to know Him; and he that knew Him knew the Father also; so we now witness that the way to know Christ is to know the Spirit; and that he that knoweth the Spirit, knoweth Christ also; with whom Christ is one, and from whom He cannot be separated. And as for imputed righteousness, it is too precious a thing to us, to be denied by us. That which we deny is men's putting it out of its place, applying it to them who are not in the true faith, and walk not in the true light; for in the true light (where the fellowship is with the Father and the Son) there alone the blood cleanseth."

"Hear now, ye wise in the letter, but strangers to the life! there is a two-fold appearance of Christ in the heart; there is an appearance of Him as a servant to obey the law, to fulfil the will of the Father in that body which the Father prepares there for Him; and there is an appearance of Him in glory, to reign in the life and power of the Father; and he that knows not the first of these in his heart shall never know the second there. And he that knows not these inwardly, shall never know any outward visible coming to his comfort. For if Christ should come outwardly to reign (as many expect), yet to be sure He would not reign in thee, whose heart He hath not first entered into and subdued to Himself; which is only to be done by his appearance there, first as a servant, then as a king."

"The work of the Spirit of Christ in the heart is an inward work, and doth not consist in outward times or seasons; but in spiritual degrees and seasons; which when they are finished, the heart renewed, the spirit changed, the work wrought out; then the glory of the Father is revealed, the entrance into the everlasting kingdom ministered, and then there is a sitting down in the everlasting mansion, even with Christ in the heavenly places, which He hath prepared; where they that are redeemed, and purged, and sanctified, sit together with Him. And as the body cannot hinder his entering into the spirits of his saints, and his dwelling in them, no more can it hinder their entering into Him, and dwelling in Him."

"There is a double ministration of the law of the Spirit; a sharp ministration against sin, and a sweet ministration in the renewed spirit. The ministration against sin passeth away, as the sin is wrought out [or ended]; but then the sweet spiritual current and law of its holy and pure life in the renewed spirit is more vigorous and full. So that the law of the Spirit remaineth for ever; but its convictions, its reproofs, its chastisements towards the worldly part, diminish and pass away as the worldly part is wasted; and its sweet comforting presence, pure peace, fresh joy and life, increase as the new man grows and flourishes."

"Happy is he who ceaseth from striving after the knowledge and comprehension of the things of God in this world's spirit and wisdom, and waiteth in the humility and fear of the Lord, first to be made a fool, that afterwards he may be made wise unto everlasting life."

I stand here as a witness for the God of Heaven. I never heard the voice of Christ (as his follower) till I was slain and baptized, and lay as a little child under his heavenly chastisements. As soon as ever my soul was brought to this in my humiliation, O then the dreadful judgment was taken away, and the Book of Life was opened unto me, and the Lord spake comfortably to me, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love;" and I was made a Christian through a day of vengeance, and of burning as an oven; and the haughtiness and pride of man in me was brought low.—W. Deesbury.

For "The Friend."

Stephen Grellet, in his journal, and when in Baltimore, 10th mo. 14th, 1809, thus alludes to the state of our Society in that day; to the exercise of the ministry; and to those in the responsible stations of Ministers and Elders. His sound, practical remarks have lost none of their truthfulness nor their applicability as respects the present time:

"I had several meetings on my way to this city, where I arrived last week, to attend their Yearly Meeting, which concluded this day. It has been a season of much mental suffering to me. Day after day I have borne in silence the burden of my distress, except that at one of the meetings of Ministers and Elders, I was enabled to unfold a little of the nature of the exercise of my mind. Our Society maintains several great and important testimonies which, in the opening and power of Truth, were committed to our forefathers; and as these testimonies have been kept to and maintained, they have been a great blessing both to our Society and the people at large, over whom their influence has more or less extended. A pure Gospel ministry, or in other words, a pure, clear, and full testimony to the truth, as it is in Jesus, must be acknowledged to be a great blessing to a congregation, and to a religious society. The influence is great over them in the station of Ministers to Christ, by the people, either to bring them to Christ, by their example and precepts, or to scatter them from Him. Hence the great success of the ministry in the early days of the Christian Church. The early days of our Society bears a similar testimony; hence the growth in the truth, and in the saving knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, that was conspicuous. My concern is sometimes great for our much favored Society. If a forward, self-willed ministry gains the ascendancy amongst us, we must become scattered as a people; for that ministry which standeth in the wisdom of man, can never reach to the deep things of God; it can neither understand them nor minister of them; Christ crucified is foolishness to it. I have travailed for an enlargement in Christian depth and experience with our Elders, that they may be favored so to labor as to avert the threatening evil in divers parts of our Society. A Minister of the Gospel of Christ must be acquainted with and established in the faith, and the hope of redemption through Christ, else how can he minister to others what he himself has not. An Elder, who is to be a judge of the ministry, to help the weak and instruct the ignorant, must also be fully convinced of and established in the great truths of Christianity. My soul has deeply mourned because of the many deficiencies I behold in these respects, and the sad consequences which I anticipate a spurious ministry will bring over us. Yet, with gratitude it must be acknowledged, that we have amongst us a few baptized Ministers and Elders, who stand as fathers and mothers in the church, and also as faithful watchmen in Zion."

When a man or woman comes to this pass, that they have nothing to rely upon but the Lord, then they will meet together to wait upon the Lord; and this was the first ground or motive of our setting up meetings; and I would to God that this was the use that every one would make of them that come to them. S. Crisp.

A WORD OF COMFORT.

Comfort take, thou child of sorrow;
All is ordered well for thee;
Look not to the anxious sorrow
"As thy days, thy strength shall be."

Child of grief, does this world sore thee?
Transient scene of transient pain!
Think! oh think of worlds above thee,
Countless worlds—a glorious train!

There are nations now preparing For the chosen sons of God!
Here, a pilgrim and wayfaring,
There shall be thy long abode!

There shalt thou abide for ever,
With thy best and greatest Friend;
Nought from Him thy soul shall sever
In a world that knows no end.

There amidst assembled nations,
Eye to eye, and face to face,
Thou shalt see thy tribulations
Sent as messengers of grace.

Comfort take, then, child of sorrow;
All is ordered well for thee;
Look not to the anxious sorrow
"As thy days, thy strength shall be."

STANZAS.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

I feel that I am growing old,
Nor wish to hide that truth;
Conscious my heart is not more cold
Than in my by-gone youth.

I cannot roam the country round,
As I was wont to do;
My feet a scantier circle bound,
My eyes a narrower view.

But on my mental vision rise
Bright scenes of beauty still;
Morn's splendor, evening's glowing skies,
Valley, and grove, and hill.

Nor can infirmities o'erwhelm
The purer pleasures brought
From the immortal spirit's realm
Of Feeling and of Thought!

My heart! let joy not dismay or doubt
In thee an entrance win!
Thou hast enjoyed thyself without—
Now seek thy joy within!

IN THE NEST.

Gather them close to your loving heart,
Cradle them on your breast;
They will soon enough leave your brooding care,
Soon enough mount Youth's topmost stair—
Little ones in the nest.

Fret not that the children's hearts are gay,
That their restless feet will run;
There may come a time in the by-and-by
When you'll sit in your lonely room and sigh
For a sound of childish fun;

When you'll long for the repetition sweet
That sounded through each room,
Of "mother," "mother," the dear love-calls
That will echo long in the silent halls,
And add to their stately gloom.

There may come a time when you'll long to hear
The children's childish tread,
The tuncless whistle, the clear, shrill shout,
The busy bustle in and out,
And pattering overhead.

When the boys and girls are all grown up,
And scattered far and wide,
Or gone to the undiscoversd shore
Where youth and age come never more,
You will miss them from your side.

Then gather them close to your loving heart,
Cradle them on your breast;
They will soon enough leave your brooding care,
Soon enough mount Youth's topmost stair—
Little ones in the nest.

Silent Worship.

In a letter to The [London] Friend for last month, headed "Cornwall and Quakerism," the writer enumerates some of the results of the special testimonies borne by the Society of Friends, as a reason for "thanking God and taking courage," in spite of the fewness of your numbers; and also points out very truly that there are peculiarities in the practices of the Society which are likely always to restrict its numerical increase.

Perhaps you yourselves are in some respect less in a position to judge of the effect produced on the outer world by your peculiar practices than one who, like myself, has been brought up in a totally different atmosphere. And I greatly desire to bear witness to the exceeding value and fitness for these times of that which to the outer world is, perhaps, its most distinguishing peculiarity of Friends—their custom of silent worship.

None can know the fulness of the power of this silence to heal the wounds made by the strife of tongues, as it is known by those who have escaped into it, as for their soul's sake, from an atmosphere reeking with words. I know of no words outside the Bible which are to my mind so wonderfully true and beautiful, and full of the traces of inspiration, as the words of many parts of the Church of England services; but let words be ever so true as ever so beautiful, when continually repeated as appointed forms for worship, and uttered without pause during a service of considerable length, they have in my experience too much painful, and for myself, at any rate seriously dangerous, results—results from which I suffered, either alternately or in strange combination, for many years. One that if truly adopted as the heart's prayer, and fervently uttered, they do, while doubtless affording much help and comfort at times, often very seriously exhaust spiritual energy. The times in which I have been most near able really to pray the Church prayers throughout an morning service, have left me not only physically but spiritually overstrained—a prey to reaction. On the other hand, in times such as all who think must in these days be prepared to pass through, times of heart-searing doubts and questionings, times when it is that we hold dearest and most sacred is at stake, and when above all we need the help of profound and unconstrained prayer to enable us to withstand the fiery darts of temptation,—at such times the elaborate and highly significant doctrinal utterances, interwoven with the whole texture of the Liturgy, have roused in my mind all its latent spirit of opposition, and have kept up an incessant and harassing questioning of the truth of the word used, and of my own sincerity in joining in them, which have made the time spent in church a time of something like torment rendered still keener by the sense that this struggle was occupying the time allotted for prayer; the time of all others when disturbing influences should be banished, and when we must especially desire to enter into the very spirit of peace and of meekness.

From these causes I was beginning to feel that I should very soon be driven from attending the Church services, and yet, that "forsake the assembling together" of Christian people was almost worse and more irremediable than to go on as I was, when the tender care which guides our steps led me to to first time to a Friends' meeting. What healing balm I found there for the restlessness of unbelief! How at first the blessed freedom of the silence, with its absolute clearness from any question as to sincerity, and an undisturbed opportunity afforded for communion with God, calmed me and healed the wounds made by words; how, as time went on, the living utterances, coming out of silence, I received into silence, reached and fed and comforted my soul; how by degrees, I through times of much trouble and darkness from within and without, the light has shined again, filling the old forms of words with far more than their former meaning, while showing them no longer as fetters, but a storehouse of armor and weapons; how at meetings, whether silent or full of spiritual harmonies, have through all become more and more precious to my soul, I cannot fully tell;—I have desired to relate thus briefly my own experience in the hope that Friends may thereby be in some degree encouraged in maintaining, for the benefit of our sorely-tryed generation, the refuge which they have hitherto been enabled to keep open for perplexed souls in the many voices which war against their ears. I know that silence is a language spoken from the greater number; but for the few who understand it, it is the most soul-quickening, the most harmonizing of influences, and one which in this feverish age we sorely need, not only in our places of worship, but in our daily lives. While Friends can maintain a living, holy silence, the world will have shown to bless God for their witness.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

AN ATTENDER OF FRIENDS' MEETINGS.

Christian Principles in Business.

BY A NEW YORK MERCHANT.

Perhaps there is no reason so often urged as an excuse for neglecting to embrace salvation as the inconsistencies of Christians in their daily walk and conversation; and of all the various ways in which these inconsistencies are manifested, none are so hurtful to the cause in the present age as the failure of Christian business men to exemplify the spirit of Christ's teachings in their dealings with their fellow-men.

The "golden rule" seems to be considered null as a sentiment, but not at all desirable to be put in practice when a bargain is to be made or any business transaction entered on. It is now over thirty years since the latter entered a store on Broadway, New York city, as an errand-boy, and he has been constantly employed in active business ever since, most of the time in large establishments, and for the past eight years he has been a partner in a wholesale business, requiring the service of seventy-five to one hundred men in constant employment. For over twenty-five years he has been an active member of the Methodist Church, and now feels impelled, from a sense of duty, to call the attention of Christians to the various ways in which Christ's followers fail to come up to the Bible standard in dealings where dollars and cents are called in question.

God's word says that "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of a life that now is." I claim that my experience and observation prove the truth of that "the word" declares, and I shall endeavor to show by examples that I have been conversant with, that any departure from the teachings of God's word in business-dealings by a professing Christian, always results in disaster, sooner or later, and that the giving away to selfishness and covetousness never leads to permanent prosperity—even in a business point of view.

If a clerk knows something about an article offered for sale, which, if his customer knew would prevent his purchasing it, he finds it a great trial to do as he would be done by and tell it, at the risk of dismissal, because Christian principle demands it. If a merchant who is a Christian finds that a confidence is reposed in him by a customer that gives him an opportunity to charge more than his lowest price, it is hard for him to refrain from using that opportunity for gain, and as a chance to dispose of goods that if the customer knew the "whole truth" about it he would not buy; and yet I feel sure that permanent gain can only come by adhering to the law of love and strict unselfishness in all dealings.

Christianity is on trial now as never before, and the pulpit is doing its best to show the Church its duty as God's word indicates it, but the exemplification of Christian principles in business dealings generally fails to put in practice all that the preached word shows to be duty. I feel it my duty to express my convictions on this subject from the stand-point of experience and observation, hoping that it may call the attention of others better qualified to discuss it than I am.

The first point I propose to consider is—"How far it is right to use the wants and necessities of others for our personal profit or gain?" If I need certain work done, and I happen to know of some one in a great strait who is skilled in that work, is it right for me to take advantage of his necessities, and because of his needs to pay him less than a fair or "market" price for his work? If I have a young man in my employ who, because of his confidence in me and fear of being thrown out of employment, accepts much less than he earns, and than I can afford to pay him, am I doing right in using those facts to my gain and his loss? The "world" says, Let him look out for himself. Does Christ say so? If I have means unemployed, and a friend or neighbor is embarrassed, am I right in charging him more than lawful interest for money, or demanding more than sufficient security in the hope of profiting by his misfortune, and becoming possessed of his property by that means?

If I am a mechanic skilled in certain work and by some accident or uncommon event am wanted, am I justified in taking advantage of that fact to make exorbitant charges for work done under such circumstances? If a farmer hears that a neighbor needs to buy an animal or certain seed-grain of him in an emergency, is it right for him to put an exorbitant price on the article because he has his neighbor in his power?

I could ask question after question on this line, but think I have asked enough to indicate my meaning.

I claim that Christian business men should carry out in all their dealings the spirit of the gospel, the love that "worketh no ill to his neighbor," and I believe that a strict adherence to Christ's summary of the moral law, "to love our neighbor as ourselves," would not only give peace of mind and spiritual growth, but would result in financial prosperity, enlarged social influence, and business reputation of the highest order.

I will now mention an occurrence that has made a deep impression on my mind, and it will illustrate some of the points I have indicated in this article. Mr. J. joined (by letter, from a distant city) the church of which I was a member over twenty years ago. He had been in business in his former residence as a retail dealer, and had just then been employed as a buyer of goods by a large wholesale house in New York. He was an earnest Christian, active in Church and Sabbath-school work, liberal in giving to the Church, a successful class-leader, and good to the poor. He was liberal to a fault when his sympathies were appealed to, but was as hard in driving a bargain as any man I ever met. As a buyer of goods he knew no mercy in striving to force down the price, and his efforts to buy goods cheap, or get some advantage over the seller, often made him enemies, or greatly irritated honorable men who desired to deal fairly with him. He wanted the usury laws repealed, and thought he was justified in loaning money at any interest he could get. He afterward became a very active and important partner, and when the firm retired from business, shortly after the close of the war, he had a fortune of more than $100,000. He was then superintendent of the Sunday school and a leading man in the Church, and the pastor had no warmer support than Bro. J. gave him. His house was always open to entertain Christian ministers, and he was universally loved and respected by all, except those with whom he had had business dealings. There was a young man who was a member of the church and Sunday-school that J. wanted in his employ, and to obtain his services he held out inducements that were calculated to deceive the young man, and lead him to expect would result in much greater pecuniary advantage than J. must have known possible. The young man trusted his class-leader and Sunday-school superintendent, and believed he would do every thing possible to his advantage. When the first engagement was ended J. got the young man to accede to an engagement for a term of years that resulted nearly as disastrous to the young man as the former one, and cost him thousands of dollars, and gave the firm his services at about half the amount that J. knew was being paid for the same service to others in their employ at the same time. J. used in many other ways the confidence reposed in him to drive sharp bargains. A few years ago J., in the hope of obtaining usurious interest, was induced to invest his means, and now is a poor clerk with a large family; he has ceased to be active in the Church, and is a broken-down, disheartened man.

Had he been actuated by the same spirit in his business dealings that he manifested in his relations to the Church and Sabbath-school, how different would the end probably have been.—Christian Advocate.

Shetland Women.

Not far outside the town of Lerwick on the Shetland Islands, there is a great, black, muddy tract of land called a peat-bog. All about is utter desolation. There are no huts even to be seen. The town is concealed by a rounded hill; and when, through some opening between the bare upheavals, one catches a sight of the North Sea, it too seems deserted by mankind.

The peat, or mixture of roots and peculiar black soil, is dug here in large quantities, and all about the place are great piles of it, dried and ready to be burned in the fire-places of the Lerwick people. Peat takes the place of wood, and in every poor man's hut in Shetland will it be found burning brightly, and giving out a thin blue smoke.

To prepare peat for market a great deal of labor is performed. First come the diggers, men, women and children. Entering upon the deep, mitty bog, they cut the soil up into cakes about a foot long and a few inches thick, and these they place in high piles to dry. After a few weeks they come again, and carry the dried fuel away to the town.

It is while carrying these loads that the Shetlanders present a peculiar spectacle. The men are often very old, infirm and poorly clothed, and the women are dressed in short-skirted, home-spun gowns, below which may be seen very red and very broad feet. On their heads they usually have white caps, nicely ironed, with a fluted ruffle around the edge. Passing across the breast and over either shoulder are two strong straps, and these support an immense basket hanging against the back.

Thus equipped, the brave, stout women, their baskets piled with peat, tramp off to Lerwick, two miles away, to sell their loads for a few pennies each. They make many trips a day, always smiling, chatting and apparently contented. Often a long line may be seen carefully stepping along over the rough roads, stopping now and then to rest.

The homes of these poor peat women are, many of them, simply hovels. When they wish to build a home, they go out into some field, usually far away from other huts, and there they dig a trench about a square piece of ground. Upon this they build walls to a height of about eight feet, and fill the crevices with mud and bog. For a roof they gather refuse sea-wood, and, with this for a support, lay on layer after layer of straw, mud and stones.

But what homes they seem to us! There is no fireplace, only a hole in the ground, with a hole in the roof for the smoke to escape through. No windows, the door serving for both light and entrance. No beds, only heaps of straw. Sometimes in one small room, often the only one the house contains, will be seen man, wife, children, dog and hens, equal occupants, sharing the same rude comforts. Outside the house, if the owner be moderately well off, may be seen a herd of sheep or ponies, and a patch of garden surrounded by a wall.

But there is something a peat woman of Shetland is continually doing that we have not yet noticed. All have, no doubt, heard of Shetland hosiery; of the fine, warm shawls and hoods, and delicate veils that come from these far northern islands. Now, all the while the poor, bare legged woman is carrying her heavy burden of peat, her hands are never idle; she is knitting, knitting away as fast as her nimble fingers will allow. In her pocket is the ball of yarn, and as her needles fly back and forth she weaves fabrics of such fineness that the royal ladies of England wear them; and no traveller visits the island, without loading his trunk with shawls, mittens, stockings and other feminine fancies.

Not to know how to knit in Shetland is like not knowing how to read at home. A little girl is taught the art before she can read; and, as the result, at every cottage will be found the spinning-wheel and the needles, while the feminine hands are never idle. It is one great means of support; and on Regent street, in London, will be seen windows full of soft, white goods marked "Shetland Hosiery."

Who first instructed these far-northern people in this delicate art is not surely known. On Fair Isle, one of the Shetland group, the art is first said to have been discovered, very many years ago. On that lonely isle even now every woman, girl and child knits while working at any of her various duties.

The yarn with which the Shetland goods are made is spun from the wool of the sheep we see roaming about the fields. In almost every cottage may be seen the veritable old-fashioned wheel; and the busy girl at the treadle sends the great wheel flying, and spins out the long skeins, which serve to make baby a pretty hood, or grandma a warm shawl.—Wide Awake.

For "The Friend"

Having received many applications from Friends at a distance, for donations of plain clothing, and being unable to supply the demand, I desire to state through "The Friend," that any Friends having partly worn clothing of any kind, or carpets which they are willing to spare, may send them to No. 912 Wallace street, or to the office of "The Friend," Philadelphia. All such articles will be forwarded to those who are in need, and may apply for them.

Religious Items, &amp;c.

Plainness of Dress.—One of our exchanges notes the decease of Margaret A. Little, an aged Methodist woman, at Washington, D. C.; and relates the following anecdote of her. She joined the Methodist Church when quite young, and when she presented herself "on probation," as a fashionably attired lady, she was reminded that she must dress plainly, so that the world would recognize her as a Methodist in dress, as well as in deportment. Instantly her beautiful head-dress was removed, the rule adopted, and from that day to the close of her life she appeared in all seasons and under all circumstances a plain, neat Christian.

We sincerely regret that among the Methodists, as among many of our own people, the ancient rules and advices of the churches on this subject are now so much disregarded.

Ignorance on Religious Subjects.—A correspondent on the Christian Advocate in describing the efforts which are being used in France to spread a knowledge of the truths of Christianity, mentions several illustrations of the ignorance which prevails. One young woman at Paris, who was well educated and had received a teacher's diploma, had a Bible offered to her. She expressed her satisfaction, and said it was the first Bible she had seen. On another occasion, as he was speaking on the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, he was interrupted by one of the audience who protested against his being so hard on the Phariseans, as if they were worse than others. He had mistaken the Pharisees, (in French, Pharisiens), of whom he knew nothing, with the Parisians, (in French, Parisiens).

The Presbyterian Ecumenical Council.—The Presbyterians propose holding a general Council of representatives of their denomination from different countries. At a recent meeting on this subject held at Philadelphia, it was urged that the gathering of the chosen representatives of twenty millions of Presbyterians in all parts of the world would be productive of good—that advantage would result from comparing the experience of different churches—that it would bring in closer fraternal relations bodies of Presbyterians who differ from each other only on non-essential points, would promote brotherly feeling and open the way for closer union—that the united front presented on the great questions of evangelical doctrine would strengthen the hands of other denominations of Christians—and that the meeting would be a source of encouragement and strength to the feeble churches on the continent of Europe who are now under oppression in Austria and Spain.

Papal Opposition to Public School System.—A recent lecture of Joseph Cook, of Boston was devoted to this subject. The lecturer quoted from Roman Catholic authorities show that a systematic and determined effort was being made to have the children of Catholics educated in schools under the control of their Church. He then referred to the condition of education in countries such as Italy and Spain, where the Papal authority had long been supreme and almost unquestioned. He showed that such control meant, that the mind of the people were to be kept in darkness; that true real intelligence and intellectual cultivation would open the eyes of the people to the errors of the Popish system, and raise up a generation less subservient to priestly domination. He referred to the text books introduced into the Catholic schools of this country as falsifying the facts of history, in asserting that religion had nothing to do with the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, and that the Romish priests were not responsible for the death of those condemned by the Inquisition. He spoke in kind terms of the Romish Catholic laity, and asserted that the effect of the parochial school training would be to keep in an inferior social position, to prevent the proper development, and to make them the bearers of wood and drawers of water for the better-educated classes.

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

Earth-sponges of Africa.—Dr. Livingston describes these bogs as an important feature in the physical geography of the country. Wherever a plain exists sloping towards a narrow opening in the hills, a "sponge" may be formed. The vegetation falls down, and forms a rich black loam. In many cases a mass of this loam several feet thick rests on a bed of pure river sand, which is revealed by crabs and other aquatic animals bringing it to the surface. In the dry season, the black loam is cracked in all directions, and the cracks are often as much as three inches wide.

d very deep. When the rains come, the wet supply is nearly all absorbed in the sand. The black loam forms soft slush and floats on the sand. The narrow opening prevents it from moving off in a landslip, but an ooze comes at that spot. All the pools in the lower part of this spring-course are filled by the wet rains, which happen south of the equator when the sun goes vertically over any spot. The second or greater rains happen in this course north again, when all the bogs and swamps being wet, the supply runs off and forms the inundation.

In going to Bangweolo from Kizinga, the elevated ground crossed twenty nine of these reservoirs thirty miles of latitude, on a south-east course; this may give about one sponge for every two miles. When one treads on the spongy earth, though little or no water appears on the surface, it is frequently squirted up the limbs, and gives the idea of a sponge. In the paths that cross them, the earth readily soaks soft mud, but sinks rapidly to the bottom again, as if of great specific gravity; a water in them is always circulating and rising. The places where the sponges are met with are slightly depressed valleys with trees or bushes in a forest country, where a grass being only a foot or fifteen inches high and thickly planted, often looks like a beautiful glade in a gentleman's park in England. They are from a quarter of a mile to a mile broad, and from two to ten or more miles long. The water of the heavy rains soaks to the level forest lands; one never sees a path leading it off, unless occasionally a rut-path is turned to that use. The water ascending comes to a stratum of yellow sand, beneath which there is another stratum of fine white sand, which at its bottom cakes, so as to hold the water from sinking further.

It is exactly the same as we found in the Bahari desert, in digging sucking places for water for our oxen. The water, both here and there, is guided by the fine sand stratum to the nearest valley, and here it oozes forth on all sides through the thick mantle of black spongy earth which forms the sponge. Here, in the desert, it appears to damp the surface lands in certain valleys, and the Bushmen, by peculiar process, suck out a supply. When I had dug down to the caked sand three years ago, the people begged us not to dig further, as the water would all run away; and I desisted, because we saw that the fluid oozed in from the fine sand all round the well, but none came from the bottom or cake. Two stupid Englishmen afterwards broke through the cake in spite of the entreaties of the natives, and the well and the whole valley dried up hopelessly. Here, the water oozing forth from the surface of the spongy mantle, collects in the centre of the slightly depressed valley which it occupies, and near the head of the depression forms a sluggish stream; but further down, as it meets with a steep slope, it works away for itself a deeper channel, with perpendicular banks, with say, hundred or more yards of sponge on each side, constantly oozing forth fresh supplies to augment its size. When it reaches rocky ground it is a perennial burn, with many aquatic plants growing in its bottom.

He travelled in Lundas when the sponges are all super-saturated. The grassy sward was so lifted up that it was separated into patches or tufts, and if the foot missed the tuft of tufts of this wiry grass which formed the native path, down one plumped up to the thigh in slush. At that time they could cross the sponge only by the native paths, and the central burn only where they had placed bridges; elsewhere they were impassable as they poured off the waters of inundation. The oxen were generally bogged—“all four legs went down up to the body at once.

Water-spout in the West Indies.—In a small boat I visited, one day, the Falls of Balline, which are secluded in a deep gorge, about sixty feet high, and interesting. On this trip I was favored with a spectacle rarely seen even in this land of storms. It was a water-spout which formed over against the Pitons of St. Lucia,—a bulk of black clouds like an inverted funnel, sailing beneath denser masses above. It swept along with its tip trailing just above the waves, an elongated, spiral-pointed sack, until it met the sea; then the water was drawn up to it, forming a mighty pillar, spreading at base and summit, and joining black sea with inky clouds. A few moments it remained thus, then melted away, leaving only great banks of clouds, out of which came wind and rain. Seen across an angry sea, those cloud-pillars, with the picturesque Pitons as a back-ground, were most impressive.—F. A. Ober.

Egyptian Bread.—The native Egyptian bread is a sort of flap, pliant and moist, like a cold pancake; it is always round and of a dusky color, and, in fact, resembles the flat stones often found in the beds of rivers, or in the desert. At a distance, a pile of bread might be taken for a pile of such stones, and makes one think of the beautiful expression of Scripture, “If a son shall ask bread of one of you that is a father, will he give him a stone?” Will he give the mockery of a good thing instead of its reality? How much more will our Heavenly Father give us, truly and literally, all that He has promised to them that ask Him?—Whately's Ragged Life in Egypt.

Be more careful that you have something weighty and pertinent to say, than that you should say things in the most polished and skillful way. There is good sense in what Socrates said to the clever young Greeks in this regard, that if they had something to say they would know how to say it; and to the same effect spoke St. Paul to the early Corinthian Christians, and in these last times the wise Goethe to the German students,—

“Be thine to seek the honest gain,
No shallow sounding fool;
Sound sense finds utterance for itself
Without the critic's rule;
If to your heart your tongue be true,
Why hunt for words with much ado?”

It is not the accession of numbers to our name, but the gathering of souls to the everlasting Shepherd, which gives joy to the Lord's family in heaven and earth.—Samuel Fothergill.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 17, 1880.

If it were practicable to procure accurate statistics on the subject, we believe it would be found that the increase in population in any civilized country is principally among the poorer classes, who form the laboring part of the community. In this statement the influence of emigration is not considered, but reference is had to the excess of births over deaths among a comparatively settled people. This is largely owing to the fact that a greater proportion of the poor marry early in life; while among those who live in a social circle where more comforts and luxuries are accumulated in their comfortable homes, the females are often unwilling to make the sacrifices which are required, and to assume the untidied but weighty cares and responsibilities of married life. And among the men prudential motives of a business nature frequently postpone marriage connections till late in life, or entirely set them aside.

A large part of the Society of Friends in the Eastern portion of our Union, belongs to the class who have accumulated some property—the result of the habits of self-restraint and economy which our principles lead to. Among its members the habits and customs which prevail in the circle in which they move produce results similar to those which are exhibited in the rest of the community on the same social level.

In the year 1873, the writer of this took some pains to ascertain the number of members and the proportion of children in each Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The general average for the Yearly Meeting was not quite one child of school age for six members. The three Monthly Meetings in the City of Philadelphia aggregated 1413 members and only 171 school children; while in Muncey Monthly Meeting, in the same quarter, where the members are mostly farmers, and many of them in quite moderate circumstances, there were 56 children in 218 members—about double the proportion.

The reports from North Carolina Yearly Meeting for the same year, showed about 1 child to 31 members. As we do not know that the enumeration of the children there was between the same years of age, as in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, an accurate comparison cannot be made; but it is very evident, that its agricultural and comparatively poor population abound far more in that wealth which the scriptures speaks of as the “heritage of the Lord,” than some others who are richer in money and lands.

If, in addition to this exhibit, we reflect that in the nature of things we must always expect a certain proportion of those brought up as Friends to shrink from bearing the cross of Christ, and to seek some easier path than the entire subjection of self which our religion requires; it is evident, that unless others are brought into our ranks by conviction from the world outside, there are sufficient reasons to explain the gradual decay of our numbers in the older settled sections of our country. In our own Yearly Meeting the number of members now left is probably not more than one-half of what remained after the separation of 1827; though a portion of this decrease may be accounted for by removals to the Western States during the fifty years that have elapsed.

This decrease is often a subject of serious thoughtfulness to those who love our Society and the principles which it represents. So far as the decay in numbers in one section of the country of those who are faithful advocates of its doctrines, is compensated by a corresponding increase of similar testimony-bearers in other places, there is little cause for discouragement; for it is only another illustration of those changes in the centres of culture, influence and power, of which all history is full. But it is well for those who are members of such declining churches—declining as to members—to consider whether there is any deficiency in themselves in faith in their own principles, in warm attachment to them, and in fervent zeal for their spread in the earth. We believe the testimony to the spirituality of religion, and against war and other evils, upheld by our Society, has been influential for good; and that the Holy Spirit has sealed, on the hearts of many of other denominations, convictions, more or less full and deep, of their truth. Thus the light has so shone before men as in measure to bring glory to our Father in Heaven, even where few in proportion have joined in outward fellowship with us.

If the Lord who rules in the kingdoms of men, who pulleth down and setteth up, should see meet to overturn us as a people in our social standing; and reduce us in large measure to outward poverty, not in anger but for the further promotion of his own glorious cause in the earth, we might then with more confidence look forward to a wider conviction of the people, and to a more general gathering to our Society, such as was witnessed in the days of its rise. At present, in many neighborhoods, the difference in wealth and in social position presents an almost impassable barrier to the accession of those who are poor—as to this world, even where they are convinced of the truth. The members of meetings in their vicinity would gladly receive them, but often they feel that they can not be at ease among those with whom they have had little social intercourse, and whose habits of life are different from their own.

The social barrier here alluded to, does not depend on difference in riches alone, but on what may be termed a leaven of aristocratic feeling. Where a family has for one or more generations become known for ability, uprightness or other good qualities, there is a natural feeling of respect attached to it which in measure extends to all its members. In some circles this is carried to too great an extent; so that many, even worthy people, do not fully imitate the example of our Father in Heaven (the common Father of us all), who is declared in Scripture to be no respecter of persons, but who looks with acceptance on all those who fear Him and work righteousness.

Depressing to the spirits as the signs of the times are often felt to be, we desire to encourage our readers to the exercise of faith in the power of the Head of the Church to care for his own glorious cause of truth and righteousness. He alone is able to make it spread and prosper in the earth; and He will assuredly raise up those who will stand as faithful testimony-bearers for Him. May we be willing to do our share of labor in his vineyard, let the crowns be taken from our heads and given to those who are more righteous. We believe the Lord's work will go on whether we are faithful laborers in his cause or not; for He is not dependent on any man or set of men to effect his purposes. He has all power, and can turn the hearts of the people at his will. But if we neglect his gracious calls, how can we expect to share in his mercies? It is those who are faithful unto death, who continue to love the appearing of the Lord Jesus, and who manifest their love by the good fruits produced thereby, who will receive the crown of righteousness that fadeth not away.

"Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees; say unto Zion thy God reigneth." May we have confidence in his government, and place ourselves as submissive servants under his control and direction, being well assured that we can in no way so effectually promote his cause, as by doing the work He may assign us, in the ability which He will furnish.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The statement of the City Treasurer of Philadelphia shows that during the month the receipts were $9,652,292, the expenditures $9,392,140; and at the close of business on that date, the balance was $1,853,456. During the month the Treasurer paid off $5,762,578 city warrants, $508,229 interest on city loan, and $210,662 interest on city warrants. On the 1st of this year there was $232,495 matured city loan paid off.

A delegation of Ute Indians, from Colorado, twelve in number, arrived in Washington on the 11th inst.

In Chicago there are twenty-one elevators, with a capacity for 17,000,000 bushels of grain. Some of these are not yet in operation. They will furnish about one-third of the supply of wheat in this country and Canada. These elevators are now almost filled, and several of the railroads are refusing to receive grain for that market, because of the blockade.

There were $204 immigrants arrived at New York during the month—during the same period last year 337. The total for 1879 was 138,915; for 1878, 81,505.

The special committee of the Senate of the United States, to investigate the causes of the colored exodus from the South, organized last week, and are to begin their investigation this week.

The railroad and river miners in Western Pennsylvania, have decided upon a strike for higher wages. Over 4000 men it is said will be idle.

C. S. Parnell and John Dillon, the Irish leaders, arrived in this city on the 10th, and addressed a large and enthusiastic audience. Large sums of money are being raised in divers places for the relief of the suffering people in Ireland.

The length of sewers constructed in this city during 1879, was 17,643 feet, at a cost of nearly $37,000.

The mortality in Philadelphia last week was 301—a decrease of 58 from the previous week. Of this number 192 were adults, and 109 children.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 104½; do 5's, registered, 102½; de-un, 103½; 4½'s, 107½; 4's, 107, 104.

Cotton.—There was very little movement and prices were steady. Sales of middlings were reported at 13½ a dozen, 58 per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 73 cts. at $7 a standard white 8 cts. for export, and $1 a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Floor is dull, but steady. Sales of 1400 barrels, including Minnesota extra at $6.50 a $7.15; Penna. do, at $7.5 a $7.75; western do at $7 a $7.50, and patent and other high grades at $7.50 a $8.50. Rye flour is steady at $5.50 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is unsettled and quiet, with sales of 8000 bushels, including rejected, at $1.43; red at $1.49; amber at $1.49 a $1.51. Rye.—Pennsylvania is worth 95 cts. Corn is in good request for local consumption and is firm. Sales of 12,000 bushels new mixed and yellow at 59½ a 60 cts., and some old at 61 cts. The cargo rate, 59½ cts. f. o. b. for sail, and 58 cts. f. o. b. for steamer. Oats are in fair demand; sales of 5500 bushels at 48 cts. The receipts today were as follows: 1840 barrels flour; 7500 bush. wheat; 38,500 bush. corn; 1000 bush. rye; 9006 bush. oats; 2000 bush. barley.

Hay and straw market for week—Loads of hay, 201; loads of straw, 72. Average price during the week—11½ cts. per 100 pounds; $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, $8 a 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, $1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in demand at full prices; 2463 head sold at the different yards at 3 a 6 cts. per pound as to quality. Sheep were in demand and prices were firmer; 2000 head $7.25 at the different yards at 13 a 16 cts., and lambs at 15 a 6½ cts. per lb. Hogs were in demand at higher; 5500 head sold at the different yards at 6 a 7 cts. per lb. Cows were unchanged; 250 sold at $20 a $50 per head.

When the Fusion Senate of Maine met on the 14th inst., James H. Fessenden, in a letter announcing that he had assumed the duties of Governor. Republican members of the Senate and House quit took possession of the State House and organized Legislature. After which, both Houses adopted a resolution for the appointment of a committee to ask of the Supreme Court as to the legality of organization.

The Treasury Department has been informed that the port of Tio, Peru, was blockaded on the 17th inst. by Chilean vessels.

The steamship Aragon, which left Bristol for London on the 19th of last month, and was reported as having foundered at sea, arrived at New York on the 1st inst. She reports having experienced terrible weather on the passage.

FOREIGN.—The relief fund of the Duchesse of Mecklenburg now amounts to $14,300.

The Government has made an important change in their policy in respect to the condition of Ireland. The loans are to be made on more liberal terms than proposed—the number of years before repayment shall begin is to be extended, and the Government are to bear the preliminary expenses of such works as the several boards of guardians are to execute in the several boards of guardians for the execution of said works. If these measures be found inadequate, they will apply to Parliament for an appropriation of £500,000 for the prosecution of relief works.

The correspondent of the Press Association reports that the Government are increasing the number of the boards of guardians for the execution of said works. If these measures be found inadequate, they will apply to Parliament for an appropriation of £500,000 for the prosecution of relief works. The Standard's Cabul dispatch says, that owing to the cold which has hitherto stalked in the Crimea, and among the British troops.

A Berlin dispatch to the Poll Mall Gazette says Russia has been questioned relative to the concentration of troops in Poland, and has replied that, as this is no longer any danger of a collision with Turkey, it regards the British troops stationed in the Crimea and Roubia, are merely watching Poland as a more convenient district.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that the local B. Cross Society of Kharkoff, in view of the terrible distress prevailing in that province through the ravages of diphtheria, has formed three medical and sanitary detachments to assist the Government to combat the epidemic.

In the Lower House of the Prussian Diet, the Minister of Finance in asking a vote for the relief of the sufferers in the famine in Upper Silesia, stated that 106,000 persons at present are in the Crimea, and that provision had been made for these up to the end of the month. The Government, he said, hoped to effect large improvements by extensive drainage works and promotion of local industries.

The banking system in Japan is similar to that of the United States. The first national bank was organized in Tokio, in 1873, and there are now 153 national banks in the empire. The capital stock of these banks aggregate 40,250,100 yen—a yen is nearly the same value as the U. S. dollar.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, on the 14th of 11th month, 1879, at his residence in Marlton, N. J., EZRA EVANS, in the eighty year of his age, a much esteemed member of Crozer Particular and Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting. He bore a suffering illness with patience and resignation, leaving a sufficient amount of worldly goods to defray the expense of his funeral, and to leave a comfortable man, the void occasioned by his removal will be felt by many in his neighborhood; as well as by the fellow members of his own religious Society who esteemed him as one religiously concerned for his welfare here a suffering invalid in Philadelphia, on the 23rd of 12th month, 1879, REBECCA C. WOOD, in the 61st year of her age, and member of the Monthly Meeting Friends of Philadelphia, in the 83rd year of her age. She was one who loved her Saviour, and rejoiced in the prosperity of his cause; and her friends believe that she has been safely gathered into the Heavenly fold.

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

1866. 10th mo. 7th.—First-day. I think we were remarkably favored this day in meeting to feel the Divine presence to be with us. How sweet, how precious and comforting it is. Truly the Great Head of the Church is the Life the Light and the strength of his people; the Minister of ministers, ministering to the states of those who are grown up to serve Him. To me, it was a meeting not soon to be forgotten, but to be remembered with feelings of gratitude for the unmerited favor.

10th mo. 8th. Left home this morning to go to Tunesassa to visit the Indians on the Allegheny reservation; have been wonderfully supported and comforted in the prospect before me. May this unmerited favor be long remembered with feelings of gratitude to Him who can make all things work together for good. The ears made connection at Harrisburg; got to Elmira about 1 P. M.; had a few hours comfortable rest; felt peaceful, when I steem a great favor; was met at Salamanca by A. W.; night overtook us before we reached Tunesassa, had some difficulty in getting along, arrived safely about seven; were kindly received by friends, and had a comfortable night's rest.

10th. Visited some Indians on the reservation.

11th. Walked out and looked at the farm, and in the barn to see the crops that had been gathered. The barn was pretty well filled; the fields looked green and cheering; walked along the race-bank, examined the leaks and gave A. my judgment and advice in relation to repairing them. I trust I have been favored to feel the necessity of coming into a state comparable to the clay in the hands of the potter; how important it is; what a blessing we are not forsaken—that our Divine Master continues in his mercy to visit us. May He find fruit to the praise of his great and excellent name, for He is forever worthy. Sat meeting with the four friends at Tunesassa—A. W., his daughter A., C. B. and C. L.—a very comfortable meeting. In the afternoon went to Old Town, visited J. Pierce, King Pierce and family, and Wm. Bone and wife and some children; I sincerely hope I was in my place. Oh, may there be some fruits to the praise of the Great Head of the Church.

12th. Visited Old Town Indians, A. P. and family, J. P.'s widow, A. P.'s children, Levi Half-ton, Watson Pierce and Guy Jemison; called to see Geo. Crouse's children—his sons were out in the woods. It was getting late, made me feel anxious to get home; was much favored to find a canoe on that side of the river; John Jemison helped me over and was favored to get home about dusk with a peaceful mind.

13th. Left home to go to Complanter reservation; called at Jas. Bucktooth's, had a very satisfactory opportunity with him and his wife; left a copy of John Woolman's Journal; went through Corydon; crossed the river opposite Wm. O'Ball's, and met a number of the Indians in the school-house—Cynthia Pierce was our interpreter—A. W. was with me. After speaking to them, and hearing from them, felt feeling pretty comfortable; may I be preserved in my proper place to the end of my days.

14th. Sat meeting with the four friends at this place (Tunesassa). I trust the Great Head of the Church was with us, it felt to me that there was a very solemn, precious covering over us; I felt comforted and encouraged, may I not soon forget it; we had the company of Wm. Bone; I was pleased to have an opportunity with him. Oh! for more strict watchfulness and waiting on my Divine Master.

15th. Left Tunesassa to go to Horse-shoe; met Geo. Jacobs; he rode with me above Cold Spring; I was pleased with his company; called to see James Jemison, who had had a stroke of the palsy; made some arrangements to meet the Indians about Jemison-town, and in that part of the reservation. Went to Great Valley to stay all night; R. Patterson kept the house; were kindly accommodated, spent a pretty comfortable night; felt a hope I should be enabled to speak to the Indians in council to the relief of my own mind. I trust my trust was in the Great Head of the Church.

16th. After breakfast went up the river to meet the Indians, a number of them collected and I was favored with ability to relieve my mind in talking to them. I thought they were sober and attentive. I think it was as comfortable an opportunity as I had, and thought I had great reason to be thankful and take courage; I desire the favor may not soon be forgotten. On our way home made arrangements to meet the Jemison-town Indians.

18th. Went out to the wheat-field to see a bears track, I thought it quite a large track. Sat a comfortable meeting this morning with friends at Tunesassa.

19th. Assisted some in sorting corn in the morning; got an early dinner; a Woolman and I went up the river to see the Indians; called to see Geo. Jacobs, Jr., he has invented a horse-rake, to rake and lift the hay on the wagon—it shows a good deal of ingenuity—had considerable conversation with him. On our way home met with old widow Logan, a very old looking woman, she has always appeared like a kind inoffensive woman.

20th. A. W. and I went up the river to Jemison-town settlement to meet the Indians, they were slow about meeting; had a pretty satisfactory opportunity with them; poor creatures, they do not appear to value time. Oh! that they with white people were more concerned to make a proper use of it. Was informed that the Indians in the neighborhood of Cold Spring had concluded to meet us at their school-house. I felt very desirous that I might be enabled to speak properly to them, and do what was required of me, not leaving anything undone.

21st.—First-day morning. Sat meeting with the family; King Pierce and Levi Half-ton come in and sat with us. I thought the meeting a very comfortable one, and had a satisfactory opportunity with the two Indians. After dinner A. W. and I went up the river to the school-house, near Cold Spring, met a number of Indians and talked some with them. I have felt a strong desire they may become more acquainted with their Divine Master and their duty to Him, and live a life of obedience to his Divine will. They expressed their satisfaction with what was said to them, and spoke of the good feeling that had long existed between their forefathers and ours, of the kindness Friends had shown them, and I think they expressed a desire those good feelings might continue to be felt between us and them. I assured them on the part of Friends it did continue, and that we felt for them as our forefathers did for their forefathers, that when any of our Committee were removed by death, we had young men to take their places that had the same good feelings towards the Indians. When I was about to leave, I took them by the hand, bid them farewell, and we parted with very friendly feelings. I returned in a degree humbled under a sense of my own weakness and inability to do any good thing. May I continue watchful unto prayer.

221. Staid at Friends' property to assist A. Woolman in letting a job of making lumber for the Committee. The men did not come and we got nothing done.

231. Started out to visit the Indians; called at Jos. Snow's, met with John Curry and Abner Snow; visited some families near the ferry and about and above Cold Spring, in all eleven families and parts of families; called to see one poor lame girl that appeared to be suffering a dood deal; assisted her a little. Spent the day pleasantly and have great reason to be thankful for the favor.

24th. Snowing fast; A. Woolman and I went up to James Jemison's—he being from home we talked with his wife and two sons; called at Wm. Phomers and family, near Salamanca; they speak good English,—spent a short time pleasantly with them; passed over the river on a bridge and called to see Julia Jemison and husband, had a pretty satisfactory visit with them, and drove home.

Popular Amusements.

If I take my seat in the theatre, I have paid three or five shillings as an inducement to a number of persons to subject their principles to extreme danger; and the defence which I make is, that I am amused by it. Now, we affirm that this defence is invalid; that it is a defence which reason pronounces to be absurd, and morality to be vicious. Yet I have no other to make; it is the sum total of my justification.

But this, which is sufficient to decide the morality of the question, is not the only nor the chief part of the evil. The evil which is suffered by performers may be more intense, but upon spectators and others it is more extended. The night of a play is the harvest time of iniquity, where the profligate and the sensual put in their sickles and reap. It is to no purpose to say that a man may go to a theatre or parade a saloon without taking part in the surrounding licentiousness. All who are there promote the licentiousness, for if none were there, there would be no licentiousness; that is to say, if none purchased tickets there would be neither actors to be degraded nor dramas to vitiate, nor saloons to degrade and corrupt, and shock us. The whole question of the lawfulness of the dramatic amusements, as they are ordinarily conducted, is resolved into a very simple thing: After the doors on any given night are closed, have the virtuous or the vicious dispositions of the attenders been in the greater degree promoted? Every one knows that the balance is on the side of vice, and this conclusively decides the question "Is it lawful to attend?"

The same question is to be asked, and the same answer I believe will be returned, respecting various other assemblies for purposes of amusement. They do more harm than good. They please but they injure us; and what makes the case still stronger is, that the pleasure is frequently such as ought not to be enjoyed. A tippler enjoys pleasure in becoming drunk, but he is not to allege the gratification as a set-off against the immorality. And so it is with no small portion of the pleasures of an assembly. Dispositions are gratified which it were wiser to thwart; and, to speak the truth, if the dispositions of the mind were such as they ought to be, many of these modes of diversion would be neither relished nor resorted to. Some persons try to persuade themselves that charity forms a part of their motive in attending such places; as when the profits of the night are given to a benevolent institution. They hope, I suppose, that though it would not be quite right to go if benevolence were not a gainer, yet that the end warrants the means. But if these persons are charitable, let them give their granaire without deducting half for purposes of questionable propriety. Religious amusements, such as Oratorios and the like, form one of those articles of chicanery by which people cheat, or try to cheat, themselves. The music, say they, is sacred, is devotional; and we go to hear it as we go to church: it excites and animates our religious sensibilities. This, in spite of the solemnity of the association, is really ludicrous. These scenes subvert religion no more than they subvert chemistry.

They do not increase its power any more than the power of the steam-engine. As it respects Christianity, it is all imposition and fiction, and it is unfortunate that some of the most solemn topics of our religion are brought into such unworthy and debasing alliance."—Dymond's Essays on Morality.

Camps in the Caribbees.

The island of St. Vincent suffered from a violent volcanic eruption in 1872, which seemed to relieve a pressure upon the earth's crust, extending from Caracas to the Mississippi Valley. Ashes from the volcano descended in large quantities on the island of Barbados, which was 95 miles to windward. They had been ejected with such force as to reach upper currents of air, moving in a direction opposite to the regular trade-winds.

The wild ravines of this ancient crater were the haunt of a peculiarly shy mountain warbler, whose musical notes had often been heard; but the bird itself was never seen. To procure this mysterious songster, F. A. Ober visited the volcano, camped in a small cave excavated in its rocky side, and spent five days amid the rain storms of that wild region. On the fourth day he succeeded in obtaining the much coveted prize. After describing the route he took from the cave, he says:

"I found that the surface was cut up into ravines and gullies, starting from the crater-rim. Probably the deepest of them were gouged out by the flood of lava that poured over the crater's edge in that terrible outflow of volcanic water. Rain flowing through the loose volcanic ash may have cut and the more recent, but it could not have descended with sufficient impetuosity to have hollowed out the deep well-holes and cut those deep ravines with perpendicular walls. Starting from the narrow edge of the crater, they spread out like a fan, furrowing the outer surface of the cone, growing deeper, broader, and gloomier, until lost in the dark recesses below. Over all grew the small trees, densely crowded; ferns, filamentous yuccas, moss and wild pines covered the earth and rocks in impenetrable confusion, so concealing the openings to the narrower gullies that it was impossible to ascertain their whereabouts without a very careful examination. It was into this wilderness that I plunged, floundering through tangled masses of branching fern and through dense clusters of ground orchids. But I found few birds save a sparrow or two and a screecher, and the prospect was most discouraging.

"A death-like stillness pervaded that gloomy slope, disturbed only by the swirr of the volumes of mist as they swept over the eastern spur, and the faint notes of the sonfrío-bird down below. Suddenly I bethought myself of a bird-call taught me by the Caribs of Dominica; and with such success did I use it, that, in ten minutes, the hitherto silent trees were alive with stirring feathered forms, hurrying forward in anxious flight."

"But, gratified as I was with this stir of animated life, that my seductive call had evoked, I still awaited anxiously the appearance of that rara avis of these solitudes. Soon I heard a low call-note, such as I had heard that bird give utterance to, and imitating it closely as possible, I was gratified to hear it repeated nearer at hand, and then caught a glimpse of a dusky body flitting on rapid wing through the farther shades. Its flight was very rapid and noiseless. It sudden came into view a good gun-shot off, evident excited, twitching its tail, jerking its wing and uttering a low whistle. In a thought I saw me, just as I caught a snap-shot as darted through the closely-woven branches. Through the thin veil of smoke I caught sight of a few floating feathers, and hurried leeward without reloading, breaking my way through matted masses of ferns, leaping gullies and swinging myself finally beneath the top upon which he had for a moment rested. There was nothing in sight. Disappointed I yet trusted those floating feathers had not misled me, and renewed the search, careful displacing the ferns and fallen branches of by one. It was only upon searching low down, where a steep incline had given it its petals, that I found it, lodged in a wild pit on the verge of a ravine.

"Exultant was I then, as that soft-plumaged bird lay in view before me; forgotten was the toil and previous exertion, forgotten the rain and discomfort of the night. I triumphed over all obstacles in my path, as I was about to hold in my hand the first sonfrío bird known to have been shot within the memory of any one now living. In my anxiety, in my headlong eagerness to possess the bird, I neglected to examine the ground beneath my feet; I saw only the bird, and darted forward. The loose earth gave way, the mass of orchids and roots, loosened by the rains, fell without warning, and I, wild grasping at overhanging roots which brot in my grip, was thrown into the ravine. I was not more than fifteen feet in depth, and so narrow that my fall was broken by the adjacent walls, and I landed on my feet, bruise and a little torn, but without serious injury.

"Joy at escape from immediate danger quickly turned to apprehension regarding escape from the gulch, for the walls were as smooth as water could wear them, and the lower portion of the ravine disappeared suddenly in the direction of the lake. The head of the ravine was a hole like a well, and into this I had fallen. Through the crevice below me I could see the shimmering waters of the lake, a thousand feet beneath, and a few steps farther would have precipitated me into its unfathomed abyss.

"A shower heavier than the others came down fiercely, setting rivulets running down the crater and washing the earth from beneath my feet, warning me to be out of the hole if possible. Clinging to some projections in the rock, I worked my way slowly until near the top; when about to thrust my arm through the vines that darkened my chamber, I was startled by the appearance of a black, shining head with glittering eyes thrust right into my face. But for the nearness of the opposite wall, I should have fallen (this apparition took me so by surprise, for it was none other than an immense black snake). Fortunately, I could secure myself in position by bracing my legs against each opposing cliff, and was near enough to the top to clutch some roots, otherwise I could not have maintained the ground I had gained. The snake crawled out of a crevice in the rock, and though he may not have intended to harm me, I will confess to a feeling of fear at that time, and remembered with regret how thoughtlessly I had laughed at poor Toby, the day before, when he fled in terror from a snake I and caught by the tail. My gun, which had not been injured in my fall, was slung at my back, and by loosening it I managed to strike the snake a smart blow, which, though it angered him, caused him to glide down the cliff instead of up. Thus relieved, I scrambled through the dank vegetation, and stood once more above the ground.

"From the lake came up a strange hissing pond, as though the water was boiling, caused by the many streams set in flow by the rain running into it. Its usually placid surface was agitated, and I could detect a perceptible change in its color.

"My precious bird had landed safely at the bottom of the gulch, though somewhat soiled, and he now reposed in my game-basket, wrapped in a paper cone. This was the shot-snuffire-Lord I secured; the next day I shot three others; they proved to be a new species and were named Myiadestes sibilans."

Brief Spiritual Observations.

extracted from the Writings of Isaac Penington.

No. 3.

"There have been two great dispensations of the Father, Son, and Spirit: the one figurative, the other substantial; the one called the Law, the other the gospel. For under the Law the Father was made known, the Son made known, and the Spirit made known; but all figures and outward ways of manifestation. The Son was made known under the types and figures of the law, as the King of righteousness, the high priest of God, as the Prophet that God would raise up, as the spiritual rock which yielded the spiritual waters, of which the soul was to drink."

"Now when the shadows came to an end, Christ the substance was to come. The everlasting King, the everlasting High Priest, the everlasting Prophet was to appear. The everlasting Rock and holy builder was to appear, and raise up David's tabernacle in spirit, and minister in the true sanctuary, by his light, by his life, by his power, by his righteous Spirit. There is not another tabernacle to be built, not another temple, not another Jerusalem than the heavenly Jerusalem; not another Mount Zion to be known or come to, than the Gospel Mount Zion; not another God, than God the Judge of all in the gospel; not another word or law of life, than the law which goeth forth out of Zion, and the word that issueth out from this heavenly Jerusalem; not another water to wash the soul with, not another blood to sprinkle the conscience with; not another Spirit to enlighten, quicken, keep alive, and comfort, than the Spirit of light, life and love from God, and which brings into the gospel righteousness, rest and peace, and establisheth the soul therein."

"The new Jerusalem, the church of God's anointing in his own Spirit and power, is a city of unity with itself. The greatest degree of light owns and is at unity with the least; and the least degree of light hath a sense of that which is in degree and measure above it."

"Christ's kingdom was not of this world, or did He seek any greatness or authority according to this world, neither over the Jews, or over the Gentiles, nor over his own disciples; but He served all, He sought the good of all. The life in Him which was to reign over all, yet here served all, suffered for all, and from all, and that was his way to his crown; who having finished his course, fulfilled his service, perfected his sufferings, is set down at the right hand of the majesty on high, where now He reigns over all, and is made a King by God in righteousness. And this is the pattern which all his disciples are to walk by. The more life they receive, the more they are to minister; the more they are to serve. They must not lift up themselves by their gifts; they must not hereupon lord it over others; but wait in their service, till the Lord make way into men's hearts, and plant his truth there; and upon Him also must they wait for the watering and growth of it."

"* * * * The Lord gives grace and knowledge for another end, than for men to take upon them to be great, and rule over others because of it. And he that because of this, thinks himself fit to rule over men's consciences, and to make them bow to what he says or takes to be truth, he loses his own life; hereby, and so far as he prevails upon others, he doth but destroy their life too. For it is not so much speaking true things that doth good, as speaking them from the pure, and conveying them to the pure; for the life runs along from the vessel of life in one, into the vessel of life in another; and the words (though ever so true) cannot convey life to another, but as the living vessel opens in one, and is opened in the other. * * * That, then, which would rule is to serve, that which would be great is to be little; and the little one is to become a nation. That which is low is to rise, and thou art not fit to rise with it, further than thou canst serve it, both in thyself and others."

"The main thing in religion is to keep the conscience pure to the Lord, to know the guide, to follow the guide, to receive from Him the light whereby I am to walk; and not to take things for truths because others see them to be truths; but to wait till the Spirit make them manifest to me. * * * He that makes haste to be rich, even in religion, running into knowledge, and into worship and performances, before he feels a clear and true guidance, shall not be innocent; neither will the Lord hold him guiltless, when He comes to visit for spiritual adultery and idolatry. * * * 'Let every man,' saith the apostle, 'be fully persuaded in his own mind'; take heed of receiving things too soon, take heed of running into practices too soon, take heed of doing what ye see others do, but wait for your own particular guidance, and for a full persuasion from God, what is his will concerning you."

"Again, take heed of doing anything doubtfully, be not forward, be not hasty; wait for the leading, wait for the manifestation of the Spirit. Be sure thou receive what thou receivest in faith, and practise what thou practisest in faith; for 'whatsoever is not of faith is sin,' being an error from the principle of life, which is to guide; and thereby thou lovest ground, dishonest Christ, and comest under condemnation."

"The true church government being in the Spirit, and over the conscience as in the sight of God, the great care must be to keep it within its bounds, that nothing else govern but the Spirit; that nothing else teach, nothing else exhort, nothing else admonish and reprove; nothing else cut off and cast out. * * * And every member is to wait in the measure of the Spirit which he hath received, to feel the goings forth of the Spirit in him who teaches and governs; and so to be subject not to man [as such], but to the Lord. * * * The property of the true church government is, to leave the conscience to its full liberty in the Lord, to preserve it single and entire for the Lord to exercise, and to seek unity in the light and in the Spirit, walking sweetly and harmoniously together in the midst of different practices. He that hath faith, and can see beyond another, can yet have it to himself, and not disturb his brother with it, but can descend and walk with him according to his measure; and if his brother have any heavy burden upon him, he can lend him his shoulder, and bear part of his burden with him. Oh! how sweet and lovely it is to see brethren dwell together in unity, to see the true image of God raised in persons, and their knowing and loving one another in that image, and bearing with one another through love, and helping one another under their temptations and distresses of spirit, which every one must expect to meet with. * * *

The way is one; Christ the truth of God; and he that is in the faith, and in the obedience to that light which shines from his Spirit into the heart of every believer, hath a taste of the one heart, and of the one way; and knoweth that no variety of practices, which is of God, can make a breach of the true unity."

"[True unity arises from fellowship with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ, and is attained by walking in "obedience to that light which shines from his Spirit into the heart of every believer;" and it is not broken by that "variety of practices which is of God." It is a common experience that in certain stages of religious growth some things are found to be inexpedient and therefore to be avoided, and other things are required to be done as tests or attainments or for the accomplishment of the Divine purposes, which are not laid upon other members of the church, and are not in some cases as to the individual himself, of permanent obligation. These peculiar requisitions are an illustration of the apostle's remark, that there are differences of administration but the same Spirit. But the case is otherwise when any members of the Church indulge in practices which proceed from a different spirit. Then unsettlement and confusion are apt to be produced, as has often sadly been manifested.]

A Strange Story.—"Not long ago," says the London Daily Telegraph, "a well-known collector of curiosities in Paris, who had devoted considerable sums of money to the gathering together of bank notes of all countries and all values, became the possessor of a Bank of England five pound note to which an unusually strange story was attached. This note was paid into a Liverpool merchant's office in the ordinary way of business sixty-one years ago, and its recipient, the cashier of the firm, while holding it up to the light to test its genuineness, noticed some faint red marks on it, which, on closer examination, proved to be semi-effaced words, scrawled in blood between the printed lines and upon the blank margin of the note. Extraordinary pains were taken to decipher these partly obliterated characters, and eventually the following sentence was made out: 'If this note should fall into the hands of John Dean, of Long Hill, near Carlisle, he will learn hereby that his brother is languishing a prisoner in Algiers.' J. Dean was promptly communicated with by the holder of the note, and he appealed to the Government of the day for assistance in his endeavor to obtain his brother's release from captivity. The prisoner, who, as it subsequently appeared, had traced the above sentence upon the note with a splinter of wood dipped in his own blood, had been a slave to the Dey of Algiers for eleven years, when his strange missive first attracted attention in a Liverpool counting-house. His family and friends had long believed him dead. Eventually his brother, with the aid of the British authorities in the Mediterranean, succeeded in ransoming him from the Dey, and brought him home to England, where, however, he did not long survive his release, his constitution having been irreparably injured by exposure, privations and forced labor in the Dey's galleys.—Ledger.

For "The Friend."

What have they seen in thy house?

The twentieth chapter of 2d Kings contains this query; it came from the prophet Isaiah to king Hezekiah. I remember pondering over the contents of this chapter in early life; when I could not discern wherein the good king had erred. There seemed to me then but little harm in showing his possessions to those who had come so far to see him, after a sickness near unto death.

When he said, "O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in Truth, and with a perfect heart;" he was not rebuked for his language; that which he desired was granted, and fifteen years were added to his life. In the midst of his prosperity, perhaps forgetful of the solemn responsibility which lengthened days involved, pride may have entered the heart. Enjoying the glory of earthly possessions, and the special favors received from the Most High; at ease and off the watch; there was a readiness to display, even to Babylon who was great in her iniquity. Trusting, perhaps, too much to himself that he had walked with a perfect heart, he lost the fear that would have given caution, and neglected the guidance that would have preserved him from danger to the end.

These things were written for our instruction. How desirable it is that all should earnestly plead, and strive for strength to be kept on the watch-tower! and they who are overseers of others need perhaps a double watch.

What have they seen in thy house? The query came forcibly to mind, not long since, when stepping out of the dwelling of one in that station in the Church. In the library-room the extensive shelves were filled with books. While waiting for some minutes, one after another of these was taken in hand. Many of them were novels, romances and tales. No curtain or screen was drawn over this display. All desire to take a book from off those shelves seemed to vanish; but to those who have the appetite and no scruple against devouring such reading, how easily reached, and how great the temptation! The answer to the query, "What have they seen in thy house?" may sometimes be, "They belong to the children, I have nothing to do with them." Yet there may be something to do. As the holy watch which our Saviour enjoined is maintained, the eye will be anointed to see, and strength given to remove those things which are of evil tendency.

If Heaven is lost, all is lost.

A CHILD'S QUESTION.

Selected.

A little child sat on my knee
And laid her dimpled hand in mine;
Looked in my face inquiringly,
As she would fain my thought divine.

She wore a winsome earnest look:
My face was mirrored in her eye:
A loitering breeze her ringlets shook:
She sighed apart a little sigh

And said: "What makes your hair be white
And mine be dark?" And then a smile
Lit up the angel face. In spite
Of triper years and craft and guile,—
That hark repress a quickened sense,
Oh! will the glow of sympathy—
I felt the night of innocence,
Impress its hallowing touch on me.

I paused: her words dwelt in my ear
The cadence of a sad refrain;
I felt a buried past draw near,
And sighed to live my years again

A little moment's reverie
Brought me to know this sober truth:
White hairs can hardly hope to be,
Full partners in the joys of youth.

Her puzzling question yet remained
Unanswered, waiting for reply;
A childlike query that contained
The substance of a mystery.

I doubted how to frame my speech
And place it level to her mind;
The reasons that the schoolmen teach
Are too abstruse, they often bind

Instead of losing simple truth,
To guide a knowledge in the laws
That bear alike to age and youth
Proof of an Operative Cause:

Nor could I put her question by,
As one beyond her years and age;
But needs must tell her plainly why,
Without evasion or excuse.

I said: We have one Father, and child,
The God which gives us life and light;
Who on the garden and the will
Sends down the gentle dews of night;

Who spread the heavens, shaped the earth,
The sea and all that in them is;
The hidden stores of wealth and worth
In all this beauteous world are His.

The moon and stars by Him were made,
The clouds that float against the sky;
He made the sunbeam and the shade:
He lets us live: He makes us die.

The glory of His works attests,
A reign of Law to which all bend;
That Law His Will: wherein He rests
A sovereign means to work an end.

That Will controls through every change
The life we live, the death we draw—
That in our life which seems most strange—
Our death,—'tis the result of Law.

So, child, "What makes my hair be white"
And yours a mingled gold and brown,
Is one great God's Will: the height
From which all mystery broadens down.

SILENCE UNDER TRIALS.

Selected.

BY PROFESSOR UPHAM.

When words and acts unkind,
Against thy life like arrows fly,
Receive them with a patient mind,
Seek no revenge, make no reply.

Oh holy silence! Thy shield,
More strong than a warrior's twisted mail;
A hidden strength, a might concealed,
Which worldly shafts in vain assail.

He who is silent in his cause,
And lets that cause to Heavenly arms,
And Heaven's eternal aid and laws
Are swift to ward the thunders of the storm.

God is our great protecting power!
Be still! The Great Defender moves;
He watches well the dangerous hour,
Nor fails to save the child He loves.

A CHAPTER ON FLAX.

Selected.

When the Flax fully ripened is plucked from the ground,
Unfit for the spinner the substance is found:
The stalk in its harshness is plainly revealed,
But the long silken fibre as yet is concealed,
Full many probations severe, it endures,
Ere the softness that fits it for use it secures.
Twisted from the head is best of white a rod,
On the face of the earth 'tis then scattered abroad;
Where shelterless during all change it must lay,—
Feel the dew of the night, probe the heat of the day
Know sunshine and shadow alternate sweep past,
Be wet by the rain, and be shook by the blast,
The strength of the stalk 'tis then weakened away,
Its firmness submits at the touch of decay.
Then gathered still further of life it partake
'Tis thoroughly crushed by the harsh bruising Brake
Then first is the strong shining filament found,
Yet fragments of stalk mid its fibres abound,
By the Swinging Knife then it is beaten again
Till nothing unsoftened about it remain.
Perfected as far as these scourings can go
'Tis brought to the Hackle to clean it from tow:
Now fitted for use, 'tis by Industry spun,
Then woven as linen and bleached in the sun.
Of each did the Hebrews the garments prepare
For the sanctified children of Levi to wear,
Who entered with awe in the Holiest to make
A cleansing atonement for Israel's sake.

The varied process the flax passes through,
When gathered for use from the spot where it grew,
Will type to the mourner his provings of soul,
Ere all that is in him submits to control.
When Nature and Grace in his heart are at strife;
And self at the Cross pleading victory for life—
Would turn from darkness to dawn the hour
And struggles in death with a heart-rending power,
Till conquered by Sorrow's stern hand he appears;
And in silence submits, though he worships in tears,
Resigns up his harshness, surrenders his will Prepared with new powers, a new station to fill.

Such seasons are needful for all, to produce
That depth of abatement that fits us for use:
De-willing then mourner! be willing to feel
These painful labors, that will be wrought but pressed;
These Deaths which but make us alive and prepare
The heart for that change which the sinner must shun
Ere softened and tendered he bows to the rod,
And receives the new name of "a child to his God."

Fine Linen of old did the Temple display—
Which was but a type of this holier array—
This pureness of spirit, this clothing within
Of those who through Jesus are cleansed from the sin.

The man who his will and perverseness retains Like Flax in all its first harshness remains
Unfit for the Master, no use for it found,
Like mire to be trodden is cast on the ground.
Then love those Puritans, though keen be their sin,
Which sanctify nature, which purge out the heart;
Then fitted for use and in righteousness drest,
Thy justified spirit in Jesus shall rest.

There are very few tobacco-users who would commend their example to the young. They are ready enough with excuses for their own course; but they would shrink from advising bright and pure boys to do as they do. A great deal of prominence has been given to the fact of General Grant's love of elegant smoking. Now it ought to be made equally prominent that on his recent visit to Girard College, he expressed the hope that the boys there were not allowed the use of tobacco; for if they kept from it while under training, they would be far less likely to indulge in the practice when they went out. It may well be said to the boys, concerning these men who use tobacco and advise others not to: "All those for you, whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works: for they say, and do not."—*The S. ## Unreserved Obedience.

The following extract on unreserved obedience to what is made known by the grace of God, or the still small voice of the Saviour in the heart, is from the pen of that feeling, tender, father in the Truth, Isaac Pennington. He recommends his correspondent, in the part of the letter preceding the extract, to wait, or, hearken to, and obey the voice of the living God; which he says is nigh, and wherein is life. Would that the ear of the learned, and the heart of the teachable, the humble, and the contrite so were ours, that we might not only read, but understand and appreciate this wise seer's testimony concerning the only way to life and salvation. The children's steps in the heavenly pilgrimage seem so early traced, that we would especially commend the selection to the attention of the afflicted children, the young convinced, the sick, the contrite, the yielding and tender under the Lord's quickening power. The extract follows: "In that, which hath sometimes called thy heart [to obedience], there is truth, there be the beginnings of salvation; in that, which draws thee out, to expect some great matters, and dries up thy present sense, and hinders thy present subjection, therein is deceit and the destruction of thy soul. Therefore, if thou desire and love the salvation thereof, O hasten out of it! wait for the reproofs of wisdom; and what it manifests to be of the earthly worldly nature a thee, (the words, ways, thoughts, customs thereof,) hasten out of. O turn thy back upon the world with speed, and turn thy face toward the heavenly wisdom and light eternal, which will be springing up in thee, if thou turn thy back upon the world, and wait or it.

"And do not look for such great matters to begin with; but, be content to be a child, and at the Father proportion out daily to thee that light, what power, what exercises, what traits, what fears, what troubles, He sees fit for thee; and do thou bow before Him continually, in humility of heart, who hath the disposal of thee, whether to life or death forever. Ah! that wisdom, which would be hoisting, must be confounded, and the low humble thing raised, which submits, and cries to the Father in every condition. And, in waiting to feel this, and, in joining to this, thou mayest meet with life; but death, destruction, and separation from God, is the portion of the other forever! O! that thou mayest be separated from it, and joined to the seed and birth of God; that, in it, thy soul may spring up to know, serve, and worship the Lord, and to wait daily to be formed by Him, until thou become perfectly like him. But, thou must join in with the beginnings of life, and be exercised with the day of small things, before thou meet with the great things, wherein is the clearness and satisfaction of the soul. The rest is at noon-day; but, the travels begin at the breakings of day, wherein are but glimmerings, or little light wherein the discovery of good and evil are not so manifest and certain; yet there must the traveller begin and travel; and in his faithful travels, (in much fear and trembling, lest he should err,) the light will break in upon him more and more.

"This I have written in tenderness to thee, that thou mightest not miss of the path of the living, which is appointed of the Father to lead, and alone can lead the soul to life. O!

that thou mightest be enlightened and quickened by the Lord to walk therein, and mightest be thankful for, and content with, what He gives thee, and walk therein, from the evil to the good, from the earthly to the heavenly nature daily, and mightest not despise the cross or the shame [thereof]. For, I know there is a wisdom in thee, which will despise and turn from it, until the Lord batter and crucify it; and, I can hardly put up a more proper request for thee, than, that the Lord would draw out his sword against it, and deeply perplex and confound it in thee."

"Don't Cut the Strings."—Said one of the most successful merchants of Cleveland, a day or two since, to a lad who was opening a parcel: "Young man, untie those strings—don't cut them."

It was the first remark he had made to a new employe. It was the first lesson for the lad to learn, and it involved the principle of success or failure in his business career.—Pointing to a well-dressed man of thirty years behind a counter, the merchant said: "There is a man who always whips out his scissors and cuts the strings of a package in three or four places. He is a good salesman, but never will be anything more. I presume he lives from hand to mouth, and very likely is always more or less in debt. The trouble with him is that he was never taught to save. I told the boy just now to untie the string instead of cutting it, not so much for the value of the string as to teach him that everything must be saved and nothing wasted. If the idea can be firmly impressed upon the mind of a beginner in life that nothing was made to be wasted you have laid the foundation of success."

The moral of this little incident is self-evident. A young man well brought up, with a fair education, seeks employment in a business house. The habit of waste in little things is noticeable, and becomes a drawback on his value and usefulness to his employer. The disregard of saving strings and paper develops into a carelessness that runs through all his habits. He does not get on in the world because he is wasteful. Small sums of money slip through his fingers almost unconsciously, because they are small. He wastes time by the minute, without a thought of the old adage: "Take care of the minutes and the hours will take care of themselves."

Sitting in the counting-room of one of Cleveland's oldest and most successful merchants the other day, we noticed that he cut off the blank sheet of the letters he was engaged in filing. The name of this man is a synonym of clarity and benevolence, and his liberality in all good works is almost unbounded. His attention being called to what seemed an unusual proceeding, he said:

"Yes, it may strike you as singular to save these half sheets of paper, but I commenced life a poor boy in a country store in New England, and this was one of the first lessons in saving little things that was taught me by my employer. He has been nearly half a century under the sod, but I never do this without thinking of the good old man. I believe it was the secret of my success in life."

This saving of little things does not imply stinginess or meanness. It is simply the habit of saving instead of wasting. It is embodied in the motto "Waste not, want not." Therefore we say, "Don't cut the strings."—Cleveland Herald!

For "The Friend."
The Protest of German-town Friends against Slavery.

Some years ago a Remonstrance against holding Slaves, issued by Friends of German-town Meeting in the Second month, 1688, was found to be still remaining among the papers belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The fact of the issuing of such a document was well known; it, and the proceedings in regard to it, being on record among the minutes of the Yearly Meeting of 1688, but the finding of the original MSS. gave an added interest to the subject. This ancient paper was so far decayed with age as to make it desirable to preserve a copy of it, and it has, within a few weeks, been printed, by one of the processes of photographing called art-typing, whereby a perfect fac-simile of the paper has been produced—the exact size and color, in ink, so that the copy will prove permanent.

This is an exceedingly interesting document, being not only the first protest against slavery issued by Friends, but also, so far as we have been able to find, the first emanating from any religious body, officially, against this heinous sin. Not that the christian aspect of slavery had not attracted attention, for in 1645, Richard Saltston presented the case of "Captain Smith and Mr. Keser" to the General Court of Boston for landing on the coast of Guinea and killing many "Negers" and carrying some away, two of whom they brought to Boston. The charge is curious.

"The act (or acts) of murder (whether by force or fraud) are expressly contrary both to the law of God and the law of this country."

"The act of stealing Negers, or of taking them by force, (whether it be considered as theft or robbery,) is (as I conceive) expressly contrary both to the law of God, and to the law of this country."

"The act of chasing the Negers (as afore-said) upon the Sabbath day (being a servile work and such as cannot be considered under any other heade) is expressly capital by the law of God," &c.

The indictment or information was allowed by the Court, but what became of the case we do not know. But as the same Government in after years had laws selling their fellow citizens into slavery for holding Christianity in forms differing from their own, we cannot give them credit for soundness of principle on the subject of the inherent wrong of slavery.

Although the Yearly Meeting was not prepared to take action on the subject at the time it was presented, as the minute of that body shows, yet the wrong of slavery itself never was lost sight of, till in 1774 a rule was made depriving slaveholders of church fellowship. We find it in 1696 advising that its members should discourage the introduction of slavery, and be careful of the moral and intellectual training of such as they held in servitude.

In New England the Monthly Meeting at Dartmouth, in 1716, sent to Rhode Island Quarterly Meeting the query, "Whether it be agreeable to Truth for the Friends to purchase slaves and keep them for a term of life?" And Friends of Nantucket in the same year sent forth the declaration that "It is not agreeable to the Truth for Friends to purchase slaves and hold them for the term of life."

The earnest, patient, untiring labors of John Woolman contributed largely to the bringing about the noble work of clearing our Society from this pernicious sin. As early as 1746 we find him protesting against the wrongs done the poor blacks, and although he did not live to see his beloved Society cleansed from this pollution, yet so nearly was this labor of love crowned with success—in which labor he had the hearty sympathy and co-operation of many loved and faithful Friends—that two years after his death the Society of Friends may be said to have been clear of the stain of this sin. The first minute we find against slave holding is dated in 1755, while that disowning those who held their fellow creatures in bondage bears date of 1774.

The clear, forcible, cogent arguments, in all the quaintness of their antique spelling and old-fashioned grammar, contained in this document set forth so forcibly the wrongs of slavery and the inconsistency of those fleeing from oppression in one country oppressing others in another, that it is hard to epitomize the document.

"GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' PROTEST AGAINST SLAVERY, 1688.

These are the reasons why we are against the traffick of men-body, as followeth. Is there any that would be done or handled at this manner? viz, to be sold or made a slave for all the time of his life? How fearful and faint-hearted are many on sea, when they see a strange vessel,—being afraid it should be a Turk, and they should be taken, and sold for slaves into Turkey. Now what is this better done, as Turks doe? Yea, rather it is worse for them, which say they are Christians; for we hear that <sup>20</sup> most part of such negroes are brought hither against their will and consent, and that many of them are stolen. Now, <sup>20</sup> they are black, we can not conceive there is more liberty to have them slaves, as it is to have other white ones. There is a saying, that we shall doe to all men like as we will be done ourselves; making no difference of what generation, descent or colour they are. And those who steal or robb men, and those who buy or purchase them, are they not all alike? Here is liberty of conscience <sup>20</sup> is right and reasonable; here ought to be likewise liberty of <sup>20</sup> body, except of evil-doers, <sup>20</sup> is an other case. But to bring men hither, or to robb and sell them against their will, we stand against. In Europe there are many oppressed for conscience sake; and here there are those oppressed <sup>20</sup> are of a black colour. And we who know that men must not commit adultery,—some doe commit adultery, in others, separating wives from their husbands and giving them to others; and some sell the children of these poor creatures to other men. Ah! doe consider well this thing, you who doe it, if you would be done at this manner? and if it is done according to Christianity? You suppose Holland and Germany in this thing. This makes an ill report in all those countries of Europe, where they hear off, that <sup>20</sup> Quakers doe here handel men as they handel there <sup>20</sup> cattle. And for that reason some have no mind or inclination to come hither. And who shall maintain this your cause, or plead for it. Truly we can not do so, except you shall inform us better hereof, viz., that Christians have liberty to practise these things. Pray, what thing in the world can be done worse towards us, than if men should robb or steal us away, and sell us for slaves to strange countries; separating husbands from their wives and children? Being now this is not done in the manner we would be done at therefore we contradict and are against this traffick of men-body. And we who profess that it is not lawful, to steal, must, likewise, avoid to purchase such things as are stolen, but rather help to stop this robbing and stealing if possible. And such men ought to be delivered out of <sup>20</sup> hands of <sup>20</sup> robbers, and set free as well as in Europe. Then is Pennsylvania to have a good report, instead it hath now a bad one for this sake in other countries. Especially whereas <sup>20</sup> Europeans are desirous to know in what manner <sup>20</sup> Quakers doe rule in their province;—and most of them doe look up on us with an envious eye. But if this is done well, what shall we say is done evil?

If once these slaves <sup>20</sup> they say are so wicked and stubborn men) should jaint themselves,—fight for their freedom,—and handel their masters and mstrisses as they did handel them before; will these masters and mstrisses take the sword at hand and war against these poor slaves, licke, we are able to believe, some will not refuse to doe; or have these negroes not as much right to fight for their freedom, as you have to keep them slaves?

Now consider well this thing, if it is good or bad? And in case you find it to be good to handel these blacks at that manner, we desire and require you hereby lovingly, that you may inform us herein, which at this time never was done, viz., that Christians have such a liberty to doe so. To the end we shall be satisfied in this point, and satisfie likewise our good friends and acquaintances in our natif country, to whose it is a terror, or fairfull thing, that men should be handel so in Pennsylvania.

This is from our meeting at Germantown, held <sup>20</sup> 18 of the 2 month, 1688, to be delivered to the Monthly Meeting at Richard Worrell's.

At our Monthly Meeting at Dublin, <sup>20</sup> 30—2 mo., 1688, we have inspected <sup>20</sup> matter, above mentioned, and considered of it, we find it so weighty that we think it not expedient for us to meddle with it here, but do rather commit it to <sup>20</sup> consideration of <sup>20</sup> Quarterly Meeting; <sup>20</sup> tenor of it being nearly related to <sup>20</sup> Truth. On behalf of <sup>20</sup> Monthly Meeting,

Signed, P. Jo. HART.

This, above mentioned, was read in our Quarterly Meeting at Philadelphia, the 4 of <sup>20</sup> 4th mo., '88, and was from thence recommended to the Yearly Meeting, and the above said Derick, and the other two mentioned therein, to present the same to <sup>20</sup> above said meeting, it being a thing of too great a weight for this meeting to determine.

Signed by order of <sup>20</sup> meeting,

Thinking the action of this Yearly Meeting will add interest to the above, the minute made on receipt of it is appended. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, for a few years, was held alternately at Burlington and Philadelphia, which accounts for the date of the minute.

"YEARLY MEETING MINUTE ON THE ABOVE PROTEST.

At a Yearly Meeting held at Burlington the 5th day of the 7th month, 1688.

A Paper being here presented by some German Friends Concerning the Lawfulness or Unlawfulness of Buying and keeping Negroes It was adjudged not to be so proper for the Meeting to give a Positive Judgment in this case, It having so General a Relation to many other Parts, and therefore at present to forbear It."

Abraham Farrington's Convincement.

I think this year, Thomas Wilson at James Dickenson came into the country, at sometime afterwards to visit the meeting Friends at Crosswicks. I happened to be at the meeting before they came on; and the sight of them struck me; the heavenly frame of mind which their countenances manifested and the awe they seemed to sit under, brought a stillness over my mind, and I was as grog prepared to receive the seed. James stood up in the authority of the gospel, and in it I was led to unravel me and all my works from top to bottom, so that I looked on myself like a man dissected or pulled to pieces, all my religion as well as all my sins were set forth in such a light that I thought myself undone. After he sat down, Thomas stood up and brought me together again, I mean what we to be raised, bone to his bone, with the sinew and strength that would constitute a Christian: I almost thought myself new born, the old man destroyed and the new man made up concluding I should never be bad again, the my sins were forgiven, and I should have nothing to do but to do good; I thought had gotten my lot in the good land, and might sit now under my own vine and fig-tree, and nothing more should make me afraid.

Poor creature! I had only a sight. I did not yet think what powerful adversaries had to war with; this has been the miserable case of many; they have sat down under convincement, and in a form of religion, some depending on former experience or former openings, some on their education, some on bare belief and knowledge historical of the scriptures and principle of truth. Thus thought I received the truth, yet I was like the stone ground; I received it with joy, but had no root in myself, my heart grew hard again, for when tribulations, persecutions, temptations and trials came upon me, I fell. Oh! how moped at large and wandered about as a prisoner at large; I would have run, but could not, my offended judge, my accuser was in me, I could not fly from Him; yet great goodness was near, and his power kept me from gross evils in a great degree. I kept pretty much to meetings, but there was such a mixture of undigested matter in me it was not to be soon separated. Oh! the necessity there was, and still is, of a continual watch against our soul's enemies, both within and without.—Book of Memorials.

Those that will become Christians indeed and worship God as He hath ordained appointed himself to be worshipped; they must come to the principle of Light and Grace in their own hearts, which they have in, and through Christ, and they will find acceptance with God.—S. Crisp.

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

An instrument has recently been invented for measuring the force of the human pulse, graduated glass tube, similar to that used in making thermometers, is expanded in diameter at the bottom, and the aperture closed by a small thin disc of hard rubber. It contains a small quantity of colored water. When the disc of the instrument is firmly placed on the wrist of the patient, the pulsation of the artery causes the disc to vibrate, and the colored liquid dances up and down in the tube, owing to the eye the force, fluctuations and peculiarities of the pulse.

Edison's Electric Lamp.—The production of electric light by the incandescence of platinum is, for the present at least, laid aside for the more promising and more satisfactory rhodium.

The first carbon prepared by Edison for its purpose was formed of a thread enveloped in a paste made of lampblack and tar, and carbonized at a high temperature. This carbon thread, although not remarkably successful, gave sufficient encouragement to warrant further investigation in the same direction. After the trial of a number of substances it was determined the best of all was paper, simple, plain paper, without lampblack or other applications. In making these carbons of quality of cardboard, or paper known asristol-board, is used.

The horseshoe form of the carbon has a great advantage over the straight pencil or voltaic arc, the light being more diffused, and therefore softer and mellow, casting no sharp, black shadows, nor giving such an intense light as to be painful to the eyes. The bulb resembles that of a gas jet excepting in the matter of steadiness, the electric lighting being perfectly uniform and steady.

The entire lighting apparatus of a house, room, office, or factory, consists in the lamps and a few wires. There are no regulators, no complicated switches, no resistance coils to place the lamps when the latter are not in use. The lamp in its present form, is as simple as a candle, and candle-like, it may be taken from its socket and replaced. This may be done while the current is on.

To start the light it is only necessary to turn the screw. To stop the light the screw turned in the reverse direction. From this it will be seen that the electric lamp is managed easier than a gas burner, as it requires neither lighting nor regulating.

On the evening of our visit to Edison's laboratory, he had more than thirty of these simple little lamps in operation, the current being supplied from one of his machines. Each lamp gives a clear, soft light equal to that of a four foot gas burner. These lamps had already been in continued operation for more than 48 hours, and they had seen altogether as much use as they would in thirty days of ordinary domestic or business service. The light certainly leaves nothing to be desired so far as its efficiency is concerned, and are assured by Edison that, in the system of cheapness or economy, his system of illumination is far in advance of any other, not excepting gas at the cheapest rates.—Sci. American.

Paper from Common Grass.—The manufacture of paper pulp and paper from common grass is one of the latest novelties for which patent has been obtained. Any of the common grasses found in the field, lawn, or meadow may be used, and it is claimed that the green grass pulp produced from them may be manufactured into paper of great strength and length of fibre, and possessing tenacity, softness, and flexibility; and further, that this paper is even softer and more transparent than that made of linen. One pound of dried grass gives about one third to one-fourth of a pound of fine, bleached, and finished paper.

So long as the sap is in circulation and the chlorophyll, silica, and other inorganic matters are not dried in, in which event the fibre is seriously impaired for the purpose of paper, either old or young grass may be used, but, to avoid danger, it is best to have the grass cut or mown before it begins to bloom.

The first process of manufacture is to pass the grass between the rollers of a press, which crushes or loosens the fibre and squeezes out most of the sap. It is then freed from dirt by being thoroughly agitated or washed by other means in a large tank of water, in temperature either warm or cold. A perforated false bottom in the tank sustains the grass and allows the dirt to fall into the compartment below, from which a pipe gives egress to the dirt and washwater. After sufficient washing the crushed grass is bleached by the usual processes.

Signify of African Ants.—Ants surely are wiser than some men, for they learn by experience. They have established themselves even on plains where water stands so long annually as to allow the Lotus, and other aqueous plants to come to maturity. When all the ant-horizon is submerged a foot deep, they manage to exist by ascending to little houses built of black tenacious loam on stalks of grass and placed higher than the line of inundation. This must have been the result of experience; for, if they had waited till the water actually invaded their terrestrial habitations, they would not have been able to procure materials for their aerial quarters, unless they dived down to the bottom for every mouthful of clay. Some of these upper chambers are about the size of a bean, and others as large as a man's thumb.—Livingstone's Travels.

"Almost twenty years since," says Thomas Fuller, "I heard a profane jest, and still remember it. How many pious passages of far later date have I forgotten. It seems my soul is like a filthy pond, wherein fish die soon, and frogs live long. Lord, raise this profane jest out of my memory. Leave not a letter thereof behind." "The child of God who does not pray earnestly that he may forget very much which he has seen and thought and read and heard, has not yet learned how to pray according to his need, and according to the hope of a blessed forgetfulness of evil."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 24, 1880.

In The British Friend for the First month of the present year, a correspondent, who signs himself Q. Q., calls attention to the changes which have taken place in the Society of Friends of latter years. In England he says there have been several modifications of the rules relating to the care of the poor, the accomplishment of marriages, and similar subjects, which are human arrangements and "admit of change, and occasionally and in right order call for it; but the underlying principles admit of no change." "If we change our principles we cease to be Friends."

"With regard to the introduction of reading or singing in our meetings for worship, a fundamental principle is involved; and in the spirit of meekness, or as the apostle so beautifully expresses it, in 'the spirit of power and of love and of a sound mind,' it must be resisted; and that not only because of its present inharmoniousness, but because of that to which it grows, and that to which it leads."

After quoting part of a letter from the Christian Worker, and the account of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, as published in our paper of 11th mo. 22d last, he makes these remarks: "Now these things it must be confessed, are wholly out of harmony with our principles. We are well assured of that; and I cannot but think that those who indulge in them, and probably hold much in common with ourselves, are well aware of that; and we may be sure that all outside our borders, and who are at all acquainted with our principles, also know, that come whence it may, it is not Quakerism."

The Editor of the British Friend thus comments on the communication above referred to:—

"In considering the position of some of our meetings in America, we have not been able to look upon it but as an anomaly that the meetings in which causes for separation arise should put disownment in force upon those of their members who oppose innovations inconsistent with the Society's profession—such meetings, countenancing or at least, not efficiently checking those innovations. To a stranger, looking at the case, it might seem that the meetings should change place with those who have been disowned, they having become amenable to the penalty of disownment themselves. Whether those who withdrew might not have longer borne their burden we are not prepared to say; any way, endurance, doubtless, has its limits, while a meeting, sanctioning or conniving at deviations from the Society's profession, forfeits disciplinary power. In a recent issue we ventured to affirm that the same heaven which had been working so injuriously among our American meetings is manifesting itself in this country, as the following letter from Henry Stanley Newman, of Leominster, in The Christian of the 11th ult., plainly proves:—

"Dear Friend,—I have no fault to find with the editorial remarks in your issue of November 27 respecting the Society of Friends. There is only too much truth in your observations. I should like, however, to state, as a minister of the Gospel in the Society of Friends, that it is long since a Sunday passed here without the public reading of the Bible in our regular meetings for worship. Some of us certainly could not conscientiously belong to any Christian church that disallowed the practice. With respect to the meetings of Friends in this district of Herefordshire and Radnorshire, I believe the Bible is usually read in them all every week. I do not believe any church can prosper long where God's own Book is not thus honored.

"I may further say that the meeting of Friends here at Leominster is steadily increasing in numbers, having more than doubled its membership in the last twelve years. Your own columns have lately given some account of the revival in Radnorshire through the labors of Friends. In one meeting there we have received thirty-one into membership during the last four months, but it has been by earnest Bible exposition, by individual dealing with inquirers, and by preaching the glad tidings which are still the power of God unto salvation. Yours very truly,

HENRY STANLEY NEWMAN.'

"We forbear comment, much as there is room for it, expecting the reader will agree with us that the course now being pursued at Leominster and other places in Herefordshire cannot but propagate here what there has been so much cause to deplore in America. While it may possibly be that the members in Leominster unanimously approve of the practice referred to, the question naturally occurs: What is the Monthly Meeting contemplating in the case? Or failing the Monthly, what is the Quarterly prepared for?"

"Though there may happily be no necessity, it may yet be well very briefly to state what has ever for more than two centuries been the principle recognized by Friends in relation to worship. According to our understanding of that principle, it is this—In order to the performance of acceptable worship under the Gospel dispensation, vocal utterance, whether as prayer, praise, or exhortation, is not at all essential; meetings thus held are often seasons of deep religious instruction and edification. A fallacy is still all too universally prevalent, that worship chiefly, if indeed not wholly, consists in speaking to the Almighty, whereas we much more need Him to speak to us. What says the Psalmist? "Now unto thee will I cry, O Lord, my rock. Be not silent to me, lest if thou be silent to me I become like them that go down into the pit,"—in other words, that his Lord's silence would be the Psalmist's death. Again he says, "I will hear what God the Lord will speak." See also, Heb. ii. 1; Heb. xii. 25. In every meeting silence is a necessary preliminary for the flock to hear the Shepherd's voice, to whatever that voice may call. Now, as Christ is held over all his church, it is solely his prerogative to order the service, his presence being with even the two or the three gathered in his name, and He it is who must call and qualify whom He pleases to engage in ministering to the flock. While no limit is to be placed upon what He wills, the reading of a portion of Scripture may be at any time a duty, if He so wills, the same as prayer, praise, or exhortation. But whose engages in such reading is amenable to the judgment of the meeting, in precisely the same way as in utterances of another character. It follows, then, that Scripture reading is not to be prohibited, when divinely ordered. On the other hand, the moment that the reading is constituted a formal and necessary part of worship, a departure is made from the profession of the Society of Friends, and whether by individuals or congregations, the unity is broken, and these cease to a certain extent to be entitled to the name of Friends.

"Why, it may be asked, do those so departing from the Society's profession seek to remain in the Society, or why be allowed to remain? For if we would be a harmonious body, witnessing the blessed unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, it can only, in our judgment, be by the steady, faithful adherence of every member to the profession and practice of primitive Christianity revived by George Fox, Robert Barclay, William Penn, and their coadjutors of the seventeenth century—always bearing in remembrance that it is not by numbers that the question is decided, who are Friends and who are not—but they alone who adhere faithfully to that profession, exemplifying it in their lives, are entitled to the name and the rights of the Society of Friends. The same holds true of any other denomination."

We think the articles above quoted may be regarded as an evidence that the minds of some Friends in Great Britain are becoming awakened in degree to the serious nature and true character of the difficulties which have afflicted our Society; and which are not confined to any one section of it, though more developed in some parts than in others.

Sometime since we noticed a separation that had occurred in Spring River Quarterly Meeting, Kansas. We have recently received the printed minutes of a Yearly Meeting in Kansas, growing out of this separation, and composed in part of the Friends who participated in that movement. The meeting was held at Lawrence, 10th mo. 11th, 1879. The minutes contain a statement of the circumstances under which it was organized, and the reasons therefor. In addition to the usual internal affairs of such a body, a committee was appointed to look after scattered members attached to meetings that were not in fellowship with them; and one to visit subordinate meetings and families. Epistles were sent to "Western and Iowa Yearly Meetings; also one to the Friends of Canada Yearly Meeting." The bodies thus designated, we suppose were those who now meet apart from the larger bodies bearing the same titles. The number of members is stated to be about five hundred.

We have received the first number of the Paper World, a monthly journal published at Holyoke, Mass., and designed to contain information in all departments of business in which paper forms a component part. It is well printed, on good paper, and contains much matter of general interest. We have clipped some items from its columns.

James Viek, seedsman and florist, of Rochester, New York, has sent us a copy of his "Floral Guide" for 1880, containing several hundred beautifully executed cuts of flowers and vegetables, with brief directions for their cultivation. It is an attractive-looking pamphlet of about 100 pages.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The statement of the collector of customs at this port shows, that during 1879, imported goods came to Philadelphia in American vessels to the value of $15,500,000; in foreign vessels, $11,718,888—making a total of $27,218,888. The total for 1878 was $21,048,197. In addition to the direct importations, there were in bond through other ports to the amount of $708,319.

In New York it is stated the imports embrace a very much larger amount of specie and bullion, than has previously been landed there, and with one exception, presents the largest total of free goods ever imported. The exports exhibit the largest yearly total on record, notwithstanding the small shipments of specie.

There arrived in New York last year 21,421 vessels; of these 8077 were from foreign ports, 13,344 from domestic.

The number of mercantile failures for the past year shows a striking contrast with those of 1878—being 6,658 for 1879, and 10,478 the previous year. In 1878 the indebtedness due by parties who failed was $4,000,000, in 1879, $98,000,000.

The Republic Legislature of Maine met in Augusta on the afternoon of the 17th inst., and elected Daniel F. Davis for Governor. A Council was chosen, and Governor Davis was inaugurated. Genl Chamberlain being notified of the election of Davis recognized him as the lawful Governor, and resigned his trust as custodian of the institutions and property of the State.

Snow has fallen in Washington Territory to a depth of over four feet on a level. At several places buildings have been destroyed by the heavy snow.

The continued rough weather on the Atlantic is doing much injury to steamers to and from New York. On the 17th, of six advertised to sail, only three left.

The mortality in Philadelphia the past week numbered 263. Of these 47 were of consumption, diphtheria, 9, disease of the heart 13, typhoid fever 6, inflammation of the lungs 30, small-pox 2.

From the annual tables of vital statistics, published by the Health Department of New York city, it appears that the city of Burlington, Iowa, enjoys the pre-eminence for health, the annual death rate being 13 deaths per thousand; Stockton, Cal., 7.47; New York city, 25.95; New Orleans, 50.71; London, 23.40; Paris, 24.7.

Markets, &c.—The following were the quotations on the 17th inst. U. S. bonds, 6s, 1881, 104½; 5s, 1878, 102½; coupon, 103½; 4½, 107½; 4s, 1907, 101.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are quoted at 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 cts. in barrels, and refined, 8 cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use. Flour and meal weak. Minnesota extra $6.37½ a 50; Penna. do. do., $6.62½ a $6.75; western $6.75 a $7.00. Patent and other high grades 7.50—$8.25. Rye flour, $5.15 a $5.25 per barrel.

Wheat is slightly higher—red, $1.43; amber, $1.45. Rye, 90 cts. Corn, mixed and yellow, $1.49; white, 63 cts. Oats, mixed, 47 cts., and w. 48 a 49 cts.

Seeds.—Cloverseed, $1 a 91 cts. per pound; flax, $1.90 per bushel.

Hay and straw.—Prime timothy, $1 a $1.10 per ton; good, 90 cts. a $1; straw, $1.10 a $1.25 a 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—Market active, prices 1½ a 1 c. per pound higher. Extra, 6½ cts.; good, 5½ a 5½ cts.; corn, 3 a 4½ cts. per lb. Sheep, 48 a 61 cts. per lb. Lambs, 5½ a 6½ cts. Hogs, 6 a 7½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The indications are that the distress caused by Kerry, Ireland, will amount to a famine.

The police, escorting a party of process servers, Kilnara, county of Mayo, on the 15th, were severely maltreated and obliged to retreat. The process servers were aided by the mob. Money for the relief of the sufferers, continues to come from different countries.

The rainfall in the British Islands, the past year, exceeded the average of the last forty years by 3½ inches. The quantity of rain has never been exceeded and only once has it been equalled.

Dr. J. De la Sleswieg-Holsten, died on the 14th, in the 61st year of his age.

A land slip has destroyed the village of Alcalá, Jacar, in the province of Albacete. Several persons were killed and fifty families have been rendered homeless.

A newspaper of Brazil has established, in connection with the Department of Commerce at Rio Janeiro, a "Central Commission of International Exchange." This Commission is created for the purpose of collecting and transmitting scientific, artistic and literary information to similar bodies and to learned societies of other countries.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE. At Friends' Asylum, (Twenty-third Ward), Philadelphia, Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at Trenton, 12th mo. 16th, 1879, CHARLES NEWBY, in the 60th year of her age, a member of Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting held at Manassas, Burlington Co., New Jersey.

—, at her residence in this city, on the 23rd of 12th month, 1879, HANNAH G. SMITH, in the 82d year of her age, a beloved member of Northern District Meeting of Friends. "Blessed are the peacemakers in heart for they shall see God."

Religion and godliness.

Having something on my mind to write on before going, what here follows was written, and is now placed in the hands of the Editor of The British Friend for publication, believing that this labor of love will not be without benefit to some who may read it, in its encouraging them through many discouragements, trials, and temptations still to press forward toward the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus; that such be not stumbled or hindered in their course, or be led to turn aside in account of the many and contradictory voices that are heard, but turning from the "lo here," and "lo there," may have their eye through Christ Jesus steadily fixed and turned downward, and so may know that breathing forth unto the Father by and through his only begotten Son, Christ Jesus, the Anointed, through whom alone acceptable prayer can arise.

Religion and godliness, though often associated, are widely different. A man may be very religious and at the same time very ungodly. It is, therefore, very necessary, in this age of much and great religious profession, to mark the clear distinction that exists between these two. For while both have their origin in a sense of God, the one is the building of man, the shell, the outside; the other is wholly of God, and is the creation and work of his own blessed Spirit.

Man is a religious being—no matter how degraded or savage his nature, he will have objects of worship or reverence; so in proportion as man is refined by culture and association will his conceptions of God be refined and elevated. Still he will be but a religious man and not a man of God. Thus a man may read Holy Scripture, form to himself by reflection a belief in God, of Christ the Saviour, and acknowledge too, the work of the Spirit that may quite satisfy himself, and still be without the saving knowledge of God.

Godliness, on the other hand, is very different. It is not inherent to us but of God, and is the work of his Spirit. We cannot command it, but are enjoined to wait for and expect it, and where it appears in any heart, and is benighted into, it works great humiliation and self-abasement, not only on account of past transgressions, but from a view of the deep depravity of the human heart and its continual proneness again to turn to the evil it so much deplores. Now this is the true ground in which the plant of God doth grow: the humiliation and abasement of the creaturely nature in us, which does not neither can work the will of God. It is against this nature in man the fiery judgments of God are manifest in order to uproot it and consume it, for the carnal religious nature of man cannot grow or walk side by side in the heart of any with the Godlike nature, which is the only begotten of God, in any heart where it is known. The one or the other must have the victory. The Apostle Paul knew this conflict of natures within himself when he was led to cry out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death." He also came to know the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ; the same that must give us the victory, if victors we are to be.

Religion is a very common accommodating thing. It will bend to our tastes, our likes, and our dislikes; that which is disapproved by one sect of religious professors will be owned and approved by another; indeed, under a profession of religion every carnal passion and appetite may be fed and kept alive.

Godliness strikes at the root of evil. As saith the Master, "Make the tree good, and its fruit will be good also."

Some will here say;—If all good is of God, and that good is not at our command, where is man's guilt if he obey not that which he has not. Truly all good is of God, and that good which is of Him is not at our command; and also if we received not of God, He, the Just One, would not hold man responsible for that which he neither had or knew. But, who is in this position of not having received a sense of good and evil, and who is there on this earth who hath not been disquieted by a sense of guilt before a Holy God, beyond that which is the outcome of a natural conscience, which may be operated upon by education and association? From whence springs in every human breast that sense of God and desire to atone or appease offended goodness, if not of God? That which is of God and would tend to turn the mind of man toward Him, if heeded, may be so prostituted by man's reasoning powers, and by the darkness of his heart, that instead of its leading him upwards, may tend to greater depth of degradation and separation from God, in man seeking to satisfy and pacify himself, instead of his waiting to know that satisfaction in his soul, which is the work of God's Spirit. Hence it is not our applying the promises of God to ourselves, but by submission of body and soul to God, in humble prostration and faithful obedience, and to know God of his goodness to apply his promises to ourselves, and by his own begotten Son, who is the Minister of life to us through his blessed Spirit. It is here that men—religious men—miss of the good that is intended for them, by their being unwilling to wait to know God to perfect his own work in his own way. Man begins at once, under the first impressions of good, to appropriate unto himself, and so feels that nature in himself, which God would starve, so that instead of the evil becoming weaker in Him, and that birth which is of God growing stronger, he simply runs from one course to another in the same nature, and so abides in the separation instead of coming into the oneness and preciousness of that life which is of God.

Now, this is not attained to in a moment, for there are many conflicts to be passed through, as well as much to be struggled against, and that in ourselves, before the full indwelling of God through Christ is known. Yea, and we should utterly faint by the way if left to ourselves. But, blessed be God, those in whom this birth or beginning of life is known are not left to themselves; still they are not beyond the reach of danger, for like Israel of old, they have begun their journey from Egypt to Canaan, but like them too, when they begin to experience the trials of the way, may turn again a longing eye toward that state from which they have commenced to travel, and in doing so Satan will be ever near to whisper, "Thou wilt, thou wilt but torment thyself and at last perish in this great wilderness." So that in every step of the way there is need of the watch against the arising of evil in the mind, and of prayer in spirit. "Lord, deliver thy own dear child from the hand of the fowler and from the power of the lion's whelp" the begettings of evil in the heart—the offshoots of the corrupt nature in us. The true servant of the Lord dare not cry peace and safety where there is none.

Neither can he join with those who make the path to the kingdom so easy to the natural mind, and who tell the people they will not have to give up any of their joys and delights—only believe, and thou shalt be saved. The belief that saves is not the product of the natural heart and mind of man, but is the outcome of the work of the Spirit of God. So in like manner it is not the taking up or the laying down anything according to the will of man that will avail anything as to the salvation of the soul, but it is the obedience of faith to this blessed Spirit in man. Thus while the yoke is easy, and the self-denial easy to the true child of God, it is hard for flesh and blood to give itself up thus to be crucified with and by Christ. For he that will not deny himself and follow Christ, cannot be his disciple. Here is the difference between a man-made religion and a heaven-born one. The one is taken up and moulded by man to suit his inclination and taste; the other is begotten by God, and grows in us by our daily dying unto ourselves. So that while the former may renovate the exterior, and make the man appear different in his own eyes, the latter changes the root from whence springs all that is [evil] in him, and brings into conflict with that in himself that wars against his better nature, and this conflict doth not cease until that which is of God has got the victory. And further, he who, through patient perseverance, knows what it is to be brought here, realizes what it is to be born from above, to become wholly a new creature in Christ Jesus. How many too readily appropriate unto themselves the blessed promise of God, that the blood of Jesus cleanses from all sin, instead of waiting upon God to know the application of that blood which not only cleanses from past transgression, but renews into a holy life through and by the life of that blood taking root in their souls and bringing forth a body of holy life wholly of God. This is that that is acceptable with God, and, by which a sacrifice of a sweet smelling savor is offered unto God by Jesus Christ.

Again, the question may be asked,—Who then is to blame if God's will be not done, seeing the work is so entirely his own? Let such a one who would so speak answer these queries—1st, Hast thou been faithful to God in every known duty? and 2nd, Is it thy daily practice to place thyself before the Most High in spirit and in truth, secretly breathing unto Him according to the ability given, that He would purge out the old leaven of sin and wickedness in thy heart, and heget in thee of his blessed nature as manifested in Christ Jesus, so that thou mayest be redeemed from all corruption and held in his holy ways? Until these two queries can be truthfully answered, let all flesh keep silence before God.

This brings me to the true position of man before his Maker, that of humble dependence and waiting. For the want of this, man, religious man, misses of his highest good. He is so full of himself and of his own works that there is no room for the Saviour and Deliverer to work in him. Nay, more, he raises barricades in his mind against the entrance of truth into his soul, like the man who closes the shutters against the entrance of light, and so abides in the darkness of night. He fears the entrance of anything into his mind contrary to his own conceptions and education, and thus, while professing godliness, misses of the power thereof. It is not by reasoning, but by feeling, that we come to know God, and to realise his power. Happy is the man who is willing to abide in his secret pavilion, to pass from the shadow of religion to the substance, godliness. With most, if not all, this religious nature must be passed through, for the work is a gradual one, and the working state precedes the passive in the religious nature of man, but it is in the passive where the true growth is known. When we cease to work, and place ourselves at God's feet, then it is that God begins to work effectually in us for our redemption. Man first believes and then begins to work, and not till he has realized the fruitlessness of his own works will he cease to labor, and in secret be led to cry, Draw me out of my own working, striving, and contriving nature unto and into Thyself, O my God! This is the cry that they do know who, having experienced their own helplessness, simply cleave unto God, and so become in his hand clay to be moulded by the Almighty Potter into a vessel fit for his use. Such cease to think their own thoughts or to do their own work, God working in them to will and to do of his good pleasure.

I have written not for the unbeliever in Christ's blessed work without us, but for such as, having come to the acknowledgment of the truth in this particular, are desirous of becoming, in the Lord's time and way, the possessors of a divine substance; who are not content with the shadow or outward acknowledgment of that which is in itself good, but are seeking to realize the government of Christ in their souls, whose government will be gathered into that of the Father's when the fulness thereof is known.

Happy is that man or that woman who is willing to travel through all doubt and difficulty in order thus to know the fulness of Him who filleth all things. Such can find no joy and no pleasure out of or apart from Him, the God of all grace and all consolation.

Dear reader, is this to be thy case and mine?

CHARLES W. THOMSON.

Stoke Newington.

The Peach-Stone.—"Do you suppose, grandpa," said a little girl, "if I should plant this peach-stone, a peach-tree would really grow here in the garden?"

"It would be pretty likely to grow, I imagine," said the grandfather.

The child mused a moment, then said, "Well, I think I won't take the trouble to do it, for I might be dead before the tree was big enough to bear peaches;" and she raised her little hand to throw the stone away.

"Stop!" said her grandfather; "was that a good peach?"

"Splendid one, grandpa."
"A good many years ago, little girl, my father was a boy, and standing right here on this farm, he ate a fine peach. 'I will plant this stone,' he said, 'instead of throwing it away.' So he planted it, and to-day the little girl he never saw eats of its fruit. Those tall elm-trees by the gate, which make such a pleasant shade for us, he planted and watched for years. I don't believe he ever said, 'I won't water these slender trees any more, for I shall be dead before they are big enough to keep off the sun.'"

The sticky little hand opened, and two great blue eyes gazed curiously at the stone; then suddenly without a word she darted away into the garden, and soon a hole was made in the black earth, and the stone dropped in, and covered.—Christian Register.

The Searcher department of the New York post-office, in the space of one month, gathered from the mail-bags the following curious and heterogeneous collection of unmailable matter: Reecivol Alive.—Rattle snakes, black snakes, copperhead snakes, moecasin snakes, cats, grasshoppers, bees, hornets, wasps, alligators, canary birds, potato bugs, horned frogs, tortoise, turtles. Received Dead.—Mice, butterflies, humming birds, rats, insects, squirrels, quails, bugs, pheasant. Cooked Articles.—Plum pudding, boiled quail, ham sandwiches, bread and butter, cake, crackers, bread pudding, jelly, custard, cheese, sausages. Miscellaneous.—Pistols, loaded cartridges, torpedoes, medicines, glassware, clothing, soiled undergarments, baby clothes, hosiery, hair brushes, combs, carpenter tools, pieces of machinery, fence wire, gold and silver watches, jewelry, notions and novelties of all kinds; shrubs, roots, scions, herbs, fresh and dried; fruits and flowers, and last but not far from least, six cases of dynamite, which were promptly thrown into East River.

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, New Jersey.

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting was established in 1795, having previously formed part of the Quarterly Meeting of Gloucester and Salem—which originally included all meetings from Burlington to the south-western end of the State—and was held alternately at Salem and Haddonfield, till 1795, when the Yearly meeting having authorized its division, two Quarterly Meetings were established, one to be held at Salem, and called Salem Quarterly Meeting, the other to be held at Haddonfield, and called Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting. In the course of a few years, the meeting-house at Evesham having been enlarged, it was agreed that it should be held alternately at Evesham and Haddonfield.

In the year 1799, on account of interruption a exercise frequently introduced at the time of closing the shutters, the subject was referred to a committee of men and women Friends, and the following minute adopted: That the time of holding our Quarterly Meetings, men and women meet in their separate apartments, select, with the shutters raised, after a reasonable time of solid retirement closing the same proceed to transact the affairs of Society with that quietude and harmony the nature of the occasion demand. In the year 1824, on account of the increasing interruption at the close of the meetings I worship, the meeting was induced to convene with the partition closed, and continued meet in that way until after the separation the 6th month, 1823; it being apprehended that the cause which led to this conclusion was then very much removed, it was agreed to meet in future according to the conclusion of 1799, before retired.

In 1838 a proposition was made, and after due deliberation adopted, to hold our Quarterly Meeting alternately at the four Monthly meeting-houses, as is now the practice. Nearly all who were active members at that time have been removed by death, and the quiet, naturally arises, will these meetings continue to be sustained as they have been, when those who are now on the stage of action shall have passed away? During that period of more than forty years, although for a short time discordant spirit was manifest, there has generally been a harmonious labor for the promotion of truth; and many of them, as on last, are remembered as seasons of peculiar favor. The language seems applicable to us: What could have been done more to my vineyard that I have not done in it? And we can but acknowledge that the visible fruits are no in proportion to the labor bestowed. This is nothing new. The same acknowledgment may be found again and again in the journal of Friends preceding us, ever since the very early days of our Society; yet in some respects the former days were better than these. It is often remarked, there is less tenderness of spirit manifested by Friends now than formerly, especially among children and young people. Another evidence of decline in religious life is the great decrease in the number of Friends engaged in the ministry. The following Friends, belonging to Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, were in the station of acknowledged ministers during the early part of this century, and most of them at the same time, viz: Richard Jordan, Benjamin Sweet, Mary Swett, Deborah Stewart, Hannah Clement, Sarah Cresson, Elizabeth Barton, and amuel Leeds, in Haddonfield Monthly Meeting; Rebekah Roberts, John Hunt, Lydia Lippincott, Ann Edwards and Ebenezer Roberts, in Chester; Hinchman Haines, Joseph Haines, Sarah Wilkins, Elizabeth Haines and Ann Quicksall, in Evesham; and Martha Allison and Elizabeth Collins in Upper Evesham Monthly Meeting. Ample memorials are preserved of the labors of some of these Friends, and the character of their ministry, while of others little can be gathered beyond the scanty records of the meetings to which they belonged. The journal of one of these, John Hunt, contains some interesting notices of our Quarterly Meeting in his day; also of the labors of some of these and other Friends here.

Commencing as far back as 1793, before the meeting was divided, he says, 5th mo. 20th: "Attended Quarterly Meeting at Salem; James Thornton, and many of the Yearly Meeting's committee were there, and had the extracts read, before the men and women separated. It was a lively favored season, and I could but admire the goodness of the Lord, in thus following and favoring us." Again in the 9th mo. 1793, he says: "At our Quarterly Meeting there was a time of deep trial in appointing representatives to attend the Yearly Meeting, on account of the great mortality and sickness which seemed to be increasing in the city. It was concluded that Friends be left at liberty to offer their names; as none were easy to nominate others. So a few gave their names; but none with so much clearness and courage as Elizabeth Collins, who said her mind had been much drawn towards the city. But after all Friends were left at their liberty."

"3rd mo. 20th, 1795. The Yearly Meeting's committee attended on the settling of our new Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting."

Again, in the 9th mo. 1798, the yellow fever being again in the city, he writes: "Great mortality continued in Philadelphia, so that at our Quarterly Meeting it was a trying time in getting representatives to attend the Yearly Meeting—none seemed free to go on account of the sickness there being so great, and the town so desolate—Samuel Townsend, of Cape May, however, and Martin Moody, went and took our answers."*

"12th mo. 1st, 1800. At our Quarterly Meeting, which was very large and many strangers there, Sarah Cresson, a very young woman, was raised in very great eminence in a powerful testimony; solemnity and a sweet favor of life attended; I have seldom been sensible of the like for many years. Thomas Scattergood, who has been for several years in Europe in Truth's service, was also there, and had very savory, acceptable service, as well as some others. It was a memorable and distinguishedly favored day, in which the youth in a particular manner were tenderly visited, cautioned and invited. May it be remembered to profit."

"At our Quarterly Meeting in the 12th mo. 1801, we had again the company of Mary Swett, just returned from her visit to England, Ireland, Germany, France and Scotland, safe and sound, having been absent about four years." No remarks are made on the character of her ministry; but it is remembered by some as lively, being a great gift in few words.

In 1809. "At our Quarterly Meeting in the 12th month, the testimony of Truth was raised into dominion, particularly against Friends mixing with the spirits of the people in their human policies and confusion."

"12th mo. 1809, Richard Jordan attended our Quarterly Meeting and had excellent and extensive service, being raised in great eminence amongst us. John Simpson, likewise, was there, and had good service. I believe few were present but what had a sense, like a renewed stretching forth of the Divine hand to gather us; and I could say, surely goodness and mercy follow us; and as R. Jordan said, that notwithstanding the many frailties, weaknesses and failures among us, yet how abundantly are we favored in our solemn assemblies! and that he believed there was not in all the earth, a people favored in like degree, and that this people and principle would not be cast off."

The mountain forests of Grenada abound in a species of monkey, called macaque by the natives. They live on fruits and other vegetable productions, and often cause serious loss to the planters by their depredations; not only by what they eat, but by their wasteful habit of biting and throwing to the ground much that they do not consume.

Being desirous to secure some of these animals, he made an excursion for that purpose, which did not meet with success, only because the hunter was too tender-hearted to destroy life. Yet it gave an opportunity for becoming acquainted with their habits and manœuvres. On the border of a lake about 2000 feet elevation above the sea, he came upon a patch of some acres of half-wild plantains and bananas which had probably spread from an abandoned provision ground. Under the clumps of plantains were scattered fruit half-eaten and thrown to the ground.

"Following a broken and interrupted trail, as indicated by fragments of banana and plantain, we finally traced the monkeys to the base of a high cliff forming part of the enclosing wall of the ancient crater."

"Here we found the tree by which they descended from the heights above when they visited the banana swamp—an immense fig-tree, which had grown out of a cleft in the rock, and had established itself on the face of the cliff by a hundred roots and rootlets, aerial and terrestrial, covering the rock with a mesh-work; from the upper branches hung long lianas, like twisted cordage, down which monkeys would take delight in swinging themselves. Down this great natural ladder—the monkeys' highway—they always came, whence they scattered through the plantain groves. Often have they been hunted while there; but upon the approach of any one, no matter how silently, their noise ceased at once, though they were grunting and barking noisily before; and in a few minutes they could be heard hundreds of yards away."

"It is difficult to find them if wounded, as they hide, and cling tenaciously to bush and tree. While travelling (always among the tops of the highest trees) they grunt and bark like dogs, and while feeding they have a peculiar, low, murmuring chatter. They are invariably led by the oldest monkey, who is exceedingly sly.

"The negro examined the ground where the monkeys seemed to have held a last sitting over their harvest of plantains, and declared they had been gone several hours. He thought they would return in the morning, as they have regular circuits of travel, appearing in one section in the morning, and in another miles away in the afternoon; among the wild plantains and nut-trees of the mountains in the evening, and carrying destruction to the cacao and nutmeg groves at dawn."

"At daylight, guided by a little black boy, I revisited the plantain swamp. It was full of bloom, and I sat down under a tree. Soon a black object descended the cliff, and I was about to fire, when my little guide whispered that it was only a wild-cat. Light appeared, the birds awoke, and the forest was vocal with sounds. The tree beneath which I had seated myself was a 'mamme-apple,' whose huge bole swelled out above me, and gnarled limbs stretched out and up, supporting a dense canopy of leaves, among which hung clusters of fruit. This fruit is about as large as an orange, has a large stone, a thin rind of yellowish flesh, and tough, russet skin. The monkeys had left the ground strewn with fruit, which they had bitten in mere wantonness, and then thrown away. The many fresh leaves on the ground here also attested their recent visit. Behind me was the cliff, below me the waving plantains, surrounded by forest so dense as to hide the sky."
